12,858. That is the whole service?—That is the whole service. Thereupon the owner appears, or sometimes a mortgagee, or some other person who may be interested in it; for any person is allowed to intervene to protect his own interest.

12,859. Mr. Baxter.—But when it is in personam, how is it done?—Then a citation in personam is taken out, and that has to be served personally upon the party cited.

12,860. The Chairman.—Just as in other courts?—Yes; it is served personally on the party cited; or if the person cannot be found, and is keeping out of the way, then, as in other courts, you may apply to the court to have substituted service.

12,861. Mr. Gordon.—What is the kind of substituted service generally resorted to?—Well, it is now hardly ever resorted to: formerly, if personal service could not be effected, the instrument was served upon the Royal Exchange, as being the usual resort of merchants, but that is not done now. The court directs the mode in which the substituted service should be effected.

12,862. Is advertisement in the newspapers ever resorted to?—Yes, in case of the sale of property. We never sell property till notice of the sale has been advertised three times in newspapers at certain intervals of time.

12,863. The Chairman.—You are speaking of the notice of sale?—Yes; not of the arrest.

12,864. That is in causes in rem?—Yes.

12,865. Mr. Gordon.—You said that before the warrant for arrest was issued, the court must be satisfied that they had jurisdiction, and also that there was a reasonable case?—Yes.

12,866. Is that done by affidavit?—It is done by affidavit. No warrant is allowed to issue without an affidavit being brought in. Here is the form of the affidavit in a cause of possession: 'I, A B, make oath and say as follows: That I am the lawful owner of ——— sixty-fourth shares of the ——— or vessel ———, belonging to the port of ———. 2. The said vessel is now lying at ———, and is in the possession or under the control of [state name, address, and description of the person retaining possession, and state whether he is the master or part owner, and if owner, of how many shares]; and the said ——— refuses to deliver up the same to me [and the certificate of registry of the said vessel is also unlawfully withheld from me by the said ———, who is in possession thereof.] 3. The aid and process of the High Court of Admiralty are necessary to enable me to obtain possession of the said vesssel [and of the certificate of registry].'

12,867. The Chairman.—That seems to set out simply the cause of action?—Yes; or, 'I, A B, make oath that on such and such a day I rendered certain salvage service to such and such a vessel, that I have made application to the parties for compensation, but have not obtained any, and the aid of the court is required to enforce it.' The chief clerk ordinarily fills up the warrant, which is then sent to myself or the Assistant-Registrar to sign. Should there be any difficulty as to whether the court has jurisdiction, the chief clerk always brings it to our notice, and takes our directions as to whether the warrant should issue or not. If we entertain any doubt, we refuse a warrant, and tell the parties that they must apply to the court.

12,868. But where there is no doubt about the jurisdiction you issue the warrant?—Yes.

12,869. Mr. Gordon.—In what circumstances do you exercise jurisdiction with reference to a foreign vessel?—We make no distinction between foreign vessels and other vessels as regards arresting them, nor whether the plaintiff or defendant be a foreigner.

12,870. Or both?—Or both. I believe that we act in this country more liberally in that respect than many foreign countries do. Foreign countries generally do not entertain suits between two foreigners. Here we make no such distinction.

12,871. The Chairman.—The presence of the vessel in the country is sufficient?—We consider that the claims which the Admiralty Court ordinarily enforces are liens which attach to the ship, and which follow the ship wherever she is. That is the theory on which we proceed.

12,872. According to the universal maritime law?—According to the universal maritime law.

12,873. If no appearance is made for any defendant, what takes place next?—If no appearance is entered within 14 days, the plaintiff takes out a notice of sale, which has to be advertised in the newspapers.

12,874. In certain newspapers prescribed by the court?—Yes; the Times, the Shipping Gazette, and generally a paper published at the place where the vessel happens to be. If, at the expiration of the time fixed by the advertisements, no person appears, then on proof being given that these advertisements have been duly inserted, and upon its being satisfied that there is a good ground of action, the court pronounces for the claim, and orders the appraisement and sale of the vessel. Then the proceeds are paid into court, and persons having claims against the property file the particulars of their claims.

12,875. Persons other than the plaintiff in the original suit?—Yes. The court determines the priorities amongst the different parties.

12,876. Mr. Gordon.—In what form do they file their claims?—They file them simply with what we call a minute of court. Each claimant is obliged to institute a separate action against the vessel; and though the vessel may have been sold in one action, the proceeds themselves are proceeds in court, and not applicable simply to that action. For instance, it very often happens that a vessel is seized in a bottomry suit first; but before that suit is concluded the seamen have entered a claim, or a salvage suit has been instituted. The owners, finding that the demands on the vessel are greater than the probable amount of proceeds, take no steps in the matter, but leave the vessel in the hand of the court. The bottomry bond-holder then proceeds to sell the vessel, and the proceeds are brought into court. Notice is then issued to all parties who have instituted a suit against the property, and the court determines the priorities.

12,877. Mr. Baxter.—You consider all the claims under the suit at the instance of the bottomry bond-holder?—Not exactly. The course is generally this: suppose that the bottomry bond-holder was to apply to have the amount of his bottomry bond paid out to him, notice of that application would have to be served on the seamen, the salvor, and any other person who may have instituted a suit, or rather on their proctors; and they might then come in and object to the money being paid to the bottomry bond-holder, and might maintain that their claims should be first satisfied.

12,878. Mr. Gordon.—It becomes an interpleader suit?—Yes; though we don't call it by that name.

12,879. The Chairman.—And if there is any reversion after satisfying these claims, it belongs to the owner?—Yes.

12,880. And it will remain in the hands of the court till they come and ask for it?—Yes.

12,881. When a defendant or defendants appear, in what form do they plead?—The plaintiff brings in his petition, which is ordinarily very short, and in separate articles. (Witness exhibits it.)

12,882. Lord Barcaple.—Is that the pleading which the rule as to articulate statements, to which you formerly referred, applies?—It is.

12,883. Mr. Gordon.—That is after appearance is entered within a fortnight?—Yes.

12,884. The Chairman.—The first part of the paper is called 'preliminary acts:' what exactly is that?—They are confined exclusively to damage or collision cases. It was found that the defendant very frequently, when the plaintiff had given in his plea, framed his defence upon the admitted facts in the plea, and it was deemed desirable by the late judge, Dr. Lushington, that the parties before they pleaded should each deliver into the registry, sealed up, a document, which is called the 'preliminary act,' containing a statement of the following particulars:—

(1.) The names of the vessels which came into collision, and the names of their masters.
(2.) The time of the collision.
(3.) The place of the collision.
(4.) The direction of the wind.
(5.) The state of the weather.
(6.) The state and force of the tide.
(7.) The course and speed of the vessel when the other was first seen.
(8.) The lights, if any, carried by her.
(9.) The distance and bearing of the other vessel when first seen.
(10.) The lights, if any, of the other vessel when first seen.
(11.) Whether any lights of the other vessel, other than those first seen, came into view before the collision.
(12.) What measures were taken, and when, to avoid the collision.
(13.) The parts of each vessel which first came in contact.

It prevents a defendant from setting up an altogether false case—at least it is done with that view. I should state that sometimes a case is heard upon the preliminary acts alone, without any pleadings at all. The rules allow that. It not infrequently happens that all the issues are brought out upon the preliminary acts, and that therefore no pleadings of any kind are necessary.

Henry Cadogan Rothery.

12,885. In cases which are not collision cases, are there no preliminary acts?—No.

12,886. What is the first pleading in a case which is not a collision case?—The first is called a petition. I have here one. It is only in collision cases that the preliminary act is required.

12,887. When is the petition put in?—Within a fortnight after the defendant has entered an appearance.

12,888. Mr. Adam.—Is it always printed?—No; when given in, it is in writing. Within a fortnight from the petition being given in, the defendant has to give in his answer, and then the plaintiff has a week to reply, but frequently a conclusion is filed instead of a reply. Then the plaintiff prints and files all the pleadings.

12,889. Mr. Gordon.—Do you find that the printing is a great convenience?—A great convenience.

12,890. And economy?—And economy.

12,891. Lord Barcaple.—The original pleadings are given into court?—Yes.

12,892. And remain with the officer of court?—Yes.

12,893. The Chairman.—Are copies served upon the opposite party?—No document can be filed, where there is an opponent, without a copy of it having been previously served upon the adverse party.

12,894. Mr. Gordon.—And certified?—And certified on the back that a copy has been served; otherwise it is not received into the register.

12,895. Can you prolong the periods?—Yes.

12,896. Upon cause being shown?—Yes.

12,897. Is that occasionally done?—Very often: and one of our chief difficulties is to prevent the great waste of time which occurs from the proctors indulging one another.

12,898. Lord Barcaple.—Does that happen to a large extent?—I cannot say it happens to a very large extent, because our rules are very stringent, and we always make a point of refusing time unless it appears to be necessary.

12,899. Mr. Gordon.—Can you refer us to any rule which has the effect of preventing such delays?—It must rest very much with the judge or the officer, who, whenever any indulgence of the kind is granted, ought to condemn the party asking for it in the costs of the motion. Our rules only specify that a certain act shall be done within a certain time, and there is another rule which says that the judge or the Registrar may allow an extension of time on good cause shown, and it depends entirely on the person who grants that indulgence whether a strict hand is held over the proctors or not.

12,900. Lord Barcaple.—But the application for the extension of time is made by the proctor without the aid of counsel?—Yes, generally in the cheapest possible form.

12,901. Then the whole expense will be the proctor's fee on each side, I suppose?—Yes, it is so.

12,902. Is it found to be an operative discouragement?—I think so. There is the inconvenience of being called up before the court, or before the Registrar; and proctors would often sooner file their plea than have to be summoned to attend before the judge or Registrar.

12,903. Mr. Gordon.—Suppose both proctors agree to delay?—They would then sign an agreement and a consent in writing. We have a rule, which is in these terms: 'Any agreement between the proctors in a cause, if in writing, dated and signed by both proctors, may, if the Registrar think it reasonable, and such as the judge would under the circumstances allow, be filed, and shall thereupon become an order of court, and such order shall have the same force and effect as if the same had been made by the judge in person.' If they bring me an agreement for time, I ask the ground, and they say generally that they are under treaty for settlement of the case. If so, it seems hardly expedient to force them on.

12,904. Do you require the cause to be assigned in the agreement?—No.

12,905. Mr. Baxter.—Do you ever refuse delay where both parties consent to it?—No, unless it was a very unreasonable application.

12,906. The Chairman.—Suppose that a party fails to plead within the time, what is the consequence?—If, when a defendant has given in his answer, the plaintiff does not within a week file his reply, the defendant is at liberty to file a conclusion, and the pleadings are then concluded.

12,907. Suppose that a defendant does not avail himself of his privilege to file a conclusion?—Then, if the time has expired, we don't receive the reply unless the defendant writes on the back of it that he consents to its being filed.

12,908. If the defendant does consent, you receive it?—Yes. We consider that to be a consent.

12,909. Don't you find that indulgence is often given by a proctor to his opponent in that form?—Yes; and to the great injury of the parties to the cause.

12,910. Lord Barcaple.—What is the effect, as matter of pleading, of the defendant filing a conclusion?—That the pleadings are concluded.

12,911. But are they concluded in a way more disadvantageous for the plaintiff than if he had made that formal note to which you referred?—Not in the least; only the pleadings are concluded, and the parties cannot, without the leave of the court, plead any further.

12,912. That conclusion contains a denial of the defendant's statements, so far as they do not coincide with the plaintiff's statements?—It concludes the pleadings.

12,913. And no evil results to the plaintiff?—None, except that the plaintiff cannot plead further.

12,914. There would be an evil if the plaintiff wanted to put in a replication?—Yes. Then he must apply to the court to rescind the conclusion, and allow him to file his reply. The court would sometimes refuse that; but I should think it would generally be granted on his paying all the costs that have been incurred.

12,915. Mr. Adam.—By whom are the pleadings prepared?—They used always to be prepared by the solicitor, and settled by counsel; but I think now that they are almost invariably prepared by counsel. I have no practical knowledge of that, however. When I was in practice, it used to be as I have said; but many alterations have taken place since I became Registrar.

12,916. The Chairman.—You speak of the solicitor. Is that the same as the proctor?—Yes. In the Admiralty Court formerly the proctors alone were allowed to practise; the court was then thrown open, and the result has been that a great number of solicitors have come in to practise: sometimes we call them solicitors, sometimes proctors. In 1859, when I drew the rules which came into operation in 1860, the proctors were in the majority, and the definition given was that proctor shall mean any proctor, solicitor, etc. Now the solicitors are in the majority, and in any amended rule it would be better that the term proctor should be dropped.

12,917. Mr. Adam.—I suppose the expense of preparing a paper by counsel is allowed against the opposite party?—Yes, so much a folio; a shilling a folio for drawing, which is the solicitor's fee, I think, in all courts, and the fees of counsel in addition for settling it.

12,918. The Chairman.—I see there are two signatures to each of these papers?—One is the proctor's and the other is the counsel's. That is merely continuing the old practice which existed before the court was thrown open, when the proctors invariably prepared the plea, and counsel settled it.

12,919. Mr. Adam.—Would the court receive a paper which was not signed by counsel?—It ought not, if it observed it; and certainly the clerks in the registry ought not to receive it. It might escape them.

12,920. But it is not proper?—It is not.

12,921. The Chairman.—Could you give us a notion of what may be the entire expense of producing a petition and answer?—You mean to the end of the printing?

12,922. Yes. I want to know what expense both parties have incurred when the paper is printed in this form, with all the previous proceedings?—I see that in a table I have prepared, showing the amount of the plaintiff's costs up to the time of bringing in printed copies of the pleadings in twenty-one cases, the average amount allowed on taxation as between party and party was £26, 17s. 0¾d.

12,923. What is the next step?—The next step is to determine the way in which the case is to be proved. In the Court of Admiralty the case may be proved in any one of the following modes,—by affidavits, by written depositions, or by the oral examination of witnesses in open court, or partly by one mode, and partly by another.

12,924. Mr. Baxter.—Have you any juries?—Never.

12,925. The Chairman.—Which is the mode generally resorted to?—Formerly there were two forms of pleading. Salvage and other simple cases were called act or petition cases, the pleadings being by petition and answer, and all such cases were proved by affidavit. There was, however, a more formal proceeding, which was called proceeding by plea and proof. In that case the plaintiff gave in what was called an allegation, to which the defendant, after a certain period, had to give in his answers on oath; the plaintiff then produced his witnesses, who were examined by an examiner in secret upon the several articles of the allegation; the examiner put what questions he chose to the witness, for the purpose of eliciting what he could say on the particular articles to which he was designed. After the examination in chief was concluded, the adverse party, without knowing at all the evidence that had been given, gave to the examiner certain interrogatories in writing, and these were administered without reference to what the witness had said in his deposition in chief. When the plaintiff had produced all his witnesses, and they had been examined, the defendant gave in his responsive allegation, to which the plaintiff was obliged to give in his personal answer on oath; then the defendant produced his witnesses, who went through the same process; and after that the plaintiff gave his counter allegation, and the same process was gone through.

12,926. But all that is abolished?—Yes, entirely.

12,927. What is the present system?—The system of oral examination in open court has been gradually introduced; and almost all the cases are now heard by oral examination.

12,928. Lord Barcaple.—With or without affidavit?—If an affidavit is to be filed, leave must be asked of the court. If the witnesses are abroad, or are going away, they are examined before an examiner or before a commissioner. Sometimes it may not be worth while to send an examiner abroad, and then some one on the spot is appointed commissioner. We have the greatest facilities for taking evidence in our court, for a case may be proved partly by affidavit, if the court choose to allow it, partly by examination of witnesses on commission abroad, and partly by the examination of witnesses orally before the court. Sometimes the witnesses are examined orally before the court at different times. Seamen are very slippery witnesses; and if the seamen of one vessel happen to be in this country, the party very frequently prefers that his witnesses should be examined at once rather than wait for the arrival of the other vessel, lest he should lose his evidence altogether. They are examined in court; and if there is a considerable interval before the examination of the other witnesses, the evidence is reduced to writing, and printed. It is taken down by a shorthand writer.

12,929. The Chairman.—But I understand that the preference now is for examination in court?—Undoubtedly. That is found to be far better than the other system. Very little reliance is placed upon affidavits.

12,930. Then, if that is so, I suppose the greater part of the evidence is adduced in open court?—The greater part of it is adduced in open court. In the year 1853, shortly before I was made registrar, I published a small pamphlet, showing the absurdities of the system then existing. I have here a copy of it. Its recommendations generally were, viz., 1st, That the pleadings should be concluded before any witnesses were examined; 2d, That the proctor and counsel should be present when the evidence was taken; and there was one other suggestion, I think.

12,931. I see that, at the time you published this pamphlet, you were an examiner yourself?—Yes; I had then the largest practice as an examiner in the court.

12,932. Mr. Gordon.—Then you don't approve of the system of affidavits?—No, not at all.

12,933. Why?—Because the affidavit is generally drawn by the solicitor, and does not fairly represent the evidence of the witness.

12,934. But is there not a power of cross-examination reserved?—Yes; no doubt that is so. An affidavit is very good if it is simply to prove a fact in the case,—to prove a document; or to prove, for example, the day when a vessel left a particular port.

12,935. Where it is not likely to be a contested point?—Yes.

12,936. Where there is not likely to be a conflict of evidence?—Yes; but where there is a conflict of evidence, the only mode of ascertaining the truth is by the oral examination of the witness in open court.

12,937. Lord Barcaple.—I suppose, in Admiralty causes, you have very frequently a conflict of evidence from the subject-matter of the dispute?—Certainly; I believe that is notorious.

12,938. And from the class of witnesses?—Yes. Collisions are the more important of our cases; they generally occur at night, and each set of witnesses sees the thing from a different point of view; and without meaning to commit perjury, they give a very different account of the circumstances.

12,939. And each party is more or less liable to the imputation of having been in fault?—No doubt.

12,940. Mr. Adam.—You said the evidence was taken down in shorthand. Is the shorthand writer an officer of the court?—He is not an officer of court, but he is appointed with the approval of the court.

12,941. By whom is he appointed?—By the judge or by the registrar. The present shorthand writer was appointed in my time; and though he has no formal appointment, he takes the evidence in every case, and he is sworn in every case.

12,942. Is he paid by the parties?—He is paid by the parties.

12,943. Mr. Gordon.—Do his notes form the record of the evidence which is given orally?—Yes; and that is the record which ultimately goes before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in the event of there being an appeal.

12,944. Lord Barcaple.—Is that record of the evidence certified in any way?—It is certified by the shorthand writer.

12,945. The Chairman.—The judge does not take a note of the evidence?—He does take a note of the evidence. No person could properly hear a case without taking a note of the evidence very largely; but the judge's note of the evidence does not go before the court of appeal. He takes it more for the purpose of impressing the facts on his own mind than for any other purpose.

12,946. For his own use entirely?—For his own use entirely.

12,947. Lord Barcaple.—Does it very frequently happen that he pronounces his judgment then and there?—Generally.

12,948. Mr. Adam.—Does the judge dictate to the shorthand writer what he is to write?—No, never; the shorthand writer takes it down, question and answer.

12,949. Lord Barcaple.—And so writes it out?—Yes.

12,950. The Chairman.—Do you not find that that mode of taking the evidence makes the record of the evidence very long?—It may in some cases; but I think it is more satisfactory. It certainly is more satisfactory than it is in appeals from the Probate Court, where the judge's notes of the evidence sometimes go up to the House of Lords in addition to the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence. I have also understood that in the common law courts it is a very great labour for the judges to write out their notes of the evidence for the court above, and that there is sometimes great difficulty in obtaining them.

Henry Cadogan Rothery.

12,951. Lord Barcaple.—In the Probate Court you say the judge's notes and the shorthand writer's notes both go to the court of appeal?—In one case I know that was so.

12,952. Are you aware whether the shorthand writer acts for the court in the Probate Court, or is he not merely employed by the parties?—Lord Penzance spoke to me on that subject only a few days ago. At the Judicature Commission we were discussing the question of whether a shorthand writer should be permanently attached to each court. I proposed it, and was very strongly in favour of it. Lord Penzance was not present at the time; but I afterwards spoke to him on the subject, and he told me he was decidedly of opinion that a shorthand writer should be appointed. He stated that on the death of one of his clerks, he had made it a point that the second clerk should be a shorthand writer, and that that second clerk takes down all the evidence in shorthand; and it is the greatest comfort to him, for he himself does not take the evidence at length—which he would be bound otherwise to do—because he has a shorthand writer on whom he can rely, and who is, as it were, part of the court itself; and if he has any difficulty, he refers to the shorthand writer. Lord Penzance told me he would advise a plan of that kind to be adopted, by which a shorthand writer should be attached to the court.

12,953. The Chairman.—As soon as the evidence is completed, the judge delivers his judgment?—Generally; sometimes he reserves his judgment.

12,954. Mr. Gordon.—Is the judge not assisted by nautical men?—He is assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House in any case which involves nautical skill or requires nautical knowledge. This is invariably the case in collision cases, and occasionally, if the parties apply for it, in salvage cases, where nautical skill is required. In no other cases is the judge assisted.

12,955. What effect has their opinion on his judgment?—They are simply advisers. The responsibility rests with the judge entirely; but of course in a purely nautical question the judge would hardly put his own opinion as against theirs.

12,956. The Chairman.—At the same time he is at liberty to discard their opinion?—He is at liberty to disregard their opinion; and if they differ, he may either form his own opinion, or he may refer it to the Trinity House. Dr. Lushington used always to send it to the Trinity House for them to appoint other two Trinity Masters to meet and consider the evidence; but that was not deemed satisfactory, because the two last-named Trinity Masters would not have an opportunity of seeing the witnesses. The present judge, in the only case which has come before him in which they differed, heard the case over again with one additional Trinity Master, or rather, I should say, he heard the arguments; but that also was not very satisfactory, because the third Trinity Master had not had the advantage of hearing the evidence of the witnesses.

12,957. An appeal lies from the judge of the Admiralty Court to the Privy Council?—Yes.

12,958. In all cases?—Yes; not from all orders, but from all final decrees, and, with his permission, from all interlocutory orders.

12,959. But not without leave?—Not without leave.

12,960. Mr. Gordon.—Are there cases which are referred to you as registrar by the judge of the Admiralty Court?—Yes, there are a great many. All damage cases are referred to me: when the judge has determined who is to blame, if he pronounces in favour of the plaintiff, he refers the claim, together with all accounts and vouchers, to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to assess the damages.

12,961. The Chairman.—That will take place in all collision cases?—Yes; in all collision cases. We have now jurisdiction in questions of disputed accounts between masters and owners—where a master has been navigating for a year or two, and has received large freights and made heavy disbursements. These and collision cases are the most important cases that come before me. The questions between masters and owners being generally questions of account, involving a great number of accounts, almost invariably come before me ab initio. They rarely go before the judge.

12,962. Mr. Baxter.—Do you take the assistance of any person?—I always have two merchants, as they are called, to assist me, if the case which is referred to me involves any question of mercantile usage, or requires skilled knowledge. I have three merchants who assist me: one is Mr. John Cattley, who was a leading merchant in the city, and who is one of the directors of the London and Westminster Bank; another is Mr. Sidney Young, who was a shipbuilder; and the other is a partner in Barings' house. They are gentlemen of high standing in the city.

12,963. The Chairman.—How are these advisers remunerated?—They are remunerated for each case: where the amounts are considerable—and the cases that come before me are generally considerable in amount—they receive 5 guineas for each case; where the case is small, they only get 2 or 3 guineas. It rests with me to fix the amount of the fee. Where, as sometimes happens, the case is a heavy one, large in amount, and very difficult, occupying two or more days, the merchants get larger fees.

12,964. Mr. Gordon.—Is the fee so much a day?—The amount of the fee does in a measure depend on the time occupied. One case this year lasted no less than five days; it involved many thousand pounds; and in that case the merchants got 20 guineas a-piece.

12,965. The Chairman.—Four guineas a day?—Yes.

12,966. Lord Barcaple.—Are these days spent in taking evidence or in hearing argument?—In both. A great number of witnesses were produced.

12,967. Mr. Gordon.—And you have the parties before you?—Yes.

12,968. The Chairman.—By counsel?—Yes. I have here a return of the number of references that have taken place since 1841. I take that year, because it was the year in which the Admiralty Court became what I might call a public court. Before that the registrar used to take the fees for himself; and Lord Arden, who held the office at that time, had enormous fees during the war. In 1840 the Act 3 and 4 Vict. c. 65 passed, which made it a public office; and it is that time that we generally make our starting-point. The number of references in 1841 was only 2; then they came up to 6 and 10; and in 1853 they were 30 in number. They gradually increased till, in the year 1867, they were 78; and in the first four months of the present year there have been 31. So that the references are increasing in number; and they have been increasing in importance too.

12,969. Mr. Gordon.—Is there an appeal from you?—Yes, to the judge of the Admiralty Court, and from the judge of the Admiralty Court to the Privy Council.

12,970. Do you preserve any record of the evidence?—Yes; I take the evidence. Sometimes the parties have a shorthand writer to take down the evidence of the witnesses before me; but latterly that has not been done, and I have generally taken very full notes.

12,971. The Chairman.—And your notes go to the judge?—Yes.

12,972. And they would be the record of the evidence in the Privy Council?—Yes.

12,973. Mr. Gordon.—Do you take a note of the admission?—Yes.

12,974. The Chairman.—How do you find the system of recording the evidence yourself, to work?—It would save me a great deal of trouble if I had a shorthand writer, because I should then only take down what I considered to be very important. I should of course write a good deal myself to fix it in my memory. At the same time there is a great deal of irrelevant matter that I should not think of taking down, if I did not feel that I was bound to take a full note to go before the judge.

12,975. You would take down things which there might be difference of opinion about?—Yes.

12,976. But a great many irrelevant matters slip out in the course of an examination which you would not take down?—Of course.

12,977. As regards the interest of the parties, which is the best,—your own note, or the shorthand writer's; I mean as regards the interest of the parties in respect of expense as well as everything else?—It is very difficult for me to answer that question. There would be the additional expense of the shorthand writer, and the much greater length of the evidence that would be taken, and which of course would be printed if it went before the court of appeal. On the other hand, if I had a shorthand writer, a case would, I think, probably be finished more quickly than it is now, so that there would be less expense.

12,978. Do you find that a case is finished more quickly before you when you have a shorthand writer?—Yes, I think so.

12,979. Do you think there is much difference?—I had a very heavy case this year, which lasted five days; and if I had had a shorthand writer, I think it would not have lasted more than three days. I am sometimes obliged to stop counsel during their examination of the witnesses, as they get rather too fast for me; but if there was a shorthand writer, there would be nothing of that kind.

12,980. Mr. Gordon.—Do copies of your notes require to be made?—Yes.

12,981. For the parties?—Yes; and I am obliged to correct them. My writing in taking the notes is very illegible, and the going over and correcting it takes up a great deal of my time; all of which must be considered in the expense, because if I were not so employed, I should be doing something else.

12,982. Are there sometimes issues of fact extracted from the pleadings?—We have never done that yet. It is a suggestion that has been thrown out by the Judicature Commission, that if the issues are not clearly brought out, application might be made to the judge to settle the issues.

12,983. The Chairman.—In the form of questions?—Yes, in the form of questions; which might be very convenient occasionally.

12,984. Who is the taxing officer of your court?—I am.

12,985. Can you give us some notion of the costs of a suit in the Admiralty Court?—I think I stated it at the end of a paper which I wrote for the Judicature Commission; it is in these words:—'Lastly, as to the costs: It is not easy to say what generally is the cost of an Admiralty suit; it varies very much with the nature of the cause and the number of the witnesses, and the compensation to them for their viatics and loss of time. Speaking roughly, however, I should say that the amount of a bill of costs in a contested suit is generally from £60 to £150, and sometimes as much as £200. Whether this is more or less than it would be in a similar suit in a common-law court, I do not know; but only last week one of the leading counsel in the Court of Admiralty stated in court that in the same cause, in which a fee of 15 guineas would be given with the brief in the Admiralty Court, a fee of 60 or 70 guineas would be given if the cause were tried at Guildhall. If this be so, I have no hesitation in saying that the costs of trying a collision cause in the Court of Admiralty must be much less than in a court of common law.'

12,986. Mr. Gordon.—Do you mean on each side?—On each side.

12,987. Lord Barcaple.—You mean the sum you give includes both sides?—No; each side.

12,988. It is the costs that the party will recover if he has got his costs?—Yes.

12,989. The Chairman.—It is the bill of costs of the successful party?—Yes.

12,990.—Mr. Gordon.—Are you in the custom of limiting the amount of charge as against the unsuccessful party?—Giving him something nomine expensarum do you mean?

12,991. No; I mean cutting down the charge?—Yes; that is the duty of the taxing officer. A person who has gained his suit, and recovered costs, leaves his bill, and the two solicitors attend and fight over the several items of it.

12,992. You limit the charge as against the party, though you might sustain it against the client?—Yes, certainly. A client might be a very nervous person, and might wish to have a great many consultations with counsel. These would be a very legitimate charge for the solicitor to insert in his bill, but they would not be proper charges to allow against the adverse party.

12,993. The Chairman.—Have you any general rule for fixing the amount of counsel's fees?—No, none. It is purely within our discretion.

12,994. Suppose a case lasts one entire day, what would be the ordinary fee for counsel?—It would depend entirely on the importance of the case.

12,995. You mean the pecuniary importance?—Yes, very much upon that; and also on the question whether or not any difficult points of law were involved, which required a good deal of reading up.

12,996. Suppose a case to go into a second day?—Counsel have refreshers, as in other courts. I don't think there is any distinction in our court as to counsel's fees, except that I think that in the old Doctors Commons days they were lower than they were in the common law courts.

12,997. Do you think that is not the case now?—I think the fees are higher, but I don't think they are quite so high yet as in the common law courts. I speak, however, merely from what I have been told. I don't know whether the Commission are of opinion that the assessors and merchants whom I have are a good form of tribunal; but I feel so strongly the value of the tribunal that I should be very glad to answer any questions on the subject, if any of the Commissioners entertain a doubt about the value of them. We differ in that respect from the common law courts, where, I understand, the Masters are referees; and they adjudicate on all kinds of questions without the assistance of any skilled persons; which I look on as being a source of very great mischief.

12,998. Mr. Justice Willes.—It has been held that the Masters may employ a skilled person?—I was not aware of that.

12,999. He is not bound to act on his report?—Nor am I. But I think it is rarely that they have any skilled person to assist them.

13,000. You could not get on without it?—It would be quite impossible. There are, however, cases in which I do not require experts.

13,001. In many cases the judge has not Trinity Masters?—Yes. There were two masters' wages cases last week in which I did not require merchants, because the question was simply one of evidence as to whether anything was due, and it did not turn on mercantile usage.

13,002. Mr. Gordon.—You mentioned the fees that these gentlemen receive. Probably they look on it as being a position of honour?—Yes, they do so. I observe in the evidence given in Scotland that a great many questions were asked as to whether it would not be expedient that the amount of damages should be settled at the same time that the merits of the case are decided. I entertain a very strong opinion that it would be most inexpedient to do that; and for many reasons. In the first place, the two questions are essentially distinct. The question that goes before the judge is, which vessel is to blame. The proof of that depends entirely upon the evidence of the seamen who are on board; but these men could give no evidence as to what the cost of repairing the damage of the collision would be. That must come from totally different persons. So that you have a totally distinct class of witnesses necessary for deciding the merits of the case, and for assessing the damages. In the next place, if you were to have your witnesses in court in order to ascertain what the amount of the damage is, non constat that you would require them, because you don't know which party will succeed. In almost all our cases we have action and cross-action; and if you adopted that plan of the judge deciding not only the merits of the case, but hearing evidence also as to the quantum of damage done, he would have to hear witnesses not only as to the merits of the case, but also as to the quantum of damage sustained by the plaintiff, and as to the quantum of damage sustained by the defendant, before he had decided whether the defendant or the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Henry Cadogan Rothery.

13,003. Lord Barcaple.—Are there not cases in which you have to ascertain the damage done to both vessels?—Sometimes, when both vessels are pronounced to blame for the collision; but all I would observe is, that you ought first to decide who is to blame, and after that assess the damages; it is not necessary to ascertain the amount of the damages, if the party is not entitled to claim them.

13,004. The Chairman.—Don't you think the witnesses who are to speak to the question of blame, and the witnesses who are to speak to the question of damage, may to a certain extent be the same? For instance, supposing it were a question whether a certain defect or damage in the vessel had been caused by the collision, or had occurred before, the seamen on board the vessel would be good witnesses on that question?—That is a very exceptional case; but even then the question would rarely, if ever, turn upon the evidence of the seamen, but rather on that of the master or the owners of the vessel. I have such a case now before me, where a steam vessel, which had been damaged by collision, was run on shore, and the bottom got injured. This was said to have injured the machinery, and the question was, whether it did or did not injure the machinery; but the seamen on board could give no evidence on that point. The only persons who could give that evidence were the owners, or the engineer who was in the habit of repairing the vessel.

13,005. Mr. Gordon.—Your observation as to the advisability of separating the question of how the damage was caused, and the extent of the damage, refers more particularly to Admiralty causes, I presume?—Yes. I am not applying it to any other causes.

13,006. Mr. Adam.—I observe, from the report of the Judicature Commission, that proceedings may be taken, in a case of collision, either in the common law courts or in the Admiralty: which is preferred?—The best answer I can give to that is an observation which Lord Chelmsford made on one occasion. He said that when he was at the bar, if he had a good case, he always advised the parties to go to the Admiralty Court; but if his clients had a bad case, he always advised them to go to the common law courts. He thought if it went to the Admiralty Court, it would be properly investigated; but if the plaintiff went to a common law court, he would stand a fair chance of getting a verdict. He said that the plaintiff in a collision case almost always gained at common law. It is not so in the Admiralty Court.

13,007. The Chairman.—Are the Trinity Masters who sit with the judge remunerated in the same way as the mercantile gentlemen whom you consult?—Yes. They receive 2 guineas for each case; and inasmuch as there is generally an action and a cross-action, they generally get 4 guineas a day. The Trinity Masters are supposed to be public officers to a certain extent. Their connection with the Court of Admiralty dates from a very early period. Their fees were fixed at a very early period, and it has not been deemed expedient to alter them; though it can hardly be said that 2 guineas is a sufficient compensation to a skilled person for a whole day.

13,008. Mr. Justice Willes.—Is 2 guineas a very ancient fee?—Yes, it has existed for a great number of years.

13,009. Would you say for centuries?—No, I should think not for centuries; but most probably from about the middle of last century, when, I think, the fees were fixed.

13,010. Mr. Gordon.—Do they receive any salary from the public?—They do.

13,011. What salary?—I don't know exactly what it is; but it is under consideration now, I believe, to reduce the number of Trinity Masters, and to give them a higher salary.

13,012. Mr. Adam.—Can either of the parties require you to take the assistance of the assessors; or can you do it of your own motion?—If they asked me, I should always do it, in the same way that the judge, if he is asked, would always take Trinity Masters.

13,013. Mr. Gordon.—Do the parties pay them?—Yes.

13,014. The Chairman.—Suppose one party asks you, and not the other?—Then I should exercise my own discretion, as the judge always does with respect to Trinity Masters. If both parties consent, he invariably takes Trinity Masters in a salvage case. If one applies for it, and the other objects, he reads the papers, and exercises his own discretion.

13,015. Lord Barcaple.—I observe in those pleadings which you have given us, there is merely a setting forth of facts. There is no setting forth of any grounds in law upon which either party relies. There are not what we call in Scotland pleas in law?—No.

13,016. Has that always been the style of pleading?—Yes.

13,017. Do you find any disadvantage to result from that?—No, we do not. It is very difficult to say that law is never pleaded. You cannot always separate law from fact.

13,018. Mr. Gordon.—But I presume your cases chiefly result in a difference of the facts as alleged by the respective parties?—Yes, they do.

13,019. Lord Barcaple.—Bottomry bond cases may involve very nice points of law?—Yes.

13,020. Mr. Gordon.—Suppose you were pleading on a claim founded on a bottomry bond, would there be any law stated—I mean as to the priority?—Law would be pleaded in such a case as this: a vessel being in the charge of a pilot, that, by the law of such and such a place, the owner was bound to take a pilot, and that therefore he was relieved from responsibility; that would have to be pleaded.

13,021. The Chairman.—You would set forth the law of the place?—Yes. For instance, in the case of the 'Halley,' which was recently before the Court of Admiralty, and went to the Privy Council, there was a collision between two vessels in Belgian waters, and foreign law was involved.

13,022. Mr. Justice Willes.—But foreign law is considered matter of fact?—Yes.

13,023. The Chairman.—Suppose that the defendant objects to the jurisdiction of the court, in what form would he plead that?—The old practice used to be, that he was bound to appear under protest; but now he sets it out in his plea. He would state in his answer that the plaintiff had no grounds for this action.

13,024. Mr. Gordon.—Have you any demurrers in your court?—Yes.

13,025. At the conclusion of the pleading?—No; before. As soon as the petition is given in, the defendant may demur to it within four days of its being given in, and say, that even if it is proved, it would not give him the remedy he seeks. Thereupon, the admission of the petition is objected to, and that is heard formally.

13,026. Before the judge?—Before the judge. The judge then says that it is sufficient, or rejects the petition altogether—in fact, rejecting the suit; or he directs that the petition should be amended, which, I think, is the practice in Chancery.

JOHN BOYD KINNEAR, Esq., examined.

13,027. The Chairman.—You are a member of the English bar?—I am.

13,028. When were you called to the bar?—In 1856.

13,029. You were also a member of the Scotch bar?—Yes; I was called there in 1850.

13,030. Your practice is in Chancery, I believe?—It is.

13,031. I don't know that there is any particular subject on which the Commissioners desire specially to examine you; but we shall be very glad to receive any suggestion that you have to offer us on the subject of our inquiry?—I think there is scarcely anything derived from Chancery practice that I can suggest as being at all calculated to be an improvement upon the Scotch system. Substantially, in theory, the two systems are somewhat the same. Some years ago, when a bill was introduced for the purpose of establishing in Scotland the division of procedure into common law and equity forms, which prevails in England, I set out in a pamphlet the strong objections which occurred to me to such a course; but I ventured to add some suggestions derived from the practice in England in both sets of courts, which seemed to me to be capable of being adopted with advantage in Scotland. Some of these suggestions have been already adopted in the statute subsequently passed; but there are one or two that have not been adopted, and perhaps you will allow me to mention them by reference to this pamphlet. The first is derived from common law rather than from Chancery, and it is to the effect, that in case of actions concluding for payment of a liquidated sum, proceedings might be shortened by indorsing the amount of the claim upon the summons, together with a note of the costs of the summons, with notice that, if the amount is paid, proceedings will thereupon come to a close. Another suggestion was, that edictal citation should be abolished, on the ground that it conveys no real intimation, and that it would be better to allow the court, where personal service or service at a dwelling-house could not be effected, to judge what is the proper method of bringing the fact of the action to the knowledge of the defender.

13,032. Are you aware that a considerable alteration has been made upon the system of edictal citation by Act of Sederunt since that time?—I was not aware of that Act of Sederunt.

13,033. Within this year,—with a view to secure, as much as possible, personal notice. That is an improvement in the direction you wished?—Quite so. Then another suggestion, which comes more immediately from our Chancery practice, but has been also adopted recently at common law, is the permission to serve interrogatories by the one party upon the other, calling for an answer on oath to certain specific questions.

13,034. You approve of that proceeding?—Yes; that, under proper restraints, works very well. I think it has often a tendency to prevent litigation, and to shorten it.

13,035. Mr. Gordon.—What do you mean by proper restraints?—In Chancery it is sometimes abused. It is spun out to an unnecessary length. Questions are put with absurd minuteness, calling for an answer to every conceivable variety of circumstance, which leads to expense and overloads the proceedings. The questions should perhaps be brought before the court in the first instance, and allowed by them; or failing that, the court should exercise considerable powers in regard to the costs of such questions, if they deem them unnecessary.

13,036. Mr. Campbell.—Like adjusting interrogatories for an examination on commission in certain proceedings in Scotland?—Exactly.

13,037. The Chairman.—Such interrogatories have never been adjusted at the sight of the court, but only at the sight of the clerk of court. Would you suggest that such interrogatories should be adjusted at the sight of the clerk of court, when served on the defender, in the way you propose?—I would much rather have them adjusted by the court than by the clerk of court.

13,038. Mr Adam.—Do you mean these interrogatories to be served at the very beginning of a cause?—Yes, at the very beginning; with power to serve them at a later period by leave of the court, when circumstances arose to make the court think that course expedient.

13,039. Mr. Baxter.—How are they adjusted just now in Chancery?—They are in no respect adjusted, except when the party has refused to answer. They are, in the ordinary case, drawn by counsel, and served upon the opposite party. They are at the discretion of counsel.

13,040. Lord Barcaple.—Has the opposite party not a power of complaining that they are improperly drawn, and getting them restricted in some way?—Yes, he has practically, by not answering such as he feels convinced are improper. Then the party putting the interrogatories may bring the question before the court by excepting to the answers for insufficiency.

13,041. He goes before the chief clerk, or before the judge?—Before the judge. But it is not very frequent that interrogatories are not fully answered.

13,042. But it is a certain amount of check?—It is a certain amount; but it is generally found that even if interrogatories are long and useless, it is easier and cheaper to answer them than to cause objections by declining.

13,043. And adjusting them might create some expense. There is the necessary attendance of some person before the judge?—That is true. Then there is another point which occurred to me before, and I still think it might be useful. I refer to obtaining documents by a less cumbrous process than a commission and diligence to recover them, adopting a method which both at Chancery and common law is adopted, of requiring a witness or party to produce documents according to a notice which is served on him. If an ordinary witness so called upon fails to produce the documents, he is liable, if the court thinks they are proper to be produced, to the ordinary punishment for neglecting a subpœna; and if a party to the suit has been required to produce documents, and fails to do so, then the party who has called on him has the option of giving secondary evidence of the document which has not been produced.

13,044. Mr. Gordon.—I presume the latter right will only exist where the party called on to produce is the opposing litigant?—That is so.

13,045. Is there not this advantage in the case of a party proceeding by our system of Scotch commission and diligence, instead of the proceeding of a subpœna duces tecum, that the document is exhibited before the trial according to the Scotch practice, whereas in England I presume you can only have that proceeding for exhibition at the trial?—In Chancery the evidence in chief is all produced before the trial. At common law I believe that if a document is very important, and inspection of it is required, the judges have power to make an order for inspection.

13,046. In the hands of a neutral party?—Yes; or to permit that it shall be inspected.

13,047. But to command is the question?—To command certainly—not to compel the delivering up, but the exhibition.

13,048. The Chairman.—Don't you think that the proceeding by commission and diligence may be very useful in a case when important documents are in the hands of a third party unconnected with the parties to the suit, and where the examination of them beforehand may be very important for the preparation of the trial?—Undoubtedly. I should not in the least propose to abolish the system of commission and diligence, but I offer this as a substitute in many cases. It would be cheaper, because a commission and diligence is very cumbrous, and must often be very expensive; and it must frequently be for the purpose of obtaining formal evidence of the contents of a document, which are perfectly well known, or merely to obtain formal evidence that the document does not exist.

13,049. Have you any further suggestion?—No; but I may say that, on the general principle of procedure, it is becoming more and more impressed on my mind, that it is very desirable that, at the earliest possible stage, the parties by their counsel should come before the judge. Such a course perhaps is more difficult in Chancery cases than it might be at common law, because the cases are more complicated; but I think it could be worked in Chancery cases, that at a very early stage the parties should come before the judge, and that the nature of the case should be explained to him; that he should then ascertain the real facts in dispute, call for evidence on them in the way he thinks fit, and then the case would be ripe for his judgment, both on law and fact.

13,050. That seems a very good general principle; but how do you propose to enforce it? What I understand you to mean is this, that the less delay there is before the cause is ripe for hearing before the judge, the better?—Yes; and that the delay will be diminished by bringing the parties before the judge at a preliminary stage.

John Boyd Kinnear.

13,051. How would you propose to expedite matters so as to bring the parties before the judge sooner than they are brought under the existing practice?—I am not sure that I could suggest anything that would bring them before him much sooner than they are by the recent Act in Scotland. But speaking of ascertainment of facts, my idea is, that after the parties on each side have made their statements of the facts, they should come before the judge, and that the judge should, in a not very formal manner, and not calling for argument, ascertain for himself, with the assistance of counsel, what are the facts that are in dispute, rather than by calling on the parties to make admissions apart from what they do in the judge's presence.

13,052. Mr. Campbell.—You are aware that your object is attained in the Sheriff Court in Scotland?—It is so.

13,053. At the first calling of the cause the parties are brought together in presence of the judge, and the grounds of defence are at once stated?—Yes; without any written statements at all preceding it. It is the same in County Court common law procedure. In County Court Chancery procedure, which has been introduced within the last three years in cases under the value of £500, the plaintiff makes his statement of facts, and the defendant may or may not make a written statement of facts; that is optional with him. If he fails to do so, when he has material facts, of the existence of which he ought to have forewarned the plaintiff, that will be considered in the question of costs. But as soon as these statements are interchanged, the parties come before the judge.

13,054. The Chairman.—We have been told that the equity jurisdiction of the County Courts has not been much called into exercise?—I believe not very much,—not sufficiently, at least, to enable one to judge how it might work.

13,055. Can you account for that in any way?—No.

13,056. Mr. Gordon.—I suppose you are aware that in the Court of Session Act of last session there is a provision, that as soon as the pleadings are given in, the counsel shall attend the Lord Ordinary with a view to dispose of the further procedure in the case?—Yes, I am aware there is. But I think they still continue the principle of requiring the parties to propose their own issues.

13,057. As part of their pleadings?—At that stage.

13,058. Mr. Campbell.—And the parties don't meet the Lord Ordinary until a written defence has been lodged in court?—I think, generally speaking, a written defence—at all events in cases of the nature of Chancery cases—would be necessary, and an assistance.

13,059. The Chairman.—Do you think the form introduced in the Sheriff Courts in Scotland to which Mr. Campbell has referred would be suitable to Chancery cases,—of the defender appearing by his counsel or his procurator, and stating the defence verbally, and having it minuted by the judge?—That could be worked certainly; but I think there would frequently be an advantage in having a written statement.

13,060. Mr. Campbell.—But, practically, the system is an alternative one. The parties appear before the judge; and the defender's procurator or counsel having stated in an intelligible form the general nature of the defence, the judge then considers whether in his opinion it is a case which requires a more detailed statement, and a statement necessitating a rejoinder, for the proper preparation of the cause; or whether he thinks it such a case that he may either adopt the written note of the defender's pleas, or write out one himself on the spot?—Probably it would be advisable that there should be very great power given to the judge, whenever you give him a universal jurisdiction, to adopt the procedure applicable to cases of a different character, some of which are simple, and some complex.

13,061. The Chairman.—Would you be inclined to recommend the adoption of that Sheriff Court system in the preparation of pleadings before the Lord Ordinary in the Court of Session?—I think it is a system that could be worked with advantage, including the option.

13,062. Lord Barcaple.—Have you any personal experience of the working of it?—No, I have not. It seems to me, from the records that occasionally come before me, as well as from the nature of cases that I see in England, that in the majority of them the judge could by a few questions, in a very short space of time, ascertain the leading points in dispute; and though it would certainly impose more labour upon the judge in the early stages, yet I think it would save trouble ultimately; and of course if it made the judge's labour heavier, there would simply be a necessity of appointing more judges. It might, nevertheless, be a great economy to the public.

13,063. Does it strike you that it is a duty that could be safely left to the judge, who does not know the case of the parties, while they may be supposed to know it themselves?—I would not give the judge the power of superseding the parties, but only of ascertaining from the parties, who would be represented in important cases by lawyers, what are the vital facts of the case.

13,064. Would not that come to be pretty much of a discussion by counsel before the judge, and double argument very much?—I scarcely think in most cases that it would. It would be the ascertaining by the judge of what were the allegations—not involving an argument by counsel on their pertinency or truth.

13,065. In a case involving considerable nicety, must not the counsel, before they could be safely entrusted to deal with a judge who knows nothing about the matter, in so limiting the cause, have prepared themselves very thoroughly upon it?—Certainly the counsel ought to be well acquainted with the case.

13,066. At that stage?—Undoubtedly.

13,067. Mr. Gordon.—It involves the relevancy and the materiality of the allegations; and that is a delicate matter for the judge to handle at an early stage, till the story has been told?—But I propose that the whole story should really be before him at the early stage.

13,068. Lord Barcaple.—Not in writing?—Yes, in writing—in the statement of the plaintiff, and, if necessary, of the defender.

13,069. But it is not at all an uncommon thing to have an exceedingly short condescendence, with great propriety; and with equal propriety, a statement of facts for the defender of very considerable length,—the defender relying upon a number of facts, often of great complexity, the pursuer's case being one that admits of being stated in a single sentence?—I was asked if I would approve of the general adoption of the Sheriff Court practice in Scotland, but I had not previously been speaking of that as recommending it myself. I think the Sheriff Court practice could be worked; but the process I was speaking of myself was rather the Chancery practice in the County Courts here, which gives the defendant always the option of giving a written statement if he chooses, and in fact rather invites him to do so.

13,070. Mr. Gordon.—Have you any acquaintance with common law pleadings?—Very little. I went on circuit for a few years after I was called, but I have been long out of practice in that branch of the profession.

13,071. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion to offer?—No, I think not. I don't think the Chancery practice in this country, as to pleadings or evidence, offers anything further which you could borrow with advantage. The whole system of evidence is as bad as possible in Chancery.

WEDNESDAY, 5th MAY 1869.

Members Present:—

Lord Colonsay.
Mr. Justice Willes.
Lord Barcaple.
Edward Gordon, Esq., Q.C.
Sir Edward Colebrooke.
James Campbell, Esq.
James Adam, Esq.
A. Orr Ewing, Esq.
John B. Baxter, Esq.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

John D. Bell, Esq., examined.

13,072. The Chairman.—You were formerly a member of the English bar?—Yes; I am so still.

13,073. I understand you have had some experience of the working of the code in India?—Yes. I have practised in India for some years.

13,074. At what time?—From the commencement of 1849 till the end of 1863 continuously; and since then I have been out three times, practising for a few months on each occasion.

13,075. Can you explain to us, within reasonable compass, the general character of the system—the mode in which parties are brought into court, and the procedure in court?—Previous to July 1862 the practice in her Majesty's courts in India was exactly the same, with some improvements, as the common law and Chancery Courts practice in this country. In July 1862, when the amalgamation of the courts took place, the practice as introduced by Act 8 of 1859—the Civil Procedure Code—was introduced into the amalgamated courts. It had previously been in operation in the Country Courts. That amalgamation abolished all distinction between courts of law and courts of equity. The same judge in the same suit could administer law according to the principles of common law, or according to the principles of equity. Previous to that they had to apply, to stay by injunction the proceedings before a judge, to the same judge sitting as it were in another court. The effect of this has been to simplify matters exceedingly, and to do justice between the parties at much less expense. The suit is commenced by a plaint; which is a very short statement, showing on the face of it the grounds on which the man seeks for particular relief. That plaint must show that it is brought within the time allowed by the law of limitation, and it must show a distinct legal or equitable cause of action on the face of it. If the judge is satisfied as to the sufficiency of the plaint, the writ of summons issues, directed to the defendant.

13,076. Lord Barcaple.—Then the plaint is laid before the judge before the litigation commences?—Yes; the plaint is presented to the judge, and the judge may either reject it or accept it.

13,077. Is he attended by a solicitor or by counsel on the part of the plaintiff when considering that?—By a solicitor or counsel in the High Court, or by what is called a vakeel in the Country Courts.

13,078. Probably it may be sufficient to confine your observations to the High Court?—Yes. There the work is done by attorneys and barristers in the same way as in this country.

13,079. The judge disposes of it on hearing the plaintiff's counsel or attorney?—Yes. He says, 'I have to present a plaint,' stating what it is, and handing it to the judge, who casts his eye over it, and if he sees it is sufficient in law, he says, 'Let this be filed.' That plaint has to be verified by the party, or by an authorized agent. He has to verify the facts according to the best of his knowledge and belief. Every proceeding in the nature of a pleading has to be verified in the same way.

13,080. The Chairman.—By affidavit?—It is what is called a verification: 'I, the above plaintiff, say that the facts in the above plaint are true to the best of my knowledge and belief.' There is a punishment for a false verification provided by the Act. The summons is served personally, or, by leave of the court, substitution of service is granted. The summons charges the defendant to appear on a certain day, either personally or by agent, and to bring with him all papers and documents that may relate to the subject-matter of the suit. The judge, at the time that he issues the summons, also directs whether the case is to come on for final disposal in the first instance, or for settlement of issues, and whether written statements are to be filed by the parties. If the case comes on for final disposal, on the day appointed for the appearance of the defendant, he must enter an appearance, and the case is put down in a list, and taken at as early an opportunity as possible. When the case is called on for hearing, the plaintiff's counsel states his case and calls his witnesses, and the defendant's counsel states his case and calls his witnesses, just in the same way as in a trial in this country. The judge may see at the hearing that there are disputes in law as well as disputes in fact between the parties. If he sees that there are disputes in law, he may direct the legal argument to take place before they go to the expense of calling witnesses. John D. Bell.

13,081. Lord Barcaple.—At what stage is it that you say he may see that?—When the parties first appear before him.

13,082. Both parties?—Yes. It is a very uncommon thing for a suit to come on without written statements. It is only suits of the most simple nature that come on without written statements, and it is more satisfactory to have written statements. If written statements are directed, the plaintiff prepares his statement of all the facts upon which he intends to rely in the suit. In fact, he gives what would be an exceedingly well-drawn bill in Chancery, without of course the charging parts, and those repetitions that we had in the old bills in Chancery, but an elegant and concise and proper statement of all his facts. The defendant prepares his statement of facts in the same way. The plaintiff does not see the defendant's statement, and the defendant does not see the plaintiff's statement, till both are filed; then they are entitled to take copies; the object of that being to prevent anything like making up a case to meet the other case. That is more necessary in a country like India than it would be in this country. Upon the written statements being filed, the case comes on for settlement of issues in the first instance. In the High Court it is almost invariable, that the parties agree upon the issues in law and the issues in fact arising between them before they come into court; but if they do not agree, the judge hears what disputes there are between them, and he has the power of examining the parties to supplement any defects there may be in the statements, and to ascertain completely what the points at issue between the parties are. Then, if it appears that there are issues in law, it saves expense if they are determined like demurrers in this country. If there are issues in fact, they are tried by witnesses; which witnesses are examined in presence of the judge viva voce. The judgment is then given, and it must be in writing; and a decree is drawn up in terms of the judgment. I would draw your Lordship's attention to one great defect in this procedure,—the absence of any power to examine the defendant on interrogatories previous to the case coming on. Up to the time of the case coming on for hearing, there is no opportunity of scraping the conscience, if I may use the expression, of the different parties; and in a case where there is a breach of trust involved, and where the facts are within the knowledge of the opposite party alone, it is almost impossible to get satisfactory relief. Knowing, as I do, the Chancery practice here very well, I think there is nothing so satisfactory, in cases which form the subject of equity proceedings, as having a power of examining on interrogatories previous to the hearing of a suit; and I have seen in common law practice here several cases in which that has been most beneficial, although in the common law courts here they don't give you so much power of examining on interrogatories as you have on a bill in Chancery. It is a most beneficial power; but it is not given in India. The case having been determined say for the plaintiff, application is then made for execution of the decree. He may apply either for attachment of property belonging to the defendant, or he may apply for the personal arrest of the defendant. If he applies for the attachment of property, he states the date of his decree, the effect of it, and sets out a schedule of property which he believes to be the property of the defendant, and which he seeks to attach. It is unnecessary to go into particulars as to the modes of attaching different sorts of property; but upon the attachment being effected, if the property does not really belong to the defendant, any person who has a claim to it comes in, states his claim to the court, and the court, if it sees that it is a perfectly clear case, may decide then and there whether the property is to be released: if there is any difficulty about it, it can dismiss the claim, and leave the parties to a separate suit to ascertain who is entitled. If the defendant is arrested, the first thing to be done is to bring him before the court. He is not allowed to be taken to a sponging-house; he must be brought straight before the court. The court then asks if there is any ground why he should not be committed to prison. If he shows that he has acted honestly, and that he has actually no property; or if he shows that all the property which he has he is perfectly willing to give up, —the court will call upon the plaintiff to show cause why he should not be released upon giving up all that property. If the plaintiff does not satisfy the court that it is a case calling for the putting in force the penal clauses of the Act, he is discharged, and he gives up all his property. If, however, he does not give up all his property, but has to go to prison, the plaintiff must pay into the jailer's hands a certain sum for the maintenance of the prisoner so long as he is in custody. The sums so paid for the maintenance of the prisoner are added to the amount of the decree; but he cannot be detained in prison for these extra sums. If, after he has been committed to jail, he wishes to give up all his property, he comes before the court and expresses a wish to do so; and the same thing takes place as if he had made that application in the first instance. If he gets released from custody on so giving up his property, he cannot be arrested again, but his subsequent property is liable for the debts, so that it is not like a discharge under the Insolvent Acts. If, however, he does not make any application for release, the extent of imprisonment that can be inflicted under the Act is two years. Although the Act does not provide for it, there is a practice in the High Court the same as exists in the courts at home, of applying on affidavit for particular relief pending the suit. Under the Act, a receiver may be granted pending the suit; but it does not provide for the mode in which it is to be done. Our court adopts the old English practice of making the application on affidavit. These are matters of detail that it is unnecessary to go into. If the party is dissatisfied with the decree, he can either apply for a review of judgment,—which application he must make within a fixed time,—or he may appeal to the court sitting in its appellate jurisdiction. When the appeal comes on,—for it is a matter of right to have the appeal, not a matter of discretion,—it is heard by a larger number of judges than sat on the first hearing. The usual practice is only to have one judge sitting on the first hearing, and to have an appeal to two. With great submission, I think that where one judge is sitting both as a judge of law and fact, the decision is not so satisfactory as our old tribunal which we had in the Supreme Court,—three judges sitting as judges both of law and fact. Then there was no appeal to the same court sitting in its appellate jurisdiction; that court was locally final. If there was an appeal at all, it was only, in cases of a certain amount, to the Privy Council direct. I know that my feelings on that subject are agreed in by most of the practitioners. When we had a bench consisting of Sir Lawrence Peel, Sir James Colvile, and Sir Arthur Buller, and subsequently of Sir James Colvile, Sir C. Jackson, and Sir Arthur Buller, and their successors, the decisions gave great satisfaction; because you had, as it were, a jury of educated men of differently constituted minds,—one perhaps with strong feelings and views in one way, either religious or otherwise, and one with feelings in another direction,—and they counterbalanced each other, and made a most satisfactory tribunal. As it is, with one judge sitting on the law and fact, with an appeal from his decision, the judges will, in nine cases out of ten, take the facts from his decision; and if he has gone wrong on a point of fact, it is exceedingly difficult to show the judges above that he is wrong, because they always say he has seen the witnesses, and that he is the best and most competent judge.

John D. Bell.

13,083. What record have they of the evidence?—The evidence is written down by the deputy registrar, and each witness must sign his deposition. Cases are disposed of exceedingly quickly in that way, on viva voce evidence. No evidence is taken except in the presence of the judge, unless under a particular commission directed to some officer of the court, or to some person specially appointed, and the evidence is all taken down in writing.

13,084. But that is an exceptional case?—It is. It is only where native ladies or sick people wish to be examined, or where the parties are at a little distance from town, and it is inconvenient for them to come.

13,085. Mr. Campbell.—Is the note of evidence preserved by the registrar dictated to him by the judge?—No; it is taken down as the witness says it. It ought to be in fact a shorthand writer's note; but there are two objections to that: one is that we have not got shorthand writers; and the other is that the judge could not look over his shoulder and check him if he has made a mistake. The judge does not know what is being taken down in shorthand. The judge superintends the registrar.

13,086. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—Has the procedure which you have described given satisfaction?—Very great satisfaction.

13,087. The Chairman.—Is the evidence taken down, question and answer?—No.

13,088. It is taken in the narrative form?—Yes.

13,089. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—Is it attended with much reduction in the costs of the suit?—With reference to equity suits, there is a very great difference; but I am not prepared to say what the difference is. It is very much more speedy; but there are so many suits, that at present there is a great accumulation of business.

13,090. The statements delivered in are a simple recital of the facts on which the suit depends?—Yes; and drawn in as nice a legal form as possible.

13,091. No prolixity is allowed?—None is allowed. But in our courts it is left very much to the discretion of the counsel who draw them, and they never abuse it. In the Country Courts, where there are untrained lawyers, they enter into long statements.

13,092. And arguments?—Yes; but that can be struck out if the judge chooses.

13,093. The Chairman.—You mentioned that, when the parties appear before the judge, he sifts the case to see what issues arise in law and in fact?—Yes.

13,094. Is there any note or record made at that time of the issues so arising?—There is. They are drawn out as one of the proceedings in the cause.

13,095. By the judge?—By the judge. He says, 'I find that the following issues are the issues in this case, and I appoint such and such a day for the hearing of them.'

13,096. And he separates the issues of law and the issues in fact?—He does. The Act does not state that it is necessary to do so, but it is done in practice; and a finding must be made upon each issue. There is a case, I believe, in the Privy Council, in which the advisability of always finding on each particular issue was pointed out.

13,097. Is it always, or generally, the same judge who has framed the issues that tries the cause?—No, not necessarily.

13,098. But the judge who does try the case limits the trial to the issues that have been so prepared?—Yes; but if in the course of the case it appears that some other issue arises, he has the power of adding another issue.

13,099. Lord Barcaple.—If the issue appears to be an issue of pure law, does he record that in the same way?—Yes.

13,100. And if he finds both issues in fact and law, he records both?—Yes; he records them—issues in law, 1, 2, 3; issues in fact, 1, 2, 3.

13,101. Mr. Campbell.—And where the issues in law afford sufficient grounds for the decision of the case, these are disposed of by the court before the question of fact is entertained?—Yes, in the same way as a general demurrer would be argued here before the case is set down for trial by a jury.

13,102. Lord Barcaple.—Is there a large number of cases so disposed of on questions of law without going into the evidence?—No, I should say a very small number; because the parties never can agree upon their facts. The practice does not apply to ecclesiastical and Admiralty and matrimonial proceedings. The ecclesiastical and Admiralty proceedings are the same as in England up to a certain stage, and then the Act comes into operation. The Vice-Admiralty proceedings are exactly according to the rules under the Vice-Admiralty Commissions; but I don't know whether it is necessary to go into that. With reference to criminal proceedings, all cases tried in the High Courts are tried exactly in the same way as in this country, with a judge and jury. There is an appeal in criminal matters, upon the Advocate-General giving his fiat that there is a proper cause for appeal.

13,103. The Chairman.—Is it a jury of 12?—Yes. In the Mofussil, that is to say, in the interior of India, the criminal procedure is under a specific code. I may state what the codes of India now are. There is, first, the Civil Procedure Code, which applies to all the courts in India; there is the Penal Code, which is a law stating what are offences, and what the punishments are,—that applies to all courts in India; there is the Criminal Procedure Code, which applies only to the Country Courts, and not to the courts within Calcutta.

13,104. Are these codes embodied in statutes?—In Acts of the local legislature, not in imperial statutes. There is also the Code of the Law of Succession, which was drawn in consequence of recommendations from home.

13,105. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that, in the class of cases that come before the Supreme Court, the provision requiring parties to appear in the first instance before the judge, before giving in written pleadings, is satisfactory?—They appear in theory, by entering appearance; but if the issues are to be fixed, and they appear before the judge, I think it is very satisfactory.

13,106. I understood you to say that in all cases, before written pleadings were given in, the parties appeared before the judge, and the judge then determined whether written pleadings should be given in or no?—No; I have not made myself understood. When written pleadings are to be given in, the judge says in his summons that written statements are to be put in; and suppose an appearance is entered by the defendant in the office, written statements are then put in, and the parties appear before the judge to fix the issues.

13,107. I thought it was after seeing the parties that the written pleadings were ordered by the judge?—No, not necessarily. The summons generally says written statements are required. If there are no written statements required, the parties appear before the judge, issues are settled, and the case is disposed of finally.

13,108. Mr. Gordon.—What generally determines the judge in saying that no written statements are required?—When it is an action evidently of the most simple nature, from the plaint; such as on a promissory note, or for goods sold on any particular occasion.

13,109. Mr. Campbell.—After the parties are before the judge, if it appears that there is more complexity in the case than was originally anticipated, is it still in his power to order written pleadings?—Yes; and he very often does so.

13,110. Mr. Adam.—Is there any limit as to the amount for which an action can be brought in the High Court?—No; in the High Court it can be brought for any amount.

13,111. Lord Barcaple.—But is there any sum so low that the action cannot be brought in that court?—If parties bring a suit in the High Court that can be determined by the Court of Small Causes, they do so at the peril of costs.

13,112. Mr. Gordon.—What is the limit of the jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes?—I think it is £100 now. It is either £50 or £100. The jurisdiction has been increased lately; and it is for the Legislature to consider whether it is not advisable to make the judicial staff stronger, if the amount is increased.

13,113. The Chairman.—How are parties forced on, if either of them is hanging back and not pressing his suit? Suppose a defendant wishes to delay, what can the plaintiff do to force him on?—A certain day is appointed; and unless the defendant shows the court good ground for delay in an affidavit, he does not get delay.

13,114. If the plaintiff is not pressing on, has the defendant a mode of forcing on the suit?—The case comes on upon a certain day; if the defendant appears, and the plaintiff does not appear, the case will be dismissed.

13,115. Suppose both parties choose to allow the case to lie over, does the court take cognisance of it?—The court always insists on its consent being got to an arrangement of that sort. There must be an application on consent made to the court, and it must be approved of by the court.

13,116. If no such application is made, the court will dismiss the cause on the day on which it should have been heard?—Yes; it appears on the board; and if no one appears, it is struck out.

13,117. What is the effect of that?—The case is dismissed absolutely, and the plaintiff cannot bring another action. I think it is a defect in the Act that the plaintiff cannot withdraw from the suit before judgment without the consent of the court. I think that is a defect, for this reason. Very often, in consequence of mismanagement of a plaintiff's case, either from ignorance or carelessness on the part of his agent, he sees he is not in a position to go safely to trial. In England he would have power to be non-suited any time before judgment. That is taken away by this Act, and the party cannot retire from the case. Unless he gets the consent of the court to withdraw his case, with leave to bring another one specially given, his ceasing to go on absolutely debars him from any further proceeding. I have seen several cases in which that was very hard on the parties.

13,118. You think that is an imperfection?—I think it is; because it depends very often on an erroneous impression on the judge's mind as to the plaintiff's case being a fair one, when he has not the whole facts before him, so as to form a proper judicial opinion.

13,119. Lord Barcaple.—I suppose, to a large extent, the litigants in the Supreme Court are natives?—Yes; but there are a great many European litigants. There is a very large mercantile business.

13,120. Mr. Campbell.—In the practice of these courts, do the judges devolve any portion of their judicial duties or functions in ascertaining facts, or disposing of the simpler points of the law, on Masters or chief clerks?—No; and I think that is a defect. If an account has to be taken in the suit, the judge is supposed to take it himself; and inasmuch as the judges have just as much as they can get through, people find that their accounts are never taken properly. Formerly they used to have a Master to take them; but in consequence of great delays in the Master's office, he was abolished, and the judges thought they would take the duties themselves. My own experience teaches me that it would be a great improvement to have a body of regular accountants attached to the court for the purpose of taking the accounts, as is the case, I believe, in Scotland. I know that there has been immense complaint of the utter inability to get a case properly carried through in India, where there is a reference to take an account. The court has the power to refer to a party to investigate accounts; but that is seldom or never done in our court, because the judge always takes it upon himself.

John D. Bell.

13,121. Mr. Adam.—Is the court at Calcutta supreme over all India?—The appellate jurisdiction is supreme over the whole Presidency of Bengal and particular provinces annexed to it.

13,122. But not Bombay?—No. There is a High Court in each Presidency. There is also a High Court at Agra, and a Chief in the Punjaub.

13,123. Are the proceedings the same in all these Supreme Courts?—I believe so, so far as Madras and Bombay are concerned. The charters are all exactly the same, I think, except that Agra has not the same original jurisdiction.

13,124. Mr. Campbell.—Then there are five Supreme Courts?—Four High Courts established by royal charter; and there is a court in the Punjaub established by local Act, which is very much the same as the High Court at Agra in principle.

13,125. And an appeal lies from the High Court in the Punjaub direct to the Privy Council?—Precisely.

13,126. Mr. Gordon.—Can you give us an instance of a judge separating an issue of fact and an issue of law from the statements of the parties?—If a plaint stated that the plaintiff claimed a certain sum of money as due from the defendant, on the ground of the defendant having verbally agreed to pay the debt of a third person, the issue in law would be whether such agreement was good unless it was in writing.

13,127. The Chairman.—Would there be any issue of fact in that case?—Yes. Secondly, if it was good without writing, was it in fact made.

Richard Vigors Doyne.

RICHARD VIGORS DOYNE, examined.

13,128. The Chairman.—Your practice was chiefly in the appellate court in India?—I left India in April of last year; and for about five or six years before leaving, my practice was almost altogether confined to the appellate court. I only went specially into the original jurisdiction.

13,129. In what form do causes come into the appellate court, and from what sources?—Causes come into the appellate court on appeal from all the district or zilla courts, as they are called, and also on appeal from the decisions of the single judges (being themselves judges of the High Court), who try cases in the original jurisdiction in Calcutta. The High Court has an original civil jurisdiction, and has also an appellate jurisdiction, the Calcutta cases being disposed of usually by single judges: there may be more, but in the great number of cases they are disposed of by single judges, with a right of appeal to two or more judges of the same court, that is, the High Court.

13,130. How many judges are there in the High Court?—15. The number varies, but the Chief Justice and 14 other judges is what is contemplated by the charter. One-third of them are to be barristers, and the remainder civilians or pleaders, or members of the civil courts.

13,131. Mr. Gordon.—Members of the Scotch bar are eligible?—Yes; one-third must be members of the bar of Scotland, England, or Ireland.

13,132. But no member of the Scotch bar has ever been appointed to the bench?—We have had very few Scotch advocates there—hardly any.

13,133. Lord Barcaple.—Is there one chamber of the appeal court, or more than one?—There are several. They are called division benches. Not uncommonly there are five division benches sitting at the same time, all entertaining appeals from the various zilla or district courts outside Calcutta.

13,134. Each consisting of how many judges?—Nearly always two. It lies with the Chief Justice to distribute the benches; and in some special cases three sit, and even more than that, when it is the pleasure of the Chief Justice, according to the importance of the case; and if conflicts of decision have taken place on the same point, it lies with the Chief Justice to appoint a bench of three, five, seven, or any other number, for the purpose of quieting any such question. But the ordinary division bench that entertains appeals from the zilla judges, whether native or European, consists of two judges.

13,135. Is it a court of two that entertains appeals from the court of two in the High Court?—When two judges sit in the High Court in the original jurisdiction, which is uncommon, then a bench of three entertains the appeal from them.

13,136. The Chairman.—The evidence is taken before the one or two judges who sit in the first instance, and then there is an appeal?—Exactly; the appellate court having certain powers of taking further evidence under certain circumstances given to them by sections of the Civil Procedure Code. When they consider that the case has not been properly tried below, or that certain evidence has been omitted, or certain issues have not been raised which ought to have been raised, the appellate court have a limited power to convert themselves into a court of original jurisdiction for taking further evidence.

13,137. The evidence is taken down in writing?—It is always taken in writing by the judge who has to try the case, or under his superintendence,—in his presence.

13,138. Does he generally form one of the two or three judges who sit in appeal?—Never. Review and appeal are two wholly distinct things in India. He sits in review, but never in appeals.

13,139. Would you explain the distinction which you take between review and appeal?—The right of review is one that I apprehend is almost peculiar to the Indian courts. It was borrowed from the former procedure; and it is very distinctly expressed in the Indian Procedure Code, that any party who shall not have appealed to the next court of appeal,—that is to say, in the appellate branch of the High Court, who shall not have preferred and carried an appeal to the Privy Council from the decision of the High Court in Calcutta,—if he shall consider himself aggrieved by a judgment that has been passed, shall have a right to apply to the judge or judges who heard and delivered the judgment by which he considered himself aggrieved, to re-hear it. He may apply to them on various grounds, which are distinctly specified in the Act, such as that he has since come into the possession of evidence which he was not in possession of, and could not have arrived at at that time; or he may point out that they have fallen into some broad error in law, or that they have overlooked some very important part of the evidence. That application must always be made before the same judges, and before no others, and it is limited in the way I have spoken of,—that he must not have preferred and carried an appeal forward to the Privy Council; and it must also be done within a certain limited time. An appeal is, as matter of course, always against the judgment of a lower to a higher court; that is to say, in India it is from the judgment of the court of first instance to that which sits purely as an appellate court.

13,140. The one is the same court reviewing its own judgment, and the other is an appeal to the higher court?—Yes; it is to some extent like re-hearings in England before the courts in equity.

13,141. Mr. Campbell.—Am I right in supposing that there may be a review at two different stages; that is to say, supposing a single judge has tried a case, and given his determination, he may be asked to review his decision?—Certainly.

13,142. Or, if it has gone a stage further, and the Supreme Court sitting for the purposes of appeal has been referred to, there may be review there again?—There may be.

13,143. If that is thought preferable to going to the Privy Council?—Quite so. It is to give the court an opportunity of correcting an error, and to prevent a resort by the litigants to the Privy Council, which in India is always looked on with very considerable alarm, as they have to remove their causes across what they call the black water, entrust them to agents with whom they are not acquainted, and send their money there.

13,144. Supposing such review has taken place, is there still a right of appeal open to the Privy Council?—Certainly; and the usual practice is to file the petition of appeal to the Privy Council the day after they file the petition for review.

13,145. Then it is possible for a very obstinate litigant to have a very great multiplication of procedure. He has his case argued before the judge who originally tried it?—Yes.

13,146. He gets that judge to review the decision; then he goes to the appellate tribunal, and gets a decision there?—Yes.

13,147. Then he may have a review there?—Yes.

13,148. Are such cases known?—Yes; I have had many such cases in my own practice. I have seen a case in which even the same decision was reviewed before the High Court three times by each party,—changing the decision every time.

13,149. Don't you think that an abuse?—It is difficult to say. If there be error in the decision, it is difficult to call the rectification of an error an abuse.

13,150. Mr. Gordon.—The case you have mentioned was probably a complicated one?—There had been great conflict of opinion in the courts, and a variety of decisions; and as soon as there was a decision on one side, the party in whose favour it was, filed a petition of review to the other court, to consider its former decision. I was in the whole of these reviews myself. I lost three, and won three.

13,151. Is it within the discretion of the court to refuse a review?—It is within their discretion to refuse; and such refusal is final under the Act. The first application being nearly always ex parte, the other side is not necessarily brought before the court, or subjected to any expense; and probably 90 per cent. of reviews are refused on the first application, without bringing the opposite party before the court at all, so that the only expense incurred is by the obstinate litigant.

13,152. Is not the other party generally represented?—No. When a judgment has been passed in review, and a party being dissatisfied with it, desires an opportunity of reviewing it, he makes his first application ex parte. He has to make out a primâ facie case to the court already quite possessed of the case; they are naturally reluctant to allow a review; and unless strong ground is shown for it, they don't give notice to the other side. If they do, it is to come in on such a day and show cause why the judgment should not be reconsidered.

13,153. But, in point of fact, does not the opposite party generally watch the case?—Yes.

13,154. So that there is expense incurred?—Very little, I should say. They generally watch for the purpose of informing themselves; but even that is unnecessary, because the party has to put in a petition on stamped paper, setting out with great detail and accuracy the grounds on which he asks review, and out of that petition he is hardly ever allowed to wander. Therefore the other side are most fully apprised of the grounds on which review is applied for, by seeing the petition of review, which they can get out of the office for a rupee. In that way no very great expense is occasioned.

13,155. The Chairman.—In the pleadings given in, are the statements of fact separate from the propositions in law, upon which the party relies, or are they mixed together?—I suppose the question is put with reference to the pleadings in the inception of the cause?

13,156. Yes?—In India you can hardly apply the term pleading with any correctness to the statements that have to be made by the parties. I have no doubt the Commission has some acquaintance with the Code of Indian Civil Procedure; and the term 'pleading' is never used in it from beginning to end, the great object of that having been, as it always appeared to me, to avoid as far as possible paper warfare. The plaint, as it is called, which, no doubt, is another word for declaration, is of the most simple character.

13,157. Lord Barcaple.—Is that the very first document?—The very first. The plaintiff is obliged to come in and file, either by himself or an agent, his plaint, which he has to subscribe and verify in a manner which exposes him to prosecution if he should make any false statement. But the plaint, the form of which is prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure, is of the very simplest character. It contains merely the name of the plaintiff, and his address and description, the name and address of the defendant, with his description, for the purpose of showing that he falls within the jurisdiction of the court. Then it goes on to state the nature of the claim—payment of so many rupees due on a bond bearing date so and so, of which so much has been paid, or none has been paid at all, leaving due so much. That is the whole of the plaint, if the provisions of the Act are adhered to. On that a summons is issued to the defendant, who comes in, and he does not necessarily put in any written statement at all. He may tender one on the first hearing if he chooses; or if he does not choose to do so, and if the case is one of such complication as to require a distinct statement of the position which he desires to take up, the court may call on him to do so. He then puts in the simplest statement of his own case, free from all argument; and if he indulges in the smallest amount of argument or prolixity, the paper is liable to be rejected, and returned to him.

13,158. Does he state anything but facts? Does he state propositions in law?—According to the Act, it is contemplated that he should state nothing but simple facts. It has grown a very common practice to say at the end, 'It is submitted that the plaintiff has no claim on the facts, and having regard to the points of law, such and such are submitted;' but the code contemplates nothing but the simplest bare statement of the facts on which the defendant relies. He may say, 'I never executed such a bond, and the plaintiff's case is all moonshine and fraud;' or, 'I did execute such a bond, but I have got a set-off;' or, 'It has been discharged in such a way;' and the court draws the legal inferences. The court has this before them, the parties are present, and the judge says, 'Then I suppose the points on which you are at issue are so and so.' They say yes or no, and the issues are written down, as appears to the judge requisite and proper. After that, the plaint and the written statement are put on one side, and nothing is attended to but the issues. The Code of Civil Procedure in India states distinctly that the issues are to be drawn up without reference to the written statement, or any differences that may appear in the statements of the parties made orally from the statements in the written paper.

13,159. Mr. Baxter.—Then there may be nothing but the plaint and the issues?—There may be nothing else. The issues are everything; and none of us ever find the smallest difficulty in raising the issues, which is generally done by consent of counsel. We are supplied with the plaint, and such information as our clients give us; and very often, in the bar library, we write on our brief what we consider the issues. Very often we agree; but if not, we go into court, and the whole thing is settled, as to issues, in ten minutes.

13,160. The Chairman.—When you say the parties appear, do you mean that they must appear personally?—They must, under the Act, appear either personally or by some agent properly authorized, who himself must be aware of the circumstances of the case, or he must be attended by some person fully informed of them, and competent to answer any questions put by the court.

Richard Vigors Doyne.

13,161. Lord Barcaple.—But that knowledge may be knowledge derived from the party?—Quite so; and the fullest powers are given to the court at any time whatever, up to the latest moment, to amend the issues, or to add to the issues, and to call for further statements, or to take any step of that sort calculated to elicit the true points in contest.

13,162. Is it very common to add to the issues, or to amend them?—I think it is not uncommon to add to the issues. It is not very common, but I have seen it done. I should say it is rather exceptional than otherwise; because I have no doubt that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred there is not the least difficulty in the parties saying what is the contest between them at the first start.

13,163. About fact it may be so; but do not questions of law sometimes emerge in the course of the argument that have not been foreseen by the parties?—I have very seldom seen that. When any question is suggested as a new one by either party, it is open for him to say, 'This comes on me by surprise, and I wish for a postponement of the case that I may look into the authorities,' if it be a question of law, or 'to seek for further evidence,' if it is a question of fact; and the court, if satisfied that the application is reasonable, give a week or a fortnight; and they will sometimes even grant commissions if they see that there has been an oversight, the great object of the court being to do broad, substantial justice between the parties, and to avoid paper warfare. The Act was introduced into India under rather unfavourable circumstances. We were all very angry, and disposed to look as unfavourably as possible on it. It was imposed upon the court without consulting even the judges; and the imposition, as I call it—not in an offensive sense, because it has turned out very well—was accompanied with a measure which was about the most unpopular that ever occurred in India, the abolition of the Supreme Court. It was abolished in 1862 by letters-patent; and by the same letters-patent the Act of 1859, or the Code of Civil Procedure, was made the code of procedure for the new court, which swallowed up the Zillah and the Supreme Court. The old Supreme Court was probably the most respected institution in India, and had been always looked on as the very palladium of European rights. It was matter of surprise that it was swept away, and we looked upon it as a degradation being doubled up with the Zillah Court. We had the greatest veneration for the mode of pleading—though my feeling since has been one of wonder that it existed so long—and yet within twelve months not a voice in the country was raised against the new system.

13,164. Mr. Baxter.—What system of pleading had you before that?—We had the pure English system of pleading.

13,165. Mr. Gordon.—Common law or equity?—Both.

13,166. Mr. Baxter.—And you find no inconvenience, but the reverse, from the system being done away with?—Speaking for myself, I think it has been the removal of a great scandal.

13,167. Mr. Campbell.—When a single judge of the High Court has pronounced his decision in a case, there is an appeal within the court?—Yes.

13,168. How many judges does the appellate tribunal generally consist of?—Generally two.

13,169. Assuming that these two are divided in opinion, what is the result?—The charter provides for that; and there has been a great conflict of opinion in the courts as to the construction of it. Formerly the first rule was, that where it was upon a question of fact, and the judges differed, one agreeing with the court below, the judgment remained undisturbed; where it was upon a question of law, the case was referred to another judge: a third judge was called in.

13,170. And he was made a sort of oversman?—He was made a sort of umpire.

13,171. Mr. Baxter.—Does it often happen that the two judges differ?—It is not infrequent; but I would not say it is frequent. I have been in very many cases myself in the course of a large practice in which that did occur; but probably it is a very moderate percentage.

13,172. Mr. Campbell.—In a very great majority of instances any two competent, educated judges will generally concur in matters of fact?—I think so. Such is my experience generally.

13,173. Mr. Gordon.—Is it the case, that before any cause is put down for proof or for debate, the judges or the judge who presides selects certain issues of fact and law?—Yes.

13,174. He prepares them?—Yes.

13,175. He eliminates the points of law as well as of fact in regard to which parties differ?—Exactly.

13,176. As suggested by the statement laid before him?—Exactly. He may do it from seeing what the contest as to facts is, because very often a legal issue will arise out of the issue as to fact.

13,177. The Chairman.—Then you think the present system is a satisfactory one?—Yes, as far as general principles go. I would by no means advocate the adoption of the Indian civil code literatim, because there are a great many defects in it, but it is an enormous improvement in what I had been accustomed to see before. I may add that I concur with Mr. Bell's evidence as to the deficiency in the machinery of the court for settling matters of accounts.

JOHN HOLLAMS, Esq., examined.

13,178. The Chairman.—Your experience has been connected with the common law courts?—Yes, but not exclusively.

13,179. It has also been in the equity courts?—Yes.

13,180. As a practitioner before these courts?—Yes.

13,181. A solicitor?—Yes.

13,182. You are one of the Judicature Commissioners?—Yes.

13,183. The report of that Commission seems to point at an obliteration to a considerable extent of the distinction between courts of law and courts of equity?—Yes, so far as procedure is concerned.

13,184. The separation as to procedure had been found inconvenient I suppose?—Yes, I think so. When I say it points to that so far as procedure is concerned, I apprehend the rest will follow. The real impediment is, I think, procedure.

13,185. It is put in a course to arrive at a complete amalgamation?—The great disadvantage of the system hitherto in this country has been, I think, the different procedure. Things are called by different names; the procedure differs from the very commencement in every stage, and consequently there is great difficulty in connecting and blending the two systems together. The Legislature has attempted to do it; but in consequence of the wholly different mode of procedure in the respective courts, and the great division between the practitioners, the bar practising in the two courts being quite distinct, and the judges being taken exclusively from their own branch, in general they really do not understand the procedure and the technical terms and language which are used in the other branch. One object, I think, of the Judicature Commission was, by establishing a simple mode of procedure, to remove that difficulty, because I need hardly say that the principles of law in the main on which the courts act are precisely the same, and when once you have removed the impediment caused by the distinction in the procedure, there is really no difficulty blending the two jurisdictions together.

13,186. The mode of taking evidence is different in the two systems?—Yes, it is now. At common law, the evidence is always oral before the court and jury; in Chancery, at present, it is absurdly intricate; sometimes it is taken in one way and sometimes in another, but, as a rule, it is documentary evidence. The witnesses are sometimes examined before the judge who hears the cause, and the judge generally decides without a jury, although not necessarily.

13,187. The evidence is taken by a person appointed for the purpose of receiving the evidence of witnesses?—In Chancery the evidence is frequently taken by affidavit in the first instance, subject to cross-examination by the opposite party; sometimes the witness is examined in chief upon deposition, and his evidence is taken down, not by way of question and answer, but in the form of a narrative, and is subject to cross-examination in like manner. The cross-examination under certain circumstances takes place in court before the judge; under other circumstances it takes place before the examiner, and the judge has not the opportunity of seeing the witness, or judging of his demeanour, or knowing the exact language which he uses. He only gets the effect of it. That, in my experience, produces much inconvenience. Amongst others, the witness may refuse to answer a question, and the remedy is only a special application to the judge to commit him to prison for contempt for refusing to answer, and the proceedings break off till that preliminary matter has been decided. That I think adds very seriously to the expense of the litigation.

13,188. Mr. Campbell.—And to the delay?—And to the delay.

13,189. The Chairman.—There is a power, is there not, of taking evidence before the judge, even in the equity courts?—Yes; but it is not ordinarily exercised.

13,190. Lord Barcaple.—Do you know from what cause it has arisen, that that has been so little used?—I think it arises, in great measure, from the cause I referred to just now, that the judges are taken from the equity bar. They have not been accustomed to the examination of witnesses, and they don't like it; and of course it occupies more of their time. The hearing of the particular cause in court would no doubt be prolonged, if the witnesses were always examined fully before the court. There is no doubt that a great deal of evidence is given in every cause, and necessarily so, which turns out in the end not to be material to the point really to be decided; and that evil, I think, is extremely great with the present system in equity, because there is no means of knowing at all whether it will be material or not, that is, the judge has no opportunity of stopping the evidence; whereas, when the witnesses are examined before the court which has to decide, many members of the Commission will know that it is extremely common for a judge to say, 'I don't think that point material,' and to put a stop to that head of evidence. But if you are giving evidence on a preliminary stage, any point that may be material is worked out by the witnesses.

13,191. You speak of a jury trial?—No. I am speaking of every case in which there is a contest of fact.

13,192. But were you not speaking of jury trial when you said that the judge had an opportunity of stopping the evidence?—Yes. I am speaking of jury trial, or a trial in which the judge has the witnesses before him, and is to decide the facts.

13,193. Mr. Campbell.—There are some cases where the judge himself decides the matter of fact without a jury?—Yes.

13,194. And does so on hearing the evidence of witnesses viva voce before himself?—Yes; for instance, in the Probate Court and the Divorce Court that is so. It is by no means necessary to have a jury. Disputed questions of fact—for instance, whether a will was obtained by undue influence and fraud—are very often brought before the judge without any jury at all.

13,195. Lord Barcaple.—Where there is a review on the evidence from the judge's decision, is there not a difficulty in his stopping the course of examination?—I think not. The judge acts on his own responsibility.

13,196. You think the parties acquiesce pretty readily in a suggestion from the bench, although there is a review?—Yes, I think so.

13,197. Mr. Gordon.—The judge will probably not interfere, unless it is a pretty clear point?—Of course judges vary very much in that matter.

13,198. Mr. Campbell.—What is the relative proportion of cases tried by the judge alone, and cases tried by the judge with the assistance of a jury, in the Court of Chancery?—In the Court of Chancery a jury is quite exceptional; perhaps, numerically, one in a thousand.

13,199. There is a certain class of cases, where the witnesses are brought before the Vice-Chancellor, and examined viva voce?—Yes.

13,200. And these cases are occasionally decided by him without the assistance of a jury. There is another class of cases, where he does take the assistance of a jury?—Yes.

13,201. What proportion does the one class of cases bear to another?—There is a third class in which the witnesses are cross-examined before the judge. They make affidavits, or are examined first before the examiner, and are liable to be cross-examined before the court. Probably they are the most numerous; the others are not frequent.

13,202. Neither of the others are frequent?—Neither frequent.

13,203. Mr. Gordon.—Then the great mass of cases in the Court of Chancery is disposed of on evidence obtained by affidavit?—Yes; or deposition.

13,204. How do you think that system of giving evidence by means of affidavit works?—Where it is upon a disputed question of fact, I think very badly. Words are put into the mouth of the witness, which are not his own words, and an unscrupulous witness, or a weak witness, is induced to use language which is not natural to him, and which he would not himself have used, if he had attempted to describe what passed. Where the evidence is formal, I think there is great advantage in having evidence by affidavit, because it seems to me absurd to bring a witness 200 or 300 miles to prove a fact which is not in dispute; and I think such evidence may well be given by affidavit, as is recommended by the Judicature Commission.

13,205. Is there any way by which a judge could give directions as to what portions of a case might be tried by affidavit, and what portions by oral testimony?—Yes. I think you will find there is a recommendation to that effect in the report of the Judicature Commission as to the desirability of allowing documentary evidence to be given, where it would obviously save expense, and where it is not on direct questions of conflict between the witnesses.

13,206. Lord Barcaple.—There seems to be a marked difference between the equity and common law courts in this respect—that in the equity courts every matter goes in the first instance before a single judge, from whom there is a review; while in the common law courts, if there is any matter that can be disposed of without a jury, it goes at once to the full court?—Yes; but it is material to be borne in mind, that in a large proportion of the cases in the court of equity there is no real conflict as to the facts. Therefore when one speaks of the mode in which witnesses are examined in Chancery, it must be borne in mind that in a great many cases in equity there is no real conflict as to facts. That is so, to a considerable extent, in the courts of common law. A great many cases are now decided in the courts of common law on a special case stated between the parties, who agree on the facts, and submit a written statement to the court, and ask the judges to decide who is in the right. The old system in the courts of common law was that every question went first before a jury. The court sitting in banc is not in theory a court of first instance; it is in the nature of a court of appeal, in one sense, from the judge and jury. It certainly has grown to be a court of first instance, because many cases of great importance are now decided primarily by the court upon special case, or upon demurrer arising upon the pleadings, and questions of law are now never in our courts argued at any length at nisi prius; they are reserved for argument before the full court, and that has therefore become to great extent a court of first instance.

13,207. There don't appear to be any suggestion of doing away with the double judgment in the Court of Chancery,—the judgment, first of all, of a single judge, and then a review from him; and it seems to be thought right still to keep up that distinction between the two sets of courts?—The report of the Judicature Commission proposes that the appeal from the single judge in Chancery shall no longer be to a single judge, but shall be to the court of appeal, which is to be the court of appeal for both common law and equity.

John Hollams.

13,208. But will it be the same court of appeal to which there will be an appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench and the Common Pleas?—Yes.

13,209. The Chairman.—I rather think it is proposed that, in regard to the mode of ascertaining the facts of a case, the judge, whether he be an equity judge or a common law judge, shall himself determine the course of investigation, and not the parties; that is to say, whether by examining witnesses before the judge, or by trial by jury, or by procuring evidence taken in some other way?—No. The report of the Judicature Commission suggests that the plaintiff may propose his own mode of trial, subject to change upon the application of his opponent.

13,210. Mr. Gordon.—Leaving it therefore in the ultimate discretion of the judge?—Yes, if the parties differ; but if they do not differ, the judge would not interfere.

13,211. Is it your own individual opinion that there is an advantage in having the judgment of a single judge, on the first disposal of the case, subject to review?—I think so. For instance, in the court of equity, supposing the recommendations of the Judicature Commission were to be adopted, it would not do to do away with the Vice-Chancellor, and let the appellate court be the court of first instance. In the first place, it would be very extravagant as regards time and other considerations. There is a great deal of the business, when it comes to be sifted, as to which there is no real doubt what the decision must be. The point is hardly arguable, and if argued, the litigant himself or his advisers are quite convinced that he was in the wrong, and there is no ground for an appeal. It would be very extravagant, I think, to send all the business in the first instance to the court of appeal. Then, again, I think that cases are of necessity and naturally better argued upon appeal than they are in the first instance. They have been ventilated; all parties know where the shoe pinches, and they apply themselves to that. The question of how many appeals there should be is a much more difficult one; but that there should be at least one appeal, I don't entertain any doubt—at all events in all cases of that description.

13,212. Lord Barcaple.—Would you apply the same principle to cases that are at present in the courts of common law where they don't require the intervention of a jury?—Yes, because I apprehend it would be the same kind of case. Of course there can be no appeal for any practical purpose, if it is a mere question of whether A swears right or B swears right. The credit to be given to a particular witness you cannot usefully appeal in such cases as those.

13,213. Mr. Campbell.—I understand it is contemplated that, in the event of cases being tried by a judge without the intervention of a jury, the decision of that single judge shall have the same finality with reference to the mere facts as the verdict of a jury?—Yes.

13,214. Is it your opinion that that is satisfactory?—I think you will not find many cases where there is a direct conflict of evidence tried before a single judge. Where there is a direct conflict—in other words, where it involves the credibility of a particular witness—parties will, as a rule, continue to avail themselves of a jury.

13,215. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think it is desirable that they should continue to do so? Are you favourable to that mode of trying questions where there is a proper conflict of evidence?—I think so. Where it comes to be a question of the credibility of witnesses, I would rather trust to a jury than to a single judge. There seems to me to be great advantage in doing so in these cases. You have no expression of opinion on the part of the jury till the whole thing is decided. As a rule, jurymen don't know each other beforehand; and they sit in the box and hear the case out before they form an opinion. That seems to me to be more favourable than where you have a tribunal which can express an opinion at an early stage. The plaintiff's witnesses may be extremely plausible, and it may be very difficult for any one to suggest a reason why they should not be believed, till the other side is heard. But if there has been an expression of opinion before the defendant's witnesses are heard, it is not very hopeful for them.

13,216. Mr. Campbell.—You think the judge commits himself to an opinion more easily than a jury, because he has the opportunity of speaking?—Yes; and he speaks with one mouth and one mind. The jurymen have no one mouthpiece.

13,217. Mr. Gordon.—Don't you think the plaintiff has a very great advantage before a jury, and that it is difficult to get their minds disabused of the impression produced by his evidence?—Unquestionably that is so; but I don't think that is confined to a jury. No doubt jurymen differ as much as judges; but one does not see the difference. But judges themselves will admit that they have different modes of dealing with a thing; and some judges are much more fond of expressing premature opinions than others. Some are very reserved, and hear a case out, and others very soon intimate an opinion.

13,218. The Chairman.—Even when they have a jury?—Even when they have a jury.

13,219. Mr. Gordon.—But that first impression is removeable by evidence led for the defendant?—To a certain extent it is; but the judge has great influence with the jury. He has the last word with them; and though he does not always get the verdict he wants, yet if he is determined to do so, he generally does; and if he forms a very strong opinion—say in favour of the defendant—though he may think that the first impressions in favour of the plaintiff had not been removed from the minds of the jury, yet if he is disposed to remove them, it is hard if he cannot do so.

13,220. What do you say as to cases involving fraud? Do you think that such cases are better disposed of by juries or by judges?—'Fraud' is rather a wide term; but I think fraud involving conflict of evidence is better disposed of by a jury.

13,221. I mean influence used in order to obtain the execution of a deed—that is the kind of fraud I allude to more particularly?—I don't say that I would be for sending such cases as those to a jury—a case, for instance, of a trustee and cestuique trust, cases ordinarily dealt with by the Court of Chancery. But cases of that kind vary so much that it is impossible to lay down general rules. There is frequently in these cases no real conflict as to what passed. The disposition of juries is to uphold transactions, and to look perhaps rather too much to the indirect consequences of a verdict, and to be guided by prejudices in matters of that kind.

13,222. Lord Barcaple.—The case suggested to you just now was the fraudulent obtaining of a will?—I think that is a case eminently suited for a jury. Wherever you have a conflict of evidence—the facts interspersed with the ordinary events of life—I think there is great advantage in taking twelve men indiscriminately, who are engaged in business, who have no common thoughts or knowledge of each other, and let them apply their common sense to it, and say whether the account given by the witnesses on the one side or the other is the more credible one. I think they have many advantages over a judge or individual arbitrator, because they have more general knowledge of the world.

13,223. The Chairman.—It has been suggested that there are certain classes of cases in which you may almost predict what the verdict of a jury will be—cases, for example, of master and servant: is that consistent with your experience?—I should not use such very decided language as that. There is no doubt there is a strong disposition on the part of juries to side with the weak against the strong, but I would not put it further than that—that their leaning is naturally to the weaker side. If you have an individual against a great company, the feeling of the jury is that it is a hard case on the individual, and that it won't hurt the company much. I am always assuming that the jury are satisfied that the plaintiff has got a grievance. Of course they expect him to prove that; but if a man has got his leg broken on a railway, the jury think it very hard on him, and that he ought to be paid by somebody. In collision cases, or where a man is run over in the street, the jury think he ought to be paid. They are not particular as to who ought to pay him, but they are disposed to make the defendant before them pay, if he can afford it.

13,224. Is the inclination of your opinion to send such cases before a jury?—I think it is unavoidable. I don't think you can select cases of that kind, and say that you won't trust a jury to try them.

13,225. In the Court of Chancery, if the parties are sluggish in their movements, and neither of them seems very urgent to get on with the case, does the court interpose, and compel them to get on, or are they allowed to sleep as long as they choose?—That is perhaps a little difficult to answer. The court after a fashion does urge them to go on, and in the end compels them to go on; but practically they are allowed to delay the matter almost as much as they like. The pressure put upon them is very slight indeed.

13,226. Lord Barcaple.—Do you see any mode in which practically the pressure could be made much more effective?—No. My own feeling is that it is a mistake to limit them. I think there is a great deal of litigation which ought not to be commenced, and which dies a natural death. When people cool on it, they come to their senses. I think it would be a great pity to limit the time, as has been done in some cases, for taking each particular step. If the parties choose to delay enforcing their supposed rights, let them do so; and as long as the man sued does not complain, I don't understand why the court should interfere. It is quite competent for the defendant to press his adversary on; but if he does not do so, I don't see why the plaintiff should be compelled to go on within a limited time. Of course that does not apply to cases in the Court of Chancery, where there is a trust fund, and the rights of absent parties have to be dealt with. These cases ought to be proceeded with peremptorily.

13,227. The court acting there almost administratively?—Yes, I mean cases of that kind. But in other cases I think litigants may be left to follow their own wishes.

13,228. Do you think the present mode of taking accounts in the Court of Chancery is working satisfactorily? it is done by remitting to the chief clerk, is it not?—Yes, it is done by remitting to the chief clerk. I should hardly say that it works quite satisfactorily, because I cannot think it is worked in the way that it was intended to be worked. Practically it is done by remitting the matter to the chief clerk, who again remits it to his clerk in the first instance to vouch the account. Then it comes back to the chief clerk on any queried items in the account, and may go to the Vice-Chancellor; and all that produces considerable delay, and consequently expense; delay is caused by the intervals between the appointments before one official and another.

13,229. What occurs to you as a more satisfactory mode of disposing of that business?—I think if one matter were as far as possible taken up and disposed of before another was begun, it would be much better than the system of taking up things piecemeal. They take up an account for an hour or two; then they drop it, and take it up again at the next appointment, which may be a month afterwards. That of course involves great waste of time, because there is always to a certain extent the necessity of discussing common ground over again; for you have always to explain to an official the nature of the question, and after a month he is not likely to recollect what passed on the previous occasion. If he went on with the whole account at once, it would greatly facilitate matters.

13,230. Does it occur to you that it would be an advantage to have regular accountants officers of court?—I think not. I think such duties are better done by lawyers.

13,231. Then you would still leave it in the same hands, but have some regulations by which it should go on more continuously?—I think so; and more under the personal control of the judge.

13,232. Would it really be at all within the power of the judges of Chancery, with the business that they have just now, to overtake that immediate supervision of accounts?—When I speak of accounts, I do not of course mean the details of figures—mere accountants' work; but I am rather speaking of the questions more or less of principle which may from time to time arise on the accounts. I think they may be decided promptly, and brought to the attention of the judge promptly, if the judge were more in chambers. Sometimes taking an account will be a question of whether certain repairs have been done by a trustee on the trust estate. That may merely involve vouching the accounts, and there may be no question as to the propriety of the outlay. In the next case, precisely the same in its general features, it may be suggested that the trustee was extremely extravagant, and consequently that a portion of his account ought to be disallowed. In the third case, it may be suggested that the account is altogether fraudulent; that the alleged repairs were done on the trustee's own property; and that the claim on the trust estate is a fraudulent claim. In the first of these cases it would be merely a production of vouchers to see that the items were correct; and any one may do that. In the second and third of the cases, it may involve serious conflict of evidence; and I think all that would be better gone into at once before a lawyer than before an accountant. In the first case, an accountant can do it perfectly well, I admit; but I think a lawyer can also do it. You cannot in the first instance, as an ordinary rule, be sure whether any questions of difficulty of the kind to which I have referred will arise or not.

13,233. Lord Barcaple.—These observations refer mainly to the case of trustees' accounts?—I gave the instance of trustees' accounts; but I don't think they are confined to that.

13,234. The same would apply to partnership accounts?—Precisely; or accounts for building a house or building a ship.

13,235. Suppose the case of a long series of transactions running over a number of years?—As a rule, what I refer to as questions of accounts would not be very ancient. For instance, in common law actions, it might be a contract to make a railway, or a bridge, or a public work, and there is a dispute as to extras; the contractor perhaps claims £50,000 or £100,000 for extras. Every item is disputed; and it is said, 'That matter was included in your contract;' or, 'It is only one-half what you claim that is not included in your contract.' That is matter of account; but it is dependent on the evidence of engineers and architects and builders at every stage; and it is not a matter to be disposed of by vouchers.

13,236. The Chairman.—How would it be disposed of in your courts?—Practically, it is disposed of by arbitration according to the present system. In theory it would be disposed of by trial before a jury, unless it was so purely a matter of account that it could be referred to the Master.

13,237. But practically it goes to arbitration, I suppose, because trial by jury is not a mode of decision which is considered advisable in such cases?—It would be quite impossible to try such a case before a jury. Trial by jury is not adapted to a case where there are many issues to try, or where minute detail is involved; it is only where there is some broad question that can be understood by a jury.

13,238. Mr. Gordon.—In the case of dispute as to partnership accounts, do the parties make any payment for the services of the officer of court who is employed in making up their accounts?—No, not directly; but they pay a fee upon every summons taken out, which of course comes indirectly to be much the same thing. Upon every appointment the parties are summoned to attend, and there is a fee collected by means of stamp on each of these applications.

13,239. What fee is collected for an appointment?—I think it is 5s.

13,240. Would it be 5s. for an appointment before the Master, which might be continued for three or four days?—At common law the whole thing is different. The remuneration goes to the Master nominally, but he has no interest in it; it goes to the fee fund. At common law it is 10s. an hour. In Chancery it is a mere stamp on the appointment.

John Hollams.

13,241. The Chairman.—The 10s. is paid by the parties?—Yes; now by stamp.

13,242. Between them?—No. The party setting the officer in motion pays 10s. an hour, which is a very low rate of remuneration as compared with private arbitration.

13,243. Mr. Gordon.—Is it not hard to make the country pay for the disputes of two partners?—I think, as a rule, the country does not pay. I don't know the figures exactly; but, in the main, our courts are self-supporting. Some courts show an excess, and some a deficiency; but, in the main, I think there is very little charge on the public in respect of the courts of justice. I am speaking of the civil courts.

13,244. The Chairman.—The fees collected from the suitors cover the expenses?—Yes; and I think they are adapted on the principle of doing so.

13,245. Mr. Gordon.—Does the system of common law pleading give satisfaction?—I think not. I don't think that either system gives satisfaction; and the Judicature Commission proposes some very sweeping changes. I cannot conceive anything worse than the system of common law, except the system of Chancery.

13,246. Mr. Baxter.—Will there be a uniform system now?—It is proposed so.

13,247. Mr. Gordon.—The common law pleading very often does not disclose the true points in dispute?—No; and it never discloses them with actual dates and facts. It is done almost always in figurative language. In some cases you are obliged to plead with great nicety, and the defendant is obliged to specify all his defences; whereas you may raise the same kind of question in other instances where the pleadings give no information, and you have no means of knowing what answer is to be set up. It is a matter of chance. For instance, in an action for goods sold and delivered, where the defendant denies his liability, that may involve a question of partnership; but there is no species of information given, because, if the plaintiff sues for goods sold and delivered, and the defendant says 'never indebted,' nothing can be more concise; but these pleadings give you no species of information as to the question to be tried, whether it is disputed that the man ever got the goods, or that the contract fell under the statute of frauds, or that he was not a partner.

13,248. Lord Barcaple.—What you desiderate is a plain statement by each party of the facts on which they rely?—My own opinion is, that it should be rather of the nature of a particular than a pleading. The equity pleadings profess to be a statement of facts; but they have drifted into evidence and arguments in support of the case, and they are extremely verbose and extensive, and very confusing to read. All you require, I think, is a short statement of the actual facts, that the defendant may know in respect of what transaction he is sued, and that the plaintiff may know what answer the defendant is going to set up.

13,249. Does it occur to you that there is any necessity for that being accompanied by setting forth the pleas in law on which each party relies—the real grounds of action and defence?—No, I think not. I think that will only cause expense—frequently quite unnecessarily. I think it is quite right that there should be a power for either party, in case he is in any doubt, to apply to the judge for further information. If he does not know what the case against him is, he should have the means of applying summarily to the judge for further particulars of the case, so that he may know the point of law as well as the question of fact raised against him; but I think what we know here as a particular will answer the purpose. For instance, the defendant pleads fraud to an action—he says he was induced to enter into the contract by fraud; the ordinary practice, then, is, that the plaintiff applies to the judge for an order on the defendant to give him the particulars of the fraud. Now, I think that the particulars of the fraud should be furnished in the first instance. The general plea is of no use to the plaintiff; it is the particulars only that are of use to him.

13,250. The Chairman.—I asked you about putting the parties in motion if they are disposed to linger over a case. My attention was directed accidentally to a case which was disposed of by Vice-Chancellor Malins last year,—the case of Wellesley v The Countess of Mornington,—which seems to have lasted upwards of thirty years, and to have cost an enormous sum. It is stated that the bill was filed in May 1839; and the object of the suit was to ascertain the right of the lady to an annuity of £1000 a year. It is stated that the case has been going on ever since, and that she had not received anything in the interval; and at length it was decided that she was entitled to be paid £22,000, with interest. She had been suing in forma pauperis for a great part of the time. Now that seems to be a very cruel state of matters?—But I don't think the law is responsible for that, though the fact that she was suing in forma pauperis may account for it.

13,251. Parties may be litigious, and they may be very remiss in pressing their case at the proper time?—It is quite absurd to suppose that any case could properly occupy thirty years, or anything approaching to it.

13,252. Mr. Campbell.—There are not many such cases?—I don't think there are any such cases. I don't think there is any case which could properly take that time. Of course, if parties choose to play with the thing, it is difficult to say that they may not spin it out.

13,253. The Chairman.—There is another case that lately came under my notice from knowing something of the parties—a case that had originated in 1803, and had been going on till it was compromised the other day in Chancery. It began with reference to a banking establishment, of which the Earl of Leicester was a partner. Do such cases not show that if parties are remiss in their proceedings, and are not pressing on their cases, or are exceedingly litigious, the time runs on without the court feeling it incumbent on them to interpose?—Certainly, that is so. I don't know that the court will ever interfere except in certain stages. If matters get into chambers, they do urge parties on; but if it is not before the court itself, or not in chambers, I don't think the judges have any cognisance of the case, or that there would be any interference with it. But I think the parties have themselves to blame there; it is not the system.

13,254. Lord Barcaple.—Is the course of framing a special case for the judgment of the court much adopted now?—It is; much more so than formerly.

13,255. And is coming more into use?—Yes.

13,256. Is it in favour at present?—It is open to this very serious objection, that where the parties do not agree upon the facts, it leads to very serious expense; and the practice is to refer the matter to a barrister as a private referee, to state a case for the opinion of the court.

13,257. But the parties must first adopt that course: it is exceptional and only adopted of consent?—Nominally they must consent, but practically they are forced to consent.

13,258. That is when the court sees that there is no proper dispute on the facts?—When the judge at the trial says, 'This is not a question which ought to be tried before a jury,' practically it is very difficult for the parties to avoid having it stated in the form of a special case.

13,259. Is not that course sometimes taken at the outset before the trial at all?—Oh yes; and then it works extremely well. Where the parties can agree upon the facts, I know of no better mode of raising the question.

13,260. Is it coming into favour here?—Very much; but of course it is only applicable to very simple cases, and there are many cases in which that course could not be adopted.

13,261. They may be simple cases, but raising nice enough questions of law?—Very; and questions of great pecuniary importance to the parties.

13,262. Is it contemplated that these cases shall go at once to the full court, or be heard by a single judge?—The report of the Judicature Commission leaves these cases as at present. No doubt the report is open to the charge of inconsistency in that respect, that such cases in equity would be decided before one judge, while if they come before the common law branches they would be decided by three judges. No doubt the report is open to that observation; but I may state it was felt that there was considerable difficulty in at once wholly changing the system.

13,263. And, as a general rule, are not equity cases more complicated?—It is very difficult to answer that question. I should doubt that. The real explanation, I think, is this, that the more complicated cases at common law are practically referred to private arbitration, and do not come before the courts. But if they were dealt with and tried out, I doubt very much whether the Chancery cases are more complicated. The common law courts get rid of them.

JAMES ANDERSON, Esq., Q.C., examined.

13,264. The Chairman.—You are a Scotch advocate, and you practised for some years in Scotland?—I did for ten years.

13,265. How long have you practised before the Court of Chancery?—Since 1839.

13,266. The proceedings in the Court of Chancery are brought before the Vice-Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls in the first instance?—They are the judges in the first instance.

13,267. There is then an appeal or review?—Yes; or rather a re-hearing. The Vice-Chancellor acts vice the Chancellor, and the Master of the Rolls has a co-ordinate jurisdiction, but the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices may hear causes in the first instance. The appeal is strictly a re-hearing, and it is so in effect, though it is not heard by the same judge who made the order or decree.

13,268. The usual course of proceeding is to go in the first instance before the Vice-Chancellor?—Yes. Unless a special cause is assigned, the Lord Chancellor or Lords Justices will not interfere in the first instance.

13,269. How does the Vice-Chancellor proceed in expiscating the facts of the case?—There has been a great change since I first knew the Court of Chancery. When I first practised before that court, the procedure was by bill and answer. The bill was a very technical instrument, and the answer was still more so; but the proceedings have been much simplified. The bill and answer are very much like the condescendence and statement of facts in Scotch records, dropping a great many of the technicalities.

13,270. And considerably abridged?—And considerably abridged.

13,271. And with less mixture of argument?—They never professed to have argument. The bill and answer concluded by submitting points to the court which were very much like the Scotch pleas in law; but so many hypothetical views were presented, that these submissions to the court often branched out to a great length; and that is very much dispensed with now.

13,272. The proceeding originates by the plaintiff filing a bill?—Yes.

13,273. And then an order is made?—A subpœna is at the same time issued. It is the warrant for bringing the defendant before the court.

13,274. And the defendant puts in an answer?—He may or may not put in an answer. It is optional in the plaintiff to require an answer; and that is, I think, a great improvement on the old system, by which answers were always required. The plaintiff now may not call for an answer, and the cause is speedily at issue. If no answer is required, the plaintiff goes into evidence, and the defendant also. At one time the evidence was taken apart, neither party knowing anything of what his opponent was doing; and at the end of a specific time, publication passed, having the effect of circumduction in Scotland. That was extremely unsatisfactory. But now there are examiners before whom the witnesses are examined in presence of the opposite party, very much as witnesses were examined on commission in Scotland; if it is considered necessary, the witnesses may be examined before the judge.

James Anderson.

13,275. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose the plaintiff does not require an answer, can the defendant put in an answer?—Yes; he may put in his voluntary answer.

13,276. The Chairman.—If he does not choose to put in an answer?—It is scarcely an answer now to the bill. The plaintiff, if he desires to have discovery, files interrogatories, which the defendant answers.

13,277. Are these interrogatories answered upon oath?—They are.

13,278. Mr. Baxter.—Always?—Always upon oath, unless in the case of persons exempted from taking an oath.

13,279. The Chairman.—When the answers are put in, and parties are to meet in order to investigate the facts, is there an order by the judge that they shall proceed to investigate the facts?—No. That is regulated by the general orders of court. The cause goes at once to the examiner. Frequently before the parties get that length there are amendments on the bill. There are very often amendments on the bill. Within a certain time there is an order, as of course, to amend the bill; and that is frequently done if an answer is put in. If the defendant is interrogated, and certain matters are brought out in the answers, these are frequently made the foundation of an amendment of the bill.

13,280. Is it amended more than once?—Yes, it may be so.

13,281. Mr. Baxter.—Is the answer amended more than once?—No; the answer is never amended.

13,282. The Chairman.—But if there is an amendment on the bill, the defendant may put in an additional answer?—Yes, an answer to the amended bill.

13,283. The evidence is taken in presence of the parties unless there are affidavits?—Yes; a great deal, however, is taken by affidavit.

13,284. How is that brought before the judge? Is it just reported?—After publication has passed, and the time for going further into evidence has expired, the cause is set down for hearing. I am speaking now of what I may call the ordinary practice by bill and answer, and examination of witnesses. I shall mention some special exceptions presently.

13,285. Being set down for hearing, it is argued?—Then it comes on for argument in the regular course of the cause paper.

13,286. The judge then decides it. Does he take time to consider when he thinks that necessary?—Yes.

13,287. And afterwards delivers his judgment in court?—He delivers his judgment in court always before the order is made.

13,288. He delivers his judgment in court, and that is put in the shape of an order?—The judgment he delivers in court contains the reasons for the order he makes; and at the conclusion of his exposition he says that the order is so and so, stating what he thinks ought to be done.

13,289. Does he draw up that order himself?—Not the formal order, but he states the substance.

13,290. Or is there an officer of court who does it?—Yes, the registrar of court draws up the formal order, but the judge very frequently concludes his exposition of the case by saying, 'My opinion, therefore, is that an order should be made so and so,' stating its terms. The registrar, who fills a similar position to that of a principal Clerk of Session, takes down a note of that, and afterwards draws it up, and sends the draft to the parties to see whether they are satisfied with it. If there is no objection, it is drawn out; but if there are objections, he hears them, and then draws up the order as he thinks it ought to be drawn up.

13,291. That order is signed by the registrar?—Yes.

James Anderson.

13,292. From that judgment there is an appeal?—Yes, there is an appeal or a re-hearing; and being a re-hearing, when the appeal was from the whole decree, although the plaintiff was in possession of the judgment, he opened the case again. That did not obtain in interlocutory or partial judgments; if the order merely decided a point in a case, then the appellant began.

13,293. That review or re-hearing is before the court of appeal?—Yes. The court of appeal consists of two branches practically: either the Lord Chancellor or the two Lords Justices, or the Lord Chancellor and one Lord Justice, have full jurisdiction. Generally the Lord Chancellor sits alone, and the two Lords Justices sit together; and you may go before either the one court or the other. But the appeals are divided between the two branches of the appeal court. For example, the Lord Chancellor may take appeals from Vice-Chancellors Stuart and Malins, and the Lords Justices from the Vice-Chancellor James and the Master of the Rolls. The business is arranged in that way. By the 30 and 31 Vict. c. 64, it is provided that the jurisdiction of the court of appeal may be exercised either by both of the Lords Justices 'when sitting together, or by either of the said judges when sitting separately, or by the Lord Chancellor when sitting with the said judges or either of them, provided that no decree made on the hearing of a cause or on further consideration shall be re-heard before the Lords Justices when sitting separately.' The object of the Act was despatch, the business of the appeal court being, at the time it was passed, greatly in arrear.

13,294. When a judgment is given by that court of appeal, is there a further appeal to the House of Lords?—Yes; it is an appeal then from the Court of Chancery; but it is not necessary, in going to the House of Lords, that you should go through a Chancery appeal court. You may appeal directly from the Vice-Chancellor or Master of the Rolls' judgment to the House of Lords, if the decree be enrolled. A decree or order by the Vice-Chancellor is not appealable to the Lords, but it must be made a decree or order of the Lord Chancellor; and that is done by enrolment.

13,295. Without discussion?—Yes; it is done by an officer after a certain number of days. If either party has any objections to the enrolment, he lodges a caveat; but if there is no caveat, the order is enrolled as matter of course. I have known appeals from the Court of Chancery to the House of Lords taken up per incuriam without the order being enrolled, and the appeal has always been dismissed as incompetent.

13,296. Mr. Baxter.—You spoke of taking evidence by affidavit: Do you find that where there is a conflict of evidence, that is satisfactory?—I do not like the affidavit system at all; but the objection to it is now very much mitigated by the opportunity which the opposite party has of cross-examining every witness who makes an affidavit in the cause. I mentioned what I described as the ordinary regular practice of the Court of Chancery; but I should say now that a system which is found very convenient in practice has very nearly superseded the regular ordinary system, and that is a motion for a decree. Instead of going through the regular course of examination of witnesses before the examiner, the plaintiff has the power, if he pleases, of making a motion to the court for a decree, in terms of the prayer of his bill. He gives notice of motion for a decree after a certain number of weeks. During that interval both parties file all the affidavits they rely on, and there may be affidavits in reply. These affidavits being filed, the party against whom they are filed may cross-examine before the examiner, or, if the court is satisfied it is a right course to take, in court; and then the motion for decree comes on in the same way as a cause,—being set down in the paper, it is disposed of in that way. There are more 'motions for decree' now than regular 'causes;' and it is found extremely convenient. If the court thinks it is not a case for giving an order or decree upon the motion, it has the power to direct further inquiry, or to say it shall come on after the examination of witnesses in the ordinary way.

13,297. The Chairman.—What is the advantage of that course?—I should say despatch and economy. It dispenses with long examinations of witnesses.

13,298. And that brings it back very much to proof by affidavit?—Indeed it does; but the proof by affidavit is more satisfactory from the knowledge the party has that his witness may be cross-examined.

13,299. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think there is a considerable number of causes in which the affidavit system saves expense?—Yes, I think so.

13,300. Where the parties know they cannot make better of it?—Where the parties know they cannot make better of it, they do not cross-examine. I have known many cases where the affidavit witnesses were cross-examined, very much to the disadvantage of the party cross-examining them.

13,301. The Chairman.—Do you find that these modes of expiscating facts in the Court of Chancery are satisfactory?—For the ordinary litigious business I think they are; but there is a large portion of the business of the Court of Chancery which does not consist of that class of business. There is administrative business for instance, and that is now very much simplified. There are the Trustee Relief Acts, under which a great many questions may be disposed of by the court. If a trustee has doubts as to how a certain trust fund which he holds ought to be distributed, he pays it into court, and gives notice to the parties that he washes his hands of it. The court will then deal with it. That is done by means of a petition by one party served on the other to have the money paid out to him, and the question is disposed of on that petition. Then, again, in administration suits, which are much like multiplepoindings, there is nothing but a summons taken out at chambers upon an executor to give in his accounts; and the administration of the estate may all take place without the intervention of the judge, unless points arise in the course of the administration procedure that require his decision. In these administration suits, which may be begun in that very simple way, merely by subpœna, or summons on the executor, you may get in the accounts, and bring the conflicting parties before the court, and you may have the points decided without going through the ordinary formula of bill and answer, or motion for decree, or examination of witnesses.

13,302. And there is no record of anything then except just the motion that is made?—If there are conflicting claims, the claim is put in and verified by affidavit in chambers.

13,303. These are suits for distribution?—Yes; or if an estate is insolvent, there are creditor suits.

13,304. Mr. Baxter.—Is that greatly done by the chief clerk?—Yes, in administration suits. Though it is done by the chief clerk, it is the act of the judge; but unless there is a point of law, or the parties desire the judge to give his mind to it, the chief clerk works out the detail.

13,305. The Chairman.—Do you think the mode of expiscating the facts which you have stated is a satisfactory one?—I think it is. You must have some record of what a witness says. I confess, however, that I prefer the witness being brought into court, and giving his testimony before the judge who is to decide the case. The only difficulty in the way of that course in every case is the time which it takes.

13,306. It is sometimes done?—Yes; it is sometimes done.

13,307. There was a case before Vice-Chancellor Stuart with reference to Young's patent?—Yes; the evidence there was taken in court, but it is not a very favourable specimen.

13,308. Mr. Baxter.—But you prefer that mode?—I prefer that mode.

13,309. Lord Barcaple.—There was another case which was also very long—the Spiritualist case?—Yes, that was very long.

13,310. The Chairman.—How long did Young's patent case last? Was it not thirty days?—I think so; but I cannot give the exact number of days.

13,311. Lord Barcaple.—Do these proofs before the judge frequently become prolix?—Yes.

13,312. Would you say they were more or less so than the proceeding before the examiner?—I do not think the parties are sufficiently under the examiner's control, and I do not think the examiner sufficiently exercises a judicial function. He considers himself rather as a conduit pipe for sending up the evidence as tendered.

13,313. But is the evidence more prolix before him than before the judge?—Yes, I think it is. I may refer to a case before the Lords Justices (in re Mercantile Trading Company) last Saturday, under a winding-up; and these windings-up occupy a very large portion of the time of the court. This question arose out of a blockade-running company. A dividend of 25 per cent. was paid on the capital within six months after the formation of the company, and in the winding-up it was alleged that that was a return of the capital. That was the only question there, and it was tried on affidavit; each of the affidavit witnesses was cross-examined at great length before the examiner, and certainly there was great prolixity in that case. It was very much animadverted on by the judges, both by Vice-Chancellor Malins, who gave the original judgment, and by the Lords Justices. I have known other instances of the same character. I think the examination before the examiners is generally much more prolix than when it is taken in court. The judge keeps them more under control.

13,314. The Chairman.—If the judge attempted to take the evidence in all the cases before him, the time occupied would be more than he could devote to it?—I think so; but the remedy for that is to have more judges.

13,315. Mr. Gordon.—Who pays the examiners?—The country.

13,316. Not the parties?—Not the parties, unless a special examiner is appointed. If the parties wish to have a special examiner so as to save time, or to get a person in whom they may have more confidence than in the official examiner, they are at liberty to do so.

13,317. The Chairman.—Or to go to the country?—Yes.

13,318. Mr. Gordon.—Must that be of consent of parties?—No; I think the judge will appoint him.

13,319. Lord Barcaple.—When a special examiner is appointed in a distant county, what class of professional person is he?—He is generally a barrister.

13,320. Sent from London?—Yes. I daresay you may have heard of the case of Lord v. Colvin; the special examiner appointed in that case was Mr. (now Sir Richard) Baggallay.

13,321. The Chairman.—There is a change proposed, is there not, in the system of procedure?—Yes; the change is a fusion,—to have common law and equity administered in one court. It is very much the Scotch system, so far as regards the consolidation of legal and equitable jurisdiction.

13,322. That will probably result in more causes being tried by jury?—I don't know that it will in causes of a proper equitable character. I think that trial by jury in the Court of Equity has been a failure. It was introduced about ten years ago, and there has been now and then a cause tried by jury.

13,323. Mr. Baxter.—But seldom?—Very seldom.

13,324. Lord Barcaple.—It is only intended, I suppose, for the trial of a special question?—It has not answered at all; and even in the Probate Court, where the parties have the option of trial by jury, in the great majority of cases they prefer the witnesses to be examined before the judge.

13,325. Mr. Gordon.—And also in the Divorce Court?—Yes, in the Probate and Divorce Court.

13,326. The Chairman.—What do you ascribe that to?—I think the parties are more satisfied with the opinion of the judge on the evidence than with the opinion of a jury.

13,327. Lord Barcaple.—Do you mean that as a general proposition, or in reference to the cases in these courts?—In reference to cases of that character—patrimonial cases. Cases involving the liberty of the subject stand on a different footing; also cases of libel.

13,328. The Chairman.—You think it applies to cases such as come before the Divorce and Probate Courts, and proper equity suits?—Yes; I am confining my observations to that class of cases.

13,329. In the new system that is proposed to be inaugurated, the parties have a power of selecting the mode of investigation into facts. It seems to have been suggested that the plaintiff may say that he desires to have the facts investigated by a jury, and the defendant may agree to that, or he may object to it; if he agrees to it, it is done if the judge thinks it a right course; if he objects to it, the judge determines whether it is to be by jury or not. Do you approve of giving that power to the parties?—I think so. That is the present practice in the Divorce Court. I don't know whether I am right or not, but from the cursory glance I had of the report, I see there is an option also given of referring to an arbitrator. I am not prepared to say that I approve of that. If parties please out of court to refer, let them refer; but I don't understand the judge shaking off his judicial responsibility, and referring the case to an arbitrator against the wishes of parties.

13,330. You know the system of dealing with cases of accounting in the Court of Session—namely, to remit them to an accountant? Would you suggest any mode by which the expense and tedium of that course of proceeding could be to any extent avoided?—The expense and tedium of that course of procedure are certainly very great. It is, I venture to think, a crying evil. I have known many instances where the merits of the case were completely smothered by the voluminous and complicated procedure before the accountants in reference to their reports. Two of these I may refer to. They both reached the House of Lords. The one is Smith v. Donaldson, 20 July 1864, 2 Macph. (H. L.) 86; and the other, Chisholm v. Laird, still depending. In each of these cases, which were suits for taking the accounts of private partnerships, the accountants' reports filled volumes. Chisholm v. Laird commenced in the year 1848, and after it had been twenty years in court, and the accountant had made four different voluminous reports, to which respectively objections were given in by the parties, and numerous judgments were pronounced, all of an interlocutory nature, the court at length gave leave to appeal to the House of Lords against these judgments, by the last of which a remit was once more made to an accountant to proceed with the accounting. The ground on which the leave was sought and granted was, 'that it would be best for all parties that it (the remit) should stand over until the principles of the accounting are finally determined.' Chisholm's case is the worst specimen of the kind I have ever seen.

13,331. Mr. Baxter.—You have nothing of that kind in England?—Nothing of that kind.

13,332. The Chairman.—Some parties won't do as they do in England,—take the advice of the court, and have the matter referred to an arbitrator. That advice was not infrequently given in that case. But can you suggest any mode by which the expense and delay of remitting cases to accountants might be avoided?—I think there ought to be attached to the court officers conversant with figures for the particular occasion. There is a great temptation for an accountant to spend money, and to make hypothetical reports; and they are very prone to hypothetical reports in the Scotch courts. If the accounts were taken by a paid officer, who had no motive to delay proceedings, and who acted upon his official responsibility, I think accountings would be very much simplified. An ordinary case of accounting, I think, ought to go at once to the accountant, if there is no defence to bar the action.

13,333. Lord Barcaple.—The parties very often adopt that course now; but, on the other hand, they also frequently concur in asking for the decision of one or two points, preliminary to the accounting, as instructions as it were to the accountant?—I think that is very proper.

13,334. The Chairman.—But you think that having two or three persons attached to the court who would prepare the cases of accounting for the court might shorten and simplify the proceedings?—I think it would very much.

James Anderson.

13,335. Do you point at those persons being salaried officers?—Yes.

13,336. There is another class of cases which have given rise to a good deal of expense—namely, multiplepoindings, in which there are a number of claims. Can you make any suggestion as to how they might be simplified?—I think multiplepoindings are very unsatisfactorily dealt with by the Judicature Act. I have seen several instances of this, where the only point was a point of construction. In such a case as that I think no record is necessary. There may be a question when a person was born or when he died, and dates may be required; but wherever it appears that the question turns upon the construction of one or more instruments, there should be no record, or anything else, except production of those instruments. The instruments might be referred to in the condescendence annexed to the summons; or it might be begun by a petition, and parties could be heard on that. That is the way that these things are done in the Court of Chancery; the matter is generally disposed of upon petition, and the instruments are set out or referred to in the petition.

13,337. But if there are competing claims?—Even there no claim is given in. It turns often on mere construction. The parties have the petition intimated to them, and they appear at the time the petition is heard, and it is disposed of generally at this hearing. I think that might be done in a large number of multiplepoindings. If it is a multiplepoinding and exoneration, the trustee wishing exoneration, then it is practically the combination of a count and reckoning, and a suit for the construction of the instruments; and the judge might give his opinion upon the summons with the condescendence, or upon petition, if you adopt the petition form, as to the matter of construction, and he might refer the question of accounting to the accountant.

13,338. Mr. Gordon.—Are you not aware of the 30th clause in the Court of Session Act of 1868, which contains provisions remedying the matters objected by you?—So far as it goes, I think the change made an improvement. But I do not consider that it goes far enough. I think also in reductions a record is frequently very unnecessary. Take the case of a reduction ex capite lecti. In the recent case of Barstow v. Black, there were numerous appeals and cross appeals to the House of Lords. It was an action by the heir-at-law to set aside a deed ex capite lecti. There was no doubt that the deed was executed within the sixty days, and that the testator was ill of the disease of which he died. There were no facts in dispute; and the only question was as to the effect of prior instruments, as to which there were a great many nice questions.

13,339. But there was a doubt as to whether he died of that disease?—Originally.

13,340. And that doubt was not solved till after the record was made up?—Yes; a minute was put in admitting it.

13,341. In fact, it was very much a feeling on the part of the heir-at-law that he did not wish to investigate disagreeable circumstances, which led him to say that he would not go into that doubtful point?—But that instance does not affect my general opinion, that in many cases the decisions of these questions depend entirely on written instruments; and where a case depends upon that, I think a record quite unnecessary and mischievous.

13,342. Lord Barcaple.—Do you carry that so far that you would not have the defender put in any kind of pleading at all?—I would serve the summons upon him, or the petition, or whatever begins the suit. The petition, if this form be adopted, should be ordered by the judge to be heard on a given day; the parties would appear on that day; and if the judge thought it ripe for decision, he would give his judgment. If the parties on whom the petition was served wished to put anything on record, they might present a counter petition, and the matter would come on upon petition and counter petition, and judgment might be given at once.

13,343. You would leave it to the judgment of the defender whether he should put in a counter petition?—I would give him a discretion. If he thinks he has a case that is not embraced by the original petition, I certainly would give him, under the sanction of costs, the option of having a cross petition.

13,344. Mr. Gordon.—The case of Black was a peculiar case, from there being an heir-at-law and two or three sets of heirs of provision?—Yes.

13,345. The Chairman.—And it involved some very nice questions?—Yes; but records there were thoroughly unnecessary.

13,346. Lord Barcaple.—But you would leave it possible that the case might be disposed of in such circumstances as you have spoken of upon a summons, or whatever other initial writ there may be, and nothing else in the way of writing?—Yes.

13,347. When the cause is decided, and goes elsewhere, how is it to be discovered what cause it was that the judgment was pronounced in?—The cause goes up as it stood before the judge in the first instance in its integrity.

13,348. But it was no cause at all, except in so far as the summons disclosed something, and it was upon the statement of parties in the course of a discussion that the judge arrived at a conclusion?—The facts must all be in the petition. What the parties said in the way of reasoning may be said again in the court of appeal.

13,349. But the petition is the petition of the pursuer, or the summons is the summons of the pursuer, and the defender ex hypothesi has made no statement of any kind?—Because he deems that unnecessary. If he disputes the facts in the petition, he puts in an affidavit doing so. If he is to bring forward any facts of his own as the foundation of a claim on his part, then he has a cross petition. All the facts must be before the court.

13,350. Then the defender, if he has a case founded upon facts of his own, must state these facts?—Yes.

13,351. That is pretty much the existing system of procedure in the Court of Session, particularly since Mr. Gordon's Act was passed?—I have no doubt that Act has brought in a great many improvements.

13,352. Mr. Gordon.—The abuse is the unnecessary setting forth of contents of documents by the defender?—In making up the record, each party states the whole case ab initio.

13,353. Lord Barcaple.—That is a gross abuse?—But I am afraid in practice it is done.

13,354. Do you think there is any real use of the plea in law?—I think it is useful. I think it gives notice to the other side what the point is.

13,355. You do not have anything precisely the same in Chancery, have you?—In the bill there are generally a few concluding sentences: 'The plaintiff submits to the court so and so.' That is very much a statement of pleas in law, though it is not so called.

13,356. The theory of the plea in law is that all pleas in law that are to be made use of shall have been stated, and the party, strictly speaking, cannot win his case except upon a plea that he has stated on record. That is such a gross perversion of justice that all courts have always allowed pleas to be added. Now what is the use of pleas if a plea has to be added?—Merely to give notice to the other side.

13,357. Mr. Gordon.—Is there not an advantage in giving notice because it may enable the other party to add to his statement?—It may; but if you do not make it imperative that he shall put in his pleas, and even at the hearing give him an opportunity of adding pleas, you may mislead the opposite party. If a plea is stated for the first time at the hearing, the judge may dispose of it without entering it on the record, it being law which the parties are bound to know; and in giving his judgment, if it proceeded upon that plea, he would describe it as a plea raised for the first time at the bar. There is no use of sending parties back for that. This is done in the Court of Chancery very frequently, and particularly in the case of demurrers. You may put in a demurrer to a bill stating the ground.

That does not prevent you from stating at the hearing other grounds of demurrer ore tenus; but in that case it is a general rule that no costs are given if the demurrer ore tenus prevails. I think the practice in the Court of Chancery might be very usefully extended to the Court of Session, and the losing party might be enabled to appeal from a judgment of the Lord Ordinary to the House of Lords without going to the Inner House. That would save a great deal of expense; and I think that the theory of the Court of Session is the same as the theory of the Court of Chancery, that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is not merely his judgment, but it is the judgment of the Court of Session.

13,358. Lord Barcaple.—And it is so extracted?—Yes, it so bears: 'The Lord Barcaple, Ordinary, and by him the Lords of Council and Session, decern and ordain,' etc.

13,359. Mr. Campbell.—Every now and then it happens that a Lord Ordinary decides a case avowedly upon the authority of a decision of the Inner House, which is no doubt immediately applicable to the particular case; but in such a case, do you think it a great hardship and disadvantage that the party intending to go to the House of Lords eventually should be compelled to go to the Inner House to get a decision registered which he knows must be pronounced there?—I have known many cases of that sort. I think it a hardship. The time and expense are thrown away.

13,360. The Chairman.—Does it not frequently happen, that in considering the case in the Inner House, it is more thoroughly expiscated, and is found eventually to depend on something different?—No doubt; but I think the losing party should have the choice of the court of review. I don't say that should be the regular course; but if the losing party chooses to forego the chance of winning in the Inner House, I think he should be at liberty to go to the House of Lords. The case may be so important that he may be determined to go to the House of Lords, and the sooner he gets to the end of it the better. I think there are far too many reviews in a cause.

13,361. But the other party may think, that if he loses in the Inner House, he may not be disposed to go to the House of Lords?—But he has got the judgment in the Outer House.

13,362. Mr. Gordon.—Suppose there is decree in favour of the pursuer, and the defender wants time, might it not lead to bad results, and in the case of a poor man force him to the House of Lords?—But you force him after he goes through the intermediate court.

13,363. The Chairman.—You would assimilate it to the power of appealing from the Vice-Chancellor to the House of Lords?—Yes; I think there are more appeals from the Vice-Chancellor direct to the House of Lords than after going through the intermediate court.

13,364. Lord Barcaple.—There is another mode of diminishing the number of reviews, namely, by abolishing the Lords Ordinary. The Vice-Chancellor is in a somewhat analogous position in England. Do you think the double judgment obtained through the existence of the Vice-Chancellor's Court is a valuable thing?—I think it is; and if the losing party is satisfied with the judgment, there is an end of the strife; but if he is resolved to go further, I think there is a great multiplicity of tribunals.

13,365. But what do you say to the proposition to abolish the judgment of a single judge in the first instance?—And to go at once to the Inner House?

13,366. Yes; to go to a court of probably three judges in the Court of Chancery?—I prefer the single judge in the first instance. We are more conversant in equity with the judgments of single judges. At common law, except the mere formal preparation of the case, the causes are heard before the full court, or at nisi prius before a jury in the first instance.

13,367. The Chairman.—But in Chancery you first come before a single judge?—Yes.

13,368. And then you have review in the Court of Chancery?—Yes, at the option of the losing party.

13,369. Do you approve of having first a single judge to dispose of the case, and then a review of his judgment by a plurality of judges?—Yes; I think so, subject to what I have said as to an immediate appeal to the House of Lords.

13,370. You think that is a good system in principle?—Yes. I think that system might be very much improved by dispensing with the unnecessary cross proceedings which are required not only in the Court of Chancery, but in the House of Lords. In a re-hearing it is not so much so, because the whole cause comes up at once; but take appeals in the Court of Chancery against judgments on portions of a case—the successful party must have a cross appeal, and in the House of Lords there must be a cross appeal. I think that is a very unnecessary and expensive proceeding, and might be dispensed with. I think that appeals to the Inner House from the Outer House, and to the House of Lords from the Court of Session, should be like the old advocations.

13,371. You think they should bring up the whole cause?—I do. There is a clause in the Act of 1868 to that effect. I approve of that very much. Further, I think there is no occasion for petitions of appeal to the House of Lords. A simple note given in to the clerk of Parliament should be quite enough to bring it up—like a note of advocation. But you have now to set out all the judgments.

13,372. Mr. Gordon.—Do you think that should bring up the whole case?—Yes; I think that would tend to reduce the number of appeals. A party is very reluctant to present a cross appeal if he thinks he is right as respondent in the main appeal.

13,373. The Chairman.—If the party who appeals does not wish to appeal on the whole matter of the judgment, but only a part of it, would you not give him an opportunity of saying so?—No, because the opposite party may bring up the remainder.

13,374. But if he does not mean to insist on anything more, should he be considered as an appellant on points in which he acquiesces?—He should not be strictly an appellant. If he is not satisfied, he should bring up the whole cause, and the House of Lords would be enabled to do complete justice between the parties.

13,375. What opportunity would you give him of setting forth the matter to which he limited his appeal?—I am talking now of the petition of appeal. The petition of appeal does not set out the reasons of appeal, or the grounds on which the appellant objects. I am confining myself to the petition. In regard to the cases, I think it should be optional to the respondent to put in a case or no as he pleases. At present a respondent cannot support a judgment of the Court of Session, or be heard by counsel, till he prepares a printed case. That seems to me to be a very unnecessary expense. I think the appellant should give in his case, and that the respondent should have a right, if he pleases to exercise it, of giving in a case also, but it should not be incumbent on him to do so.

13,376. There is a rule, I believe, in regard to printed cases in the House of Lords that they are printed in a quantity sufficient to give a copy to each peer, and to have some to spare?—That used to be so. There used to be 400 or 500 copies printed. It is now reduced to 100, and even that number is very unnecessary. But once the type is put up, I don't think there is much more expense. The great expense of printing is in the setting up of the type, and the difference of expense of 10 or 100 copies is little more than the expense of the paper.

13,377. Mr. Justice Willes.—Our points in the common law courts are very like pleas in law. A special case is stated, and each party must deliver to his opponent and to the judges the points which he intends to rely upon in the argument. They generally go into a sheet of paper, or if they are very long, then they cover a side of foolscap; but these are something like the pleas in law in the Scotch courts, and we find them very useful?—They rather go beyond that.

WEDNESDAY, 19TH MAY 1869.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.
THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.
THE LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.
LORD BARCAPLE.
E. S. GORDON, Esq., Q.C.
A. R. CLARK, Esq.
JAMES CAMPBELL, Esq.
JAMES ADAM, Esq.
A. B. SHAND, Esq.
T. GRAHAM MURRAY, Esq.
CHARLES MORTON, Esq.
JAMES WEBSTER, Esq.
J. B. BAXTER, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

John Carment.

JOHN CARMENT, Esq., examined.

13,378. The Chairman.—I think you are Preses of the Society of Solicitors before the Supreme Courts?—I am, and have been so for the last two years.

13,379. You have been a great many years a practitioner before the court?—I passed as a solicitor in 1848; and for about six years before that I had charge of the Parliament House business in the office in which I afterwards became a partner.

13,380. You are in use yourself to attend a good deal in the court, are you not?—I am there almost daily while the court is sitting.

13,381. You have a good deal of court business in your office?—Yes.

13,382. There have been some recent changes in the forms of process, have there not?—Yes; by the recent Act considerable changes have been introduced.

13,383. Have you considered the causes of the cost and delay of the procedure in the courts?—I have. I have had occasion to consider these matters pretty fully. They have been a good deal discussed both with members of the profession, and by our society as a body.

13,384. Do you find that the recent Act has tended to accelerate business, and to get rid of some useless matters?—In many respects, I think, the recent Act has introduced very beneficial changes. In some respects, I think, its operation has been very unfortunate.

13,385. Would you state to us, in the first place, in what respects you think it has introduced beneficial changes?—I regard the changes as in the main beneficial. In particular, I think the system of adjusting the record is better than the old system. We are getting the records adjusted more rapidly and with less expense; and there is a greater tendency to simplicity, avoiding the repetition and quotation from documents, and other matters of that kind, that were of old too frequent; and my impression is, that if matters go on as they are now doing, we shall find the Act work exceedingly well in that respect.

13,386. Are there any other matters in regard to which you think it has worked beneficially?—I think that the mode of taking proofs before the Lord Ordinary—though that is not altogether due to the late Act—is a great improvement over the old system of taking proof by commission, especially when, as is now the case, the discussion upon the evidence takes place at the close of leading the proof. Then in regard to prorogations—and here it is fair to state that that many of my brethren differ from me as to this matter—of old the mode of granting prorogations led to great abuse; so much so, that an agent almost took it as a personal affront if the opposite agent refused to grant a prorogation. The effect of that was often to put agents in a very awkward position—between doing an uncourteous thing to a brother agent, and doing their duty to their client. At present no prorogations can be granted. No doubt certain evils may result from that; but my own feeling is, that upon the whole, that matter should remain as it is under the new Act.

13,387. Are there any other points on which you think the Act is beneficial—anything connected with the mode of taking proof, except what you have stated?—There are various other improvements introduced, but I cannot at this minute enumerate them. Regarding the Act as in the main beneficial, my mind has been more directed to matters in regard to which the Act was not working well.

13,388. Would you state the matters on which you think it is not beneficial?—The introduction of the Court of the Lords Ordinary, in my humble judgment, was an unfortunate change. The result of it was last session to throw the entire business of the Outer House completely behind; and speaking for myself, and I believe for others, I think the extent to which the sittings of that court were carried did give rise to great dissatisfaction and to very material inconvenience. As the Outer House rolls stood at the beginning of this session—putting ordinary debates and summary debates together—the number standing on the rolls was 118, while last year at the same date it was only 75, giving an increase of arrears of 43 cases. Undoubtedly the arrear in the Inner House was diminished; but I am not prepared to say that the price paid for that was not too great. Another thing which tended to increase the dissatisfaction was, that the business disposed of by that new court was exceedingly small. If I am not mistaken, they proceeded at the rate of about one case per day, and we all felt that it was a pity to stop the Outer House business for that.

13,389. Mr. Baxter.—You say the arrear in the Inner House diminished: may that not have arisen from business not coming in from the Lords Ordinary to the Inner House?—To a certain extent that would undoubtedly affect it.

13,390. The Chairman.—Are there any other matters connected with that Act of Parliament which you wish to mention?—I think that the summary debate roll is another unfortunate change; and it seems to me that the provisions of the Act of Sederunt of 1865 were greatly superior to what we now have. As the matter stands, if the parties are not prepared when the record is closed to renounce probation, or take a certain course, the case is necessarily sent to the summary debate roll; and though it is summary in name, unfortunately it is about as tedious, or more so, as the ordinary debate roll. Now, under the Act of Sederunt of 1865, the parties were allowed a certain time within which to make up their minds. When the record was closed the case was adjourned for eight or ten days, and very frequently by that time the parties were prepared to say what they would do. Speaking from my own experience, I should say it would be much better to revert to the provisions of the Act of Sederunt than to continue the summary debate roll. As it stands just now, it seems to me to be a great evil.

13,391. Are these two the principal matters which you have to refer to?—These are the main points. In regard to the motion roll, the Act introduced what was called the clerk's motion roll. That was a thing which our body generally, when it was proposed to introduce it into the Act of Parliament, were very much in favour of; but, as it has turned out in practice, it is an entirely different thing from what we had anticipated. After the Act was passed, the court passed an Act of Sederunt which withdrew nearly all the motions from the clerk's roll; and as it stands now, it is really worse than useless, and serves no good purpose whatever. The clerk does not dispose of anything; the motions go to the Lord Ordinary in the end. Practically it is a grievance.

13,392. Mr. Webster.—A grievance as to delay and expense?—It has led to this, which is a thing we never had before, that when a motion is made before the clerk, it is not disposed of by him, but it is sent specially to the Lord Ordinary's motion roll; and I am told—I have not succumbed to the practice myself—but I am told it is becoming the idea that a counsel is entitled to a fee for making that motion.

13,393. Lord Barcaple.—You mean for making the motion before the Lord Ordinary?—Yes.

13,394. The Chairman.—In regard to the Court of the Lords Ordinary, you mentioned that they decided very few cases,—only at the rate of one a day?—Speaking generally, I believe that was so.

13,395. The causes that were sent to them were causes mostly upon proof, were they not—advocations in which proofs had been taken in the inferior court?—Undoubtedly. It is perfectly true that, as a general rule, the advocations which were sent to the Court of the Lords Ordinary were causes which did take a little more time to discuss than many other causes would.

13,396. And if they had been discussed in one of the Divisions, that would have to a corresponding extent retarded other cases there?—They must have to a certain extent retarded the other cases; but I am not prepared to say that judges sitting together for the first time, and not accustomed to deliberate together, or to deal with these matters, could get through their work with the same despatch as the Inner House could.

13,397. Lord Barcaple.—Do you know whether in point of fact the judgments were delivered more immediately after the debate, or less so than was the usual course in the court?—I had only two cases myself before that court, and it did not strike me that in that respect there was any material difference. I think one of them was decided the day it was heard, and the other was taken to avizandum, and decided some little time afterwards.

13,398. The Chairman.—You mentioned that, from the length of time that the Lords Ordinary were occupied in that court, the business of the Outer House fell into arrear: Do you mean by that to imply that the Lords Ordinary should not be employed occasionally as a court to work off cases, or do you mean that they should not be so much employed at one time as they were last year?—My own impression is, that the Inner House can have no difficulty in getting through their work without the assistance of the Court of the Lords Ordinary, and in my judgment the institution of that court is unnecessary. Of course I anticipate that the court are to avail themselves of the facilities which they have for giving additional sittings when necessary.

13,399. The court have been in use, have they not, to avail themselves of the power of having additional sittings; but you think they may avail themselves of that power to a greater extent?—To a certain extent, the court have undoubtedly availed themselves of these extra sittings; but I am aware that there has often been an impression in the Parliament House that facilities of that sort might have been more largely resorted to.

13,400. The session now begins on 15th October: that is an additional reason for expecting that the Divisions will overtake the business?—Yes. We were all very much in favour of that change. And the week allowed in February is not generally in our body regarded with much favour. We think if that week were abolished, the business might be got through without the Court of the Lords Ordinary sitting, and without prolonging the sittings of the Divisions unduly.

13,401. Do you not think that it might be rather an overtax on the judges to sit from the 15th October till they finished their extra sittings in spring?—That goes into another matter, as to which I have something to say, and perhaps it is better to say it now. It relates to the mode in which cases are heard. I have certain views which I should like to have an opportunity of stating to the Commission about that. My impression is that the work might be got through more rapidly than it is now; and with an improvement in that respect, the court, without taxing the judges unduly, which is certainly most undesirable, would be able to get through the business.

13,402. Mr. Shand.—Suppose a temporary expedient to be necessary at any time in order to diminish the arrears in the Division, do you think it is desirable to take all the Lords Ordinary away to form such a Division; or has it occurred to you that a Third Division might be formed in any other way, with less injury to the general business, for temporary purposes?—Of course, the necessity for such an expedient is a question which experience can alone settle; but if there is to be another court sitting, I am rather in favour of the present system. I think, to take a judge from each of the Divisions would not be desirable. I have a strong objection to a court of review of three judges; and I should much prefer that, if it be necessary to sit at all, the Court of the Lords Ordinary should sit as now regulated by the Act.

13,403. The Chairman.—Would you state your suggestion as to shortening the time of hearing causes?—In regard to the hearing of causes in the Inner House, as matters at present stand, the management of the rolls seems to me exceedingly unsatisfactory. Prior to 1853, the cases were put out for certain days, and every one knew when his case was likely to come on. If a country agent or a party desired to attend the hearing, he had little difficulty in doing it, and counsel knew when a case was to come on, and were prepared accordingly. As matters stand now, nobody knows with any degree of certainty what day a case is to come on. There are various objections to the system, but one result is that counsel cannot be so well prepared to discuss their cases as they otherwise would be; and to us who are behind the bar, it sometimes seems as if counsel, when they begin the argument, were getting up their case. We see counsel constantly reading to the court the record, and reading documents, and then the argument follows. Now I am certainly under the impression that hearings in the Inner House might, without any prejudice to the decision of the cases, be greatly shorter than they are. I think if the rolls were so managed that it was known when a case was to come on, that would conduce to greater expedition in disposing of the cases. It would also be a great improvement if senior counsel began in the Inner House. I think that would tend very much to shorten the discussion; because it is impossible for any one who has attended the court for upwards of twenty-five years, not to know that the time now occupied in hearing an Inner House case is probably at least double what it was of old. Formerly it very often happened that cases were disposed of upon an argument by senior counsel alone. Then, besides the management of the rolls, there is also the mode in which the hearing of cases is conducted: the adjournment of causes, splitting them up, and hearing a part to-day, and a part to-morrow, and a part forty days afterwards—for I had a case not long ago of that kind—necessarily lengthens the discussion, and it adds very materially to the expense. I am bound to say that of late years there has been a considerable amount of dissatisfaction with the Court of Session,—a sort of popular outcry against it; and so far as I can judge, the mode of dealing with cases in the Inner House has had more to do with the origin of that than anything else. To give an illustration, I have known a case, in which the amount at stake was exceedingly small, stand in the short roll for twelve successive days before it was heard, at a cost of £8 to the losing party for agents' fees alone, for attendances before the discussion commenced. Of old, when the court found they could not reach a case, a notice was sometimes put out the day before that such a case was postponed, and these things did not happen. I have a note here of a case which was called a short time before the court rose, towards four o'clock; it was heard probably for half an hour,—and I have seen cases called at twenty minutes before four,—then it stood in the roll for seven days unheard, while other cases were taken up and disposed of. The first day on which it was heard was 17th May; and it was not taken up again till 26th May, when it was again called half an hour or so before the court rose; next day, fortunately, it did come on, and it was heard and decided. That was a case of no difficulty, and it took less than two hours the third day to dispose of it. Now there certainly was a great waste of time there. If it had been put down for a certain day, an hour and a half would have disposed of it.

John Carment.

13,404. Mr. Baxter.—What led to other cases coming in before the further hearing of your case?—I have not the least idea. We only get our cases on when the court calls them. That rests with the court, not with us.

13,405. Mr. Gordon.—What was the nature of the case?—It was an advocation about a removing, and only a very small matter was at stake.

13,406. Was it a summar roll or a short roll case?—A short roll case.

13,407. But the court was occupied with other business in the interval?—Undoubtedly.

13,408. Do you not know what the other business was, and what gave it a priority?—I have no idea as to that. But I am not at all mentioning an isolated case. I am stating what is at least a frequent practice. It is by no means an exceptional case.

13,409. What was the name of your case?—Hally v. Lang, 17th May 1866.

13,410. Mr. Shand.—What you aim at is, that where a case has been begun, it should become a summar roll case practically?—It was done in that way of old. When a case was delayed, it generally went into the summar roll, and had the precedence. But speaking with deference, what would strike an ordinary man is this, that it is not desirable to call a case twenty minutes before the court rises, and that when a case is called and the hearing of it begun, that case should have precedence over other cases. I don't see why the practice should not now be what it was of old.

13,411. Mr. Baxter.—You see nothing to prevent a case which has been begun from being finished?—I see nothing to prevent the system now being the same as it was before, and which wrought exceedingly well. The most startling result of the system is the increased expense. By the practice which now prevails, counsel get refreshing fees after every partial hearing. In the case I spoke of the fees to counsel were fifteen guineas, and to counsel's clerks £2, 5s. The agents' fees for attendance and for sending the refreshers were £6, 6s. 8d.; the total expense of the Inner House hearing being £24, 6s. 8d.

13,412. Lord Barcaple.—Was that for one side or both sides?—One side. Now, had that case been heard according to the old practice, it would have stood thus—Fees to counsel, seven guineas, being the fees sent the first day, and which were liberal fees; clerks' fees, 15s.; agents, £1,—making together £9, 2s.: so that the difference of expense on one side, arising simply from the mode in which the case was dealt with, is £15, 4s. 8d.

13,413. The Chairman.—Has anything occurred to you as to the mode in which the summar roll should be dealt with?—It would seem to me that there could not be much difficulty as to that. Saturday is now devoted to the summar roll. It might be taken, if necessary, one other day in the week, without mixing up the summar and the short roll on the same day.

13,414. You would take the summar roll not on all days, but on two days of the week?—Yes.

13,415. Are you aware that prior to 1853 the summar roll was six months in arrear?—I am quite aware that of old the summar roll was largely in arrear, and that after 1853 there was a marked improvement in that respect—that the summar roll was kept up so that no person could complain that cases in it were not heard.

13,416. You think that was done at the expense of the short roll?—I am not satisfied that the improvement in regard to the summar roll necessitated the change we have had in regard to the short roll.

13,417. Are you aware that prior to 1853 the short roll was two and a half years in arrear?—I remember that it was largely in arrear, and that led to the order for additional sittings.

13,418. Have you any further suggestion to make as to the hearing of causes in the Inner House?—In regard to reclaiming notes, I think there is a very general feeling that the time should be limited to ten days; it is now twenty-one days. Our body, in reporting on the bill of 1868, reported in favour of that change.

13,419. Do you think that ten days would give you sufficient time to communicate with your clients in the country?—I think it would, as a general rule. Of course there would be cases, where parties were in a remote district, that might involve a little hardship. Ten days might be a little scrimp in some cases; but, on the whole, I think the balance of advantages is in favour of the ten days.

13,420. What do you describe as a little hardship to the parties who could not reclaim in ten days? Would it not be a losing of their case?—No. A reclaiming note could be boxed; and a party generally knows beforehand whether he intends to acquiesce or not.

13,421. Mr. Gordon.—Are you aware that reclaiming notes were required to be given in within six days, in many cases, by the last Act?—Yes; and that is one great improvement. I had omitted to mention that.

13,422. So that it is only interlocutors on the merits that have a longer period?—Yes.

13,423. Mr. Shand.—The period of twenty-one days was fixed at a time when we had not the same facilities for communication in Scotland as now exist?—Yes. It has been twenty-one days ever since I remember; but, with railways, the facilities are now much greater. There is another thing that I may mention in regard to Inner House hearings. We often feel that hearings are very much lengthened by the interruptions in the course of counsel's speeches. I have seen a case involving a pure question of law, in which I don't think it is an exaggeration to say that the counsel were interrupted at least once every five minutes, if not oftener. Now that undoubtedly has a tendency greatly to lengthen the time occupied in the discussion, and without, so far as I can see, any corresponding advantage.

13,424. The Chairman.—You would prefer allowing the counsel to state the case in his own way, to forcing him to state it out of his own order?—Certainly. Sometimes it assumes the attitude of a discussion between the court and the counsel; and it has occasionally seemed to me, as if it were the court trying to convince the counsel, instead of the counsel trying to convince the court.

13,425. Mr. Baxter.—Would it not be very difficult to find a remedy for that?—The remedy seems to me very obvious, because the judges should listen patiently to what the counsel says. Of course it may be necessary to interrupt him, if he is stating what is immaterial, or is repeating himself; and it is quite right, when counsel has stated his case, that the court should ask explanations, or suggest additional views on which they wish argument; but what we object to is the constant interruption and asking of questions while counsel are speaking.

13,426. You spoke of calling a case at twenty minutes before four o'clock. Do you think the court should rise at half-past three, if it comes to a new case?—What happened of old was this,—that the court did not consider it necessary to rise at a certain hour, or to fill up their time to a particular minute. If they got through their work earlier, they rose. If their cases were not finished, they sat on to hear them; and I well remember the court sitting till six o'clock in the afternoon to hear out a case.

13,427. The Chairman.—Are you aware that in 1853 there was a remonstrance from the practitioners against sitting till five o'clock?—I am quite aware that it is impossible to please everybody, and that what one desires somebody else objects to. I merely spoke of that as an exceptional case.

13,428. Lord Barcaple.—But do you speak of the court sitting on till five or six o'clock as a thing that prevailed during any number of years, or a thing that existed during some two or three sessions?—I certainly don't speak of it as a thing that ever was a prevailing practice. I only remember one instance of it in my own experience. I merely meant to illustrate, that it was not the practice of the court necessarily to rise at a certain hour, and to fill up their time till that hour came. I do not remember that it was ever the practice to sit so late as five or six o'clock; and I should not think it a commendable practice.

13,429. The Chairman.—You say you remember one instance. I think that was the day the court was going to rise for the Christmas recess, was it not?—No; it was at the end of the March session, and on that occasion they heard one case for seven hours. They desired to finish that case. My reference to it is purely as an exceptional case. I may also state that the cost of advisings is a matter of general complaint, because, as matters stand, we are supposed to have two counsel present on each side, and their clerks have to be fee'd, and the agents fee'd. The result of that is—I have made a note of it, and I can, if required, give the details—that to obtain the judgment of the court just now, costs £9, 2s. 8d. for the two sides.

13,430. On the day of advising?—Yes, and simply for attending to hear the judgment delivered. Now it does seem to us that this is out of all proportion to what most cases can afford; and it would certainly, in my judgment, be an improvement if the rule was laid down that a fee should only be allowed for a single counsel attending the advising of a case. The suggestion has been made, that the judges might write their opinions, and put them into process. I don't think that would do; but we all feel that advisings are much longer than they used to be. It is not uncommon to hear more than one judge go over in detail the facts of the case; and what strikes us is, that where the court are agreed, a single judge should deliver judgment; and it is not necessary that the others should do much more than express their concurrence.

13,431. Mr. Webster.—The delivery of long opinions consumes a considerable portion of the time of the Inner House?—Undoubtedly. I have mentioned all these things as matters increasing the time consumed in the Inner House. If we reverted more to what was the old practice, I think cases could be more rapidly got through, and more work done, in the Court of Session.

13,432. Mr. Shand.—Are there not many cases in which it is important for the party to have both his counsel present when a case is being advised, either with reference to the form of the judgment or the future procedure in the case?—There is a general impression that two heads are better than one, and there are cases in which a party may undoubtedly find it of advantage to have both his counsel present; but I think, as a general rule, that if a party desires that, one of the counsel should be at his own expense.

13,433. You would not make it an inflexible rule, then?—There are many cases in which it would involve no hardship to the losing party to pay for two counsel; but when you come to lay down a rule, I am afraid you cannot apply it to one case and not to another. It must be a general rule applicable to all cases.

13,434. The Chairman.—When you state that two counsel must be present at an advising, do you mean that, in order to ensure the presence of one, you must fee two, for I do not suppose the presence of two is required?—Well, there is a great deal of fictional attendance in the Parliament House, and it is a fictio juris that two are always present. What I meant was that two are fee'd.

13,435. And allowed by the auditor?—Yes.

13,436. Mr. Murray.—If both counsel were not fee'd, one might be taken by the opposite party?—That certainly is not a necessary result.

13,437. Would that not be so, according to the rules laid down by counsel?—There is a rule in regard to retainers, that if you do not instruct a counsel at a particular stage, the other party may take him; but I cannot imagine, that if it was considered a proper thing that only one counsel should be present, the Faculty would frustrate this by adhering to a rule of that kind.

13,438. At present is it not the rule that if you have not both your counsel at each important step of the cause, but you miss out one of them, he may be taken by the other side?—That is the rule.

13,439. Would the advising not be held to be an important step of the cause?—As it stands just now, it is so; but the object of my observations was to suggest that the present system should be altered.

13,440. Mr. Shand.—Would there not be a risk of the advising of causes being delayed if there was only one counsel employed, and he happened to be speaking in the other Division?—Of course there is an inconvenience there from a counsel taking the fees for work that he cannot do. But that goes into a very large question.

13,441. You do not suggest that if you have retained a counsel to hear the advising in a case, he should take no other business that day?—I don't know. When agents are paid for work, they are expected to do it; and I have never been able exactly to see why the same rule should not be applied to counsel.

13,442. A great part of the agent's work is done by substitute, is it not, in the Court of Session? An agent may have five or six clerks attending each to different cases at the same time?—Undoubtedly he may.

13,443. The Chairman.—I suppose an agent has not a power in himself more than a counsel, of being in two places at once?—Certainly not. I may state that the feeing of two counsel does not altogether secure you against that risk, because all of us have seen advisings going on when neither of the counsel was present.

13,444. Lord Barcaple.—Is the fee to counsel for advising, a fee at all in the same ratio as for attending the debate?—The fee for an advising to senior counsel is 2 guineas, and 1 guinea, or very often 2 guineas, to the junior. In the estimate I gave, I allowed 4 guineas for the two counsel.

13,445. Would it not be well if, by an arrangement of the fees upon the whole cause, you could manage to have the benefit of the attendance of your counsel—junior or senior, as the case might be—at the advising, if that should prove to be necessary?—That would completely get over the difficulty suggested by Mr. Shand; and of old—though some of my brethren have not quite the same recollection of that as I have—certainly in our office, the practice till recent years was not to fee separately for an advising. The counsel, when the papers were sent to him, got what was supposed to be an adequate fee for dealing with the whole cause, and if from any unforeseen circumstance the discussion was prolonged beyond what was anticipated, he got an additional fee; but it was not supposed to be necessary, if counsel were adequately fee'd at first, that, as matter of etiquette, an additional fee should be sent for other attendances; and, so far as I have been able to find from our books in former years, we were not in the practice of sending a separate fee. I have taken twelve Inner House cases from our books prior to 1853, and in only one have I found that a separate fee was sent for an advising.

13,446. The Chairman.—Have you anything more to say about the Inner House?—I think that exhausts what I have to say as regards that matter.

13,447. You are not satisfied in regard to the motion roll in the Outer House: have you any suggestion to make as to what should be the course of procedure?—My idea is, that all the motions should be made at chambers. At present, when the motions come before the Lords Ordinary, the Inner House meeting at ten o'clock, great inconvenience results from our not being able to get counsel to attend to the motions; and although the agent is at the bar, who probably would have to tell counsel what to say if he were present, the Lord Ordinary does not take the assistance of the agent. Of old it was not uncommon in the Outer House for the Lord Ordinary to ask the agent what he had to say. I have certainly seen some of the judges do that; and what I suggest is, that the clerk's motion roll should be entirely abolished, and the motions taken up as they were before the recent Act; that the judge should sit at chambers in dealing with the motion roll; and that if counsel are there, they should be heard, but that the agents should transact the motion business if counsel are not present.

John Carment.

13,448. What do you mean exactly by 'chambers'?—I don't mean that it should be done in the judge's house; but that, till the motion roll is finished, the judge should be supposed to be sitting at chambers, so that agents might discuss the motions.

13,449. Then what you mean by the judge sitting at chambers is, that he should hear the agents or counsel as either happened to be there?—Yes.

13,450. And that the judge should hear the motions instead of the clerks?—Yes. So far as my experience has gone, the motion roll, as now conducted before the clerks, is worse than useless.

13,451. Have you any suggestion to make about trial by jury?—I am quite aware that with many of my brethren trial by jury is not very popular; but my own impression is, that our law as to that matter should stand as it is at present, because there are only certain classes of cases peculiarly fitted for jury trial which are necessarily sent to a jury, and it remains to be decided whether other cases are fit for jury trial or not. I don't think that can be put on a better footing. I should be exceedingly sorry to see jury trial abolished. It would be contrary to the spirit and tendency of the age. I don't expect that can ever be accomplished, and I don't think it would be desirable.

13,452. Lord Barcaple.—Are there any cases at present which must necessarily go to a jury?—Probably not. I forgot that a recent statute had so far altered that.

13,453. Mr. Shand.—Practically, however, there are certain cases which always go to trial by jury?—Yes.

13,454. The Chairman.—You think that jury trials should continue to exist, and that there are some classes of cases which it might be very desirable to send to a jury?—Yes.

13,455. Have you any other suggestion?—In regard to jury trial, I think that a great part of the prejudice against it arises from the mode in which trials are conducted. Within the last ten or fifteen years the length of jury trials has been very much increased. Of old it rarely happened—unless it was a heavy case—that it went over till the second day; but now cases go on sometimes for eight days on end, and I cannot help thinking that many cases might be tried in half the time they now occupy.

13,456. Lord Barcaple.—Does anything occur to you in regard to the way in which these cases are lengthened? What creates the unnecessary length of them?—I don't think any intelligent agent attending a trial of that kind can fail to see what it is that lengthens the trial.

13,457. Then what is it?—One constantly sees discussions got up about little matters which occupy time, and which are really not material. And in regard to the examination of witnesses, one often wonders what all this examination is about, and what it has to do with the case. Of course I do not pretend to be so versant in these matters as counsel; but it has often seemed to me that the evidence might have been taken in half the time, and half these discussions avoided.

13,458. The Chairman.—Do you allude chiefly to the examination or the cross-examination?—I have seen both in the examination and in the cross-examination what seemed to me over-examination. Of course I speak with great deference on a matter of that sort.

13,459. Mr. Baxter.—Then you think it is a lengthening out of the case by counsel: is that it?—It is the system. At the same time I must say we never had more able or intelligent counsel at the bar than we have now.

13,460. Lord Barcaple.—Is there also an excess in the number of witnesses who are brought?—Unquestionably; and that goes into another matter—namely, the expense of jury trial. One constantly sees more witnesses brought up than are necessary, and a great many more documents recovered under diligence than have anything to do with the case. The witnesses brought up are sometimes examined in order that their expenses may be got, when if they had not been there, the case would have been closed without them.

13,461. Does it occur to you how the bringing of unnecessary witnesses is to be got over? What leads to it in the meantime?—It is a little difficult to say; but practically it arises in this way: Precognitions often come up from the country at a very late stage; the Edinburgh agents are hurried, and the counsel are hurried. The agent does not like to take the responsibility of fixing what witnesses should be cited, and who should not. He has a consultation with counsel, and counsel very often have little time to go through the papers with the numerous cases which are pressing on them, and they think it always safe to bring the witnesses; in short, to err on the safe side. The fact is that people get nervous about jury trials, somehow or other, in Scotland. I have always felt that they might be managed differently; but in point of fact they are not.

13,462. The Chairman.—Can you suggest to us how they could be managed differently? What remedy would you propose?—I have no doubt that by the combined action of the court and counsel and agents the matter might be put on a much better footing than it now is. It is one of those matters which you cannot reach by enactment; but by the prevalence of a better feeling, I think you could accomplish the desired result. Of course we look to the court to take the lead in these matters; and if they were to discourage the over-examination and lengthening out of cases, that might tend to it. I believe that counsel and our branch of the profession are all agreed that matters are not in a very satisfactory state at present, and that cases might be tried in a shorter time.

13,463. Lord Barcaple.—You say that witnesses are sometimes examined in order to entitle the party to charge the expense of bringing them up. Is there an understanding in the profession that if they are examined, the party is necessarily entitled to put them into his account?—In the case of a pursuer, I think the rule is, that he is not allowed the expense of witnesses who are not examined; and certainly I myself have done this;—when counsel have advised that certain witnesses should be cited, and it did not turn out at the trial that they were necessary to be examined, I have said to the counsel, 'Now you must examine these others very shortly, otherwise we shall lose the expense of bringing them up.'

13,464. The Chairman.—The negative that you cannot get them unless you examine them is established; but is there any positive rule that all the witnesses examined are to be paid for?—I don't know any instance in which the expense of witnesses examined for the pursuer has been disallowed. I think it would require rather an extreme case, because the answer made to it by the auditor is that the court have allowed the evidence, that they considered it material, and that therefore he must allow the expense.

13,465. Lord Barcaple.—When the witness has not been examined, does not the auditor look into the precognition?—I think the rule is, that where a witness for the pursuer has not been examined, the expense is disallowed. In regard to the defender, the auditor looks at the precognition; but a defender's witness is very frequently allowed although he has not been examined, because he may have been brought up to meet some branch of the pursuer's case which was not gone into.

13,466. Mr. Murray.—Do you not think that the court are over tender with counsel in not stopping them when they are manifestly wasting time? Don't you think the court might interfere oftener with advantage?—One often sees cases in which we would almost expect the judge to say, 'It is quite unnecessary to have further evidence as to that matter, unless the jury have a difficulty.' Matters are over and over again proved in the course of a trial, as to which there is no doubt.

13,467. The Chairman.—Have you not frequently heard the court say, 'Surely you have had enough on that point?'—That just shows the extent to which the abuse prevails.

13,468. Lord Barcaple.—Sometimes the court do not interpose effectively in that way; but did you ever see a jury ineffectual, when they interposed by saying that they had heard enough of it?—I don't remember that I have.

13,469. Mr. Clark.—Do you ever remember a jury interposing?—I don't know that I could recall just now an instance of that, but I think it sometimes happens. There is another matter that leads to great expense—namely, the adjusting of issues. I had a case not long ago which cost thirteen fees to counsel to get issues adjusted. We had eighteen different attendances in that case. There is a provision in the recent Act, that if both parties agree, the record may go to the jury without an issue; but I am afraid that as our records stand, we are hardly yet in a position to dispense altogether with the adjustment of issues.

13,470. Mr. Shand.—Are you aware that there was a case tried last sittings on the record without issues?—I did not know that.

13,471. Mr. Gordon.—What was the nature of the case which you have mentioned in which issues were adjusted?—It was rather a troublesome case undoubtedly, or what I have stated could not have happened. It arose out of one or more bankruptcies, and related to a cargo of sugar, and stoppage in transitu.

13,472. Mr. Clark.—Is it the case of Adamson, Howie, and Co.?—Yes; and I cite it as an exceptional case.

13,473. Mr. Gordon.—Was it an extreme case?—It was extreme in regard to the length of time occupied, and the number of attendances; but there are a number of cases in which it costs a great deal of expense and trouble to get issues adjusted.

13,474. Lord Barcaple.—With our present forms, does it occur to you that in any considerable proportion of the cases you could send them to a jury without adjusting an issue? What form of verdict would you take from the jury?—Not as the records have hitherto stood; but I do think that we have begun a considerable improvement under the new Act in the shape of records, and I am under the impression that it may turn out soon that in short and simple cases the record may go to the jury. I don't think we are ready for that yet.

13,475. But in a case having various complicated grounds of action, and various grounds of defence, and various admissions by a pursuer against a defender, could it be sent at present with any practical effect to the jury without any issues being adjusted?—I think not. We are not in a position to go farther at present than the recent Act carries us. There is another matter which I have been asked to state to the Commission, and it is this: The court of late years have often declined to grant commissions even for the examination of havers, except to counsel. Within the last few months a party required to recover some documents in Glasgow, for a jury trial coming on there. He could have got numerous commissioners in Glasgow perfectly competent to do the work, but he could not under the present system get anything else than a commission to counsel; and for a couple of hours' work he had to take the counsel and his clerk to Glasgow, at a cost of £11, 12s. Now, the feeling in our body is, that it is a mistake to limit these commissions to counsel. There are many cases in regard to the recovery of documents which an intelligent country procurator is quite competent for; and even in regard to the examination of witnesses, it seems to us that the present rule throws a burden on the parties which increases the cost of litigation, without any corresponding advantage.

13,476. Mr. Baxter.—That must be a recent practice, for I have taken commissions from the Court of Session?—It is very much the practice now.

13,477. Lord Barcaple.—In that statement of the practice of the court do you include the Outer House?—Yes. I am quite aware that the rule is not universal; and perhaps one judge does it, and another does not. I myself got not long ago a commission to an agent in a country town; but I know it is a very general subject of complaint just now, that it is refused in many cases.

13,478. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Can you mention any case in the Second Division of the court in which an application to appoint as a commissioner a professional man at the place where the examination is to be conducted, has been refused within the last two or three years?—I cannot state any case of refusal. The rule in both Divisions seems to be to grant these commissions to counsel. The matter has been brought under my notice as Preses of the Society of Solicitors, and I have no doubt that I could furnish the Commission with a number of instances of what I have stated.

13,479. Lord Barcaple.—As a general rule, the party, in moving for a commission, does not propose the name of any commissioner?—No.

13,480. He simply moves for a commission?—Yes.

13,481. And unless the parties concur in proposing a commissioner, the court take that matter in their own hands?—It rests entirely with the court.

13,482. The Chairman.—Is there any other suggestion which you wish to make?—I think not as to Inner House procedure. In regard to petitions under the Entail Acts, it seems to be understood that it is necessary to set forth the whole clauses of the Entail Act which are founded upon. Many agents would be quite willing not to insert these in framing petitions, but they don't know how the court would deal with that. I have seen petitions under some of the old Acts for selling land to redeem the land tax, and I was struck with their conciseness—simply referring to the statute and the clauses, without setting them forth. It seems to me that it would be a great improvement if the court would let it be understood that it is not necessary in entail petitions to insert the clauses of the Act founded on, but simply to refer to them. In the Teind Court, when petitions for feuing glebes were first presented, parties set forth the clauses of the Act, and the court intimated that that was not necessary. Then, in regard to actions of reduction, where a party has an interest to oppose a reduction, it is exceedingly difficult to get a decree with any reasonable speed, because the form is, that if you have any objection to the title—and this is put forward in almost every case where delay is an object—you can give in a preliminary defence, which is first disposed of. Now I don't see any reason why the procedure in reductions should not be assimilated to that in other processes. The defender should state his whole defences at once, and then, upon a motion for an order to satisfy the production, the Lord Ordinary should deal with that matter, and decide whether the production should be satisfied or not.

13,483. That would get rid of a good deal of delay?—It would.

13,484. On the other hand, in some cases, might it not add to the expense if it was required that the whole merits of the case should be set forth on record before dealing with that, if there was a refusal to satisfy the production?—Under the present form of process I don't think it would, because when preliminary defences in a reduction are given in, you must answer the whole averments in the summons articulately, whether they relate to the merits or not; and practically, when preliminary defences are lodged in a reduction, they embrace, in my experience, everything almost that is afterwards put in as the defences on the merits. Under the old form it was different; and a short defence was lodged applicable to the preliminary matter simply.

13,485. Mr. Shand.—It is a common practice now, is it not, to include defences on the merits in the preliminary defences, with the view of holding that very paper as the defences on the merits at the next stage?—So far as my experience goes, I should say that in the majority of cases—perhaps in nine out of ten—the defences given in as preliminary are afterwards held as defences on the merits.

John Carment.

13,486. Mr. Gordon.—Are there not some cases in which it is the privilege of the defender to stand on his title to exclude investigation into his title, without being obliged to plead upon the merits until the pursuer has established that he has a title to challenge it?—Undoubtedly; but that privilege would not be in the least impaired, because, as the form now stands, he has to meet the whole statement of facts in his preliminary defences. I cannot see that any practical inconvenience would arise.

13,487. At present he is not obliged to make his whole statement, or to do more than show that the pursuer has not a title to inquire into his title?—That involves answering articulately the whole condescendence of facts for the pursuer.

13,488. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion?—I don't see any reason why actions of proving the tenor should be Inner House processes, instead of being dealt with in the Outer House like any other action.

13,489. If they were Outer House processes, would you allow a reclaiming note?—Certainly. I would put a proving of the tenor on the same footing as any other action, let it be originated in the Outer House, and the proof be taken there; and if either party desired to reclaim, let it be open to do so.

13,490. It very often happens that nobody appears to oppose a proving of the tenor. In such a case, suppose the Lord Ordinary thinks there is enough proved, but it afterwards turns out that the deed exists, or that it is different from what appears from the proof, what would happen then? A proving of the tenor is sometimes a very delicate matter, and the court has to guard the interests of parties who cannot be present in the suit?—Undoubtedly that is so; but the result would be this, that what the court now do, the Lord Ordinary would do; and if the parties were satisfied with his judgment, they would acquiesce in it. If there was only one party present, and the Lord Ordinary did not see meet to hold the tenor of the deed proven, that party would have it in his option to reclaim to the Inner House.

13,491. But if the Lord Ordinary did think there was enough proved, and there was no party opposing, it would not go further?—I am not merely giving my own suggestion in this matter; it was considered by the Society of Solicitors when they reported on the bill of 1868. We considered it carefully, and reported in favour of making it an Outer House process.

13,492. Have you any further suggestion? — In actions for the giving up of tutorial inventories, the present system is cumbrous and expensive to a degree; and I would suggest that it should not be necessary to appoint a delegate, which is a useless form, or to lodge the inventory in triplicate. There are often inventories with long descriptions, and these require to be written out in triplicate, which serves no purpose except to create expense. What occurs to me is, that tutors should lodge their inventories with the Accountant of Court in the same way as is required by the Pupils' Protection Act.

13,493. Mr. Morton.—And you would dispense with the process altogether?—Yes. Then, in actions for choosing curators, there is a form at present, that if parties are out of the jurisdiction, you must petition the court to dispense with citing them. That is always granted when it is asked; and it would be as well to supersede altogether the necessity of presenting such a petition. Judicial factories, properly so called, are not as yet put under the control of the Accountant of Court, and it is not easy to understand why they should not be so, as well as other factories. I believe it arose from an omission in the Pupils' Protection Act when originally framed, and we suggested that it should be put into some of the recent Acts; but that has not been done. There can be no reason why these factories should not be under the control of the Accountant of Court. We also asked that some provision should be made by which, if the Signet Office is to be continued, summonses should be signeted, although partly printed and partly written. At present, however long a summons is, a manuscript copy has to be made for the purpose of being signeted, and for no other purpose.

13,494. Mr. Baxter.—Do you see any use for keeping up the Signet Office?—Certainly not. That is one of the things that our body complains of. The late Lord Advocate proposed to alter that matter; but some opposition got up, and it was dealt with as it now stands in the Act of 1868. I may state that our body of solicitors transacts nearly two-thirds of the whole business before the court, and we cannot understand why we should not be allowed to bring summonses into court without the intervention of a Writer to the Signet. The signet is the idlest form in the world: it is merely stamping the document with a scarcely perceptible stamp. Teind summonses, Commissary summonses, and other writs in our court, are signed by clerks of court; and what occurs to us is, that the form of adhibiting the signet to summonses should be abolished, and that they should be signed by the clerk of court in the same way as Teind summonses are signed by the Teind-clerk.

13,495. The Chairman.—By any of the clerks of court?—Yes, by any of the judges' clerks.

13,496. Mr. Murray.—Why should not the agent sign them?—A summons is a writ supposed to be issued by somebody; and I think it should have the authentication of the clerk of court. It should issue under the authority of the court.

13,497. Lord Barcaple.—A Sheriff Court summons is signed by the Sheriff-clerk?—Yes.

13,498. Mr. Gordon.—Might it not occasionally give rise to delay if a clerk were required to sign it, which delay would be avoided if the agent signed it?—Of course, an agent is always nearer his own summons than a clerk of court; but, as our summonses now stand, I don't think it is a desirable change that they should be issued without the intervention of an officer of court.

13,499. What check is the adhibiting of the signet to the summons?—I don't understand the object of it.

13,500. Has any evil resulted from a summons being issued signed by an agent?—I am not aware of it.

13,501. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—With regard to the appointment of factors, there is often just now considerable hardship in the case of small estates, from the expense of getting a judicial appointment, and a judicial discharge being so heavy as it is; and it seems to me these matters might be very much simplified. Petitions for the appointment of factors are almost invariably drawn by the agents, and I think it should be considered chamber work: the agent should sign the petition;—it should be presented to the Lord Ordinary, and dealt with as a Bill Chamber proceeding now is. In that way, a factor could be appointed for an expense of about £6, instead of double that sum, as now. Then, in regard to discharges, it is at present necessary to present a separate petition for a discharge: it would be much better—as the process is always supposed to be a subsisting process—that when the factor has wound up the estate, he should simply lodge a note craving the accountant to examine and audit his accounts; and that upon this being done, and the accounts found correct, the accountant should append his docquet as he does now, that the case should then be enrolled, and that on a simple motion the discharge should be granted. As an illustration of what happens at present, I may state that this occurred: A judicial factor brought a multiplepoinding to distribute the estate under his management. The matter was discussed, the estate distributed, and the factor exonerated of his intromissions. He then applied to the judge for an order to get up his bond of caution; but the judge thought that could only be done under a formal petition for discharge; he so ruled, and the estate was burdened with the expense of about £20 for that.

13,502. Was the expense of the petition £20?—It was not a case of my own, but I was told of it; and my recollection is, the expense was stated to amount to that. It frequently happens that the expense of a discharge amounts to something like that sum.

13,503. Have you any other suggestion?—In regard to appeals from the Sheriff, under the former Act the party was allowed six days to advocate, and after these six days the party who had got the judgment was entitled to extract. By the recent Act, that has been extended to twenty-one days. Now, since the abolition of the provision as to caution, appeals seem to be rather more resorted to for purposes of delay than formerly; and it occurs to me that this extension of time is not very judicious, and that it would be better to let that matter stand as it did before the late Act.

13,504. Mr. Baxter.—Do you mean the finding of caution?—No; I mean the time for extracting. Under the old Act, a party could not force back the process for extract till six days had elapsed; under the new Act, that time has been extended to twenty-one days. I see no reason for that extension.

13,505. Mr. Shand.—Do you approve of the abolition of caution in these cases?—When our society was reporting on the bill, that matter was very fully discussed, and there was great diversity of opinion about it. I am not prepared to say anything against it; it is a matter which must be tested by experience, and there has not been time to test it as yet.

13,506. The Chairman.—Can you give us any suggestion as to economizing and expediting accountings?—That is partly connected with another matter. I think our whole system of clerks of court is a bad one. It seems to me that a great deal of the work that is now done by reporters paid by litigants should be done by the clerks of court; and if that matter could be put upon a better footing, I think there might be an accounting clerk—an officer of court—versant in these matters, who would do that sort of work. Our accountants are men of the highest eminence and integrity; but it is not a good system that a reporter should be paid according to the size of his reports; and I think if any system could be devised by which that kind of work and other work should be done by an officer of court, it would be a great improvement on the present system.

13,507. Mr. Webster.—With the present establishment of clerks of court, that is out of the question?—I don't know what you mean by the present establishment, because I don't think that the clerks of court are by any means overburdened with work. It would be quite inapplicable to the existing clerks of court, because they have not been appointed on that footing, and they have not had the necessary training; but I don't see any reason why, if the petition business, for instance, was distributed amongst the five Lords Ordinary, the existing staff of Outer House clerks, probably with somewhat increased salaries, should not undertake all the work. And in regard to the Inner House clerks, I don't think they would be unduly burdened though the remits which the court not unfrequently make to professional men were made to the clerks of court, and I should think it would be more satisfactory to the court to have that work done by their own officers.

13,508. The Chairman.—Would you have them to attend in court during the sitting of the court?—I think that the attendance of one of the Inner House clerks in court would be quite enough.

13,509. And you would leave them to arrange which of them should attend?—Yes.

13,510. Have you anything to suggest about multiplepoindings, or do you think the late Act sufficiently simplifies them and reduces the expense?—There are a great many of these matters as to which I am quite satisfied with the late Act, until we have some further trial of its working. In regard to various matters, there has not yet been time to judge of its effects. In many of its provisions, it was a step in the right direction, and I think it should have a fair trial.

13,511. Lord Barcaple.—Does that last observation include the matter of the change made upon the records, which generally I understand you to approve of? At present, in the great majority of cases where the defender makes a statement, there is no answer to it by the pursuer. Have you been able as yet to judge how that works?—I have considered that matter, but I have not yet had sufficient experience of it to enable me to give an opinion.

13,512. You mentioned, in regard to proofs before the Lords Ordinary, that that mode of taking the evidence has led to much less expense of time than when it was taken by commission. Does it occur to you that there is any other benefit got in the mere taking of the evidence, by its being before the Lord Ordinary? Is the proof itself shorter when it is written out?—I think, upon the whole, the proof is shorter, and that fewer witnesses are examined. Of course cases varied very much of old: sometimes the proof was very long, and I have seen it as concise as could be wished; but I think it is an advantage to have the proof taken before the judge who is to deal with the evidence.

13,513. But have you observed whether the proofs taken before the Lord Ordinary are, as a general rule, shorter or longer than the proofs taken by commission?—My impression is that they are shorter, but I have not tested that matter. Cases varied very much of old, and it would be difficult to strike the average.

13,514. Have you attended many of these proofs?—Not many.

13,515. Have you found the controversy which you spoke of as prevailing in jury trials, prevailing also in the proofs?—To a certain extent it prevails; but I think it prevails far more largely in jury trials, and, so far as my experience goes, I should think there is comparatively little of it before the Lord Ordinary.

13,516. Has that been your experience?—Yes.

13,517. You have said you think that benefit has resulted from the debate being taken immediately at the end of the proof. Do you rest that upon your experience of cases that you have had, or do you say so because it appears to be a good thing in itself?—My own experience as to these is somewhat limited; but in any cases I have had, I considered it an advantage that the hearing should take place when the evidence was fresh in the minds of counsel and of the judge. It conduces to despatch and also to economy.

13,518. In the cases which you have had, was the question mainly one of fact alone, or were they cases involving questions of law of considerable importance and difficulty?—Chiefly questions of fact.

13,519. Suppose the case to involve important and difficult questions of law, does it occur to you that it is a reasonable way of dealing with it, that it shall be argued at the end of the proof by one counsel on each side, without any reply?—Of course in all these matters there are advantages and disadvantages on either side, and I have no doubt that cases do occur in which nice questions of law are raised, and where it might be an advantage to have a more deliberate discussion; but, taking the cases as a whole, I think the present system is a good one, and I don't think it would do to introduce any exception, because, if it was made discretionary, the result would be that in almost every instance the discussion would be postponed.

13,520. Taking the cases which go to proof before the Lords Ordinary, are there not a very large proportion of them which do involve exceedingly important questions of law?—Undoubtedly some of them do.

13,521. Do you think it is a good mode of disposing of very important questions of law, that the judge should have to decide them, having only heard one counsel on each side, the speeches being taken on the spur of the moment at the end of the proof?—I don't think it is always on the spur of the moment, because counsel know beforehand what points are likely to arise; and even in the course of taking the proof, counsel have time to think over the matter, and to refer to their books. I don't doubt that individual cases can be pointed out where it might be better to have an adjournment so as to have the matter more fully considered; but, so far as I can judge, the present system is not a bad one.

John Carment.

13,522. Are there not a great proportion of cases in which there is no difficulty at all about the fact when the evidence has been led?—There are many cases of that kind.

13,523. But where there is a great deal of difficulty about the law?—Undoubtedly.

13,524. Mr. Gordon.—Do you not know that adjournments sometimes do take place where the case involves important points of law?—I know that formerly it used to be so.

13,525. The 32d section of the Act provides that no adjournment shall be allowed except on special cause stated in an interlocutor, and that the evidence shall be summed up by one counsel on each side at the conclusion of the examination of the witnesses, as in the case of jury trials. Might not the cases to which you have alluded, if not already falling under the clause as to adjournment, be provided for by an enactment, that where important matter of law is involved, the argument may be adjourned?—The objection would be, that it is exceedingly difficult to say what an unimportant matter of law is. I am afraid that if an enactment of that sort were made, it would be found that almost every case fell within its scope.

13,526. Lord Barcaple.—Suppose that a really difficult point of law is raised by the defender's counsel in his argument, how is that to be dealt with under the existing practice?—I should imagine that it is in the discretion of the judge to do what is necessary to have the case fully argued. Although the general rule is that one counsel opens and another answers, and that ends the discussion, I cannot suppose the meaning of the Act to be, that whatever new points the defender's counsel may raise, the other is to have no reply. The object is to have a fair discussion.

13,527. Then, do you interpret the clause as giving four speeches if the parties wish it?—No; what I interpret it as meaning is this, that parties are to be heard by one counsel on each side. That may generally mean that they are to have one speech each, as in jury cases; but manifest injustice might arise in the case which has been put, if the pursuer's counsel did not make some reply; and my understanding is that any judge, in these circumstances, would do what was necessary for the justice of the case.

13,528. Are you aware whether there has been a third speech in any case since the Act was passed?—I am not aware.

13,529. You have said that you think the summary debate roll does not work very well; but the result now is that every case goes to a roll—either to the general debate roll or to the summary debate roll—immediately on the cause being ready for discussion?—Yes.

13,530. Does it not occur to you that it is proper that there should be a general roll of causes, into which every case should go when the parties have joined issue by closing a record?—I can only judge of that from practical experience, and not as matter of theory; and my experience is, that the summary debate roll works more unsatisfactorily to the profession and to litigants than the Act of Sederunt of 1865 did. I am not prepared to say that the summary debate roll might not have been so managed as to serve the purpose intended; but at present, in a large number of cases, the debates are full debates, and the result is that there may be a case thirty or forty down the roll which could be disposed of in a few minutes, but it stands on the roll for a month unless both parties can be got to go up and mention it; and it is very seldom that both parties are equally desirous to go on. Under the Act of Sederunt of 1865 the parties would have gone up within a day or two after the record was closed, and got an order for proof.

13,531. I thought you said you could not get two parties to agree to go up?—It was different under the Act of 1865, as the case was in the motion roll, and parties went up when the case was called. In referring to the summary debate roll, what I said was that you could not get two parties to go up together and ask the case to be taken out of its order.

13,532. But does it not occur to you that, as causes are prepared and records closed, they should one by one go down in their order in the roll of court, leaving the mode of afterwards disposing of them to be determined according to the nature of the case?—I think I have substantially answered that. I am not prepared to say that that is necessary, because the Act of Sederunt of 1865, which dealt with that rather differently, worked exceedingly well.

13,533. Was there not this great objection to it, that causes in which there was a proof to be taken, no matter how small and unimportant that proof might be, immediately got precedence? There were numerous provisions for compelling proofs to be rapidly taken, either by jury trial or otherwise; and a cause that involved points of great importance, but no proof, stood over?—It is impossible to devise any plan that shall be absolutely free from disadvantage. I am not prepared to suggest any new mode of dealing with cases; and as between the summary debate roll and the Act of Sederunt of 1865, I have no hesitation in preferring the latter.

13,534. The two do not exactly deal with the same matter; but since the passing of the Act of 1868 the Lord Ordinary knows what causes there are with closed records depending before him, and that is a change upon all previous procedure; he had no means of knowing that formerly?—He had not.

13,535. Is it not very desirable that every court should know what causes are ready to be disposed of?—Undoubtedly the system has that advantage.

13,536. Without its being a summary debate roll, it would have that advantage, if all the causes, immediately upon the record being closed, went down in a roll, and then, according to their nature, were disposed of under regulations made for that purpose?—I should like to see the regulations, and then I might be able to judge whether they would accomplish the end designed; but I think there would be some difficulty in framing them.

13,537. You think the regulations in the Act of Sederunt of 1865 were good regulations?—What I meant to say was, that I preferred the Act of Sederunt of 1865 to the present system. Of course every human system is attended with disadvantage, more or less; but as between the two, I prefer the Act of Sederunt of 1865. I did not mean to say that it was perfection, or the best that could be devised.

13,538. Mr. Gordon.—The Act of 1865 provided that where parties did not renounce further probation, the case should be adjourned; and then if they did not consent to renounce probation, there should be an interlocutor pronounced, appointing an issue or a proof, or a debate on the cause?—Yes; the parties were heard summarily at the end of the motion roll.

13,539. What is the difference between being heard summarily at the end of the motion roll, and being sent to a summary debate roll?—The practical difference is this, that under the Act of 1865 summary meant summary, and the cases were taken up within a limited period; as it stands now, the summary roll means a roll which is never got through.

13,540. Does not that arise from the circumstance of the Lords Ordinary having been employed a good deal last winter in hearing advocations?—That helped it. Whether it might not in different circumstances have wrought better, I am not prepared to say; but in existing circumstances it has wrought ill.

13,541. Lord Barcaple.—Does it look as if there was to be any improvement this session?—No doubt a little more progress is being made.

13,542. Do you know anything about the amount that is coming in to make up for that?—I know that I have a case in one of the Lords Ordinary's summary debate rolls, which stood not far from the top of the roll for some time last session, and it stands No. 4 still.

13,543. Mr. Shand.—You have said that a case which might be disposed of in a few minutes is frequently delayed for a long time. Would there be any difficulty in the Lord Ordinary going through the roll, and taking up those cases which it was evident would come either to orders for proof or issues, letting those in which there must be a heavy debate, stand?—I am afraid there would be some practical difficulty in regard to that. The Lord Ordinary would require to announce that all the counsel and agents having cases in the roll should appear before him. I don't see how that is to be managed. He must hear the parties.

13,544. Does not a slight examination of the case show whether there must be an inquiry into fact?—No doubt the Lord Ordinary, by looking at the records, might pick out a case here and there.

13,545. The cases are all on the roll for a particular day: might he not dispose of those that are so dealt with?—If the roll had been dealt with in that way, it might have wrought differently.

13,546. Mr. Clark.—You alluded to one case in which thirteen fees had been sent to counsel for the adjustment of issues. Was that the case of Adamson, Howie, and Co.?—Yes.

13,547. Was it a case involving a large amount?—I don't know what you call a large amount. The amount was considerable.

13,548. Between £4000 and £5000?—I don't think it exceeded £4000.

13,549. Was that a case of unusual difficulty?—It was rather a nice case, and I cited it as an exceptional case.

13,550. Did not the adjustment of the issues involve discussion upon relevancy in the Outer House?—I think so.

13,551. And did it not involve discussion on the relevancy before the Inner House?—It did.

13,552. Did not the Inner House put it out a second time to be discussed upon relevancy?—It was put out repeatedly.

13,553. It was heard on the relevancy in the First Division, and they took it to avizandum; but a point had been omitted upon which they ordered further argument?—I don't remember it so distinctly as that, but I know that the question of relevancy was discussed. It was a case of difficulty.

13,554. And all that was involved in what you said was the adjustment of issues?—Yes; it all arose on the adjustment of issues, in settling the form of issues which should be sent to the jury.

13,555. And which largely settled the right of the pursuer to recover?—I don't know that.

13,556. Lord Barcaple.—Would not that discussion have been necessary whether it had been the practice to adjust issues before a jury trial or not? Would it not have been necessary before determining that the case should be tried?—Not the discussion which we had in that case. There would have been a discussion before the Lord Ordinary on the relevancy, and he would have dealt with it.

13,557. That was what the Lord Ordinary did. He could not in point of form pronounce a judgment, but he reported that the case was maintained to be irrelevant, and he gave his views on the relevancy as fully as if he had pronounced judgment?—The course of the case was quite different from what it would have been if it had been a discussion on the relevancy heard first before the Lord Ordinary, and then appealed to in the Inner House and decided.

13,558. Mr. Clark.—Were there not three discussions in succession on the relevancy,—one before the Outer House, one before the Inner House, and another, by order of the court, before the Inner House?—I can give every calling of the case, and what was done at each, if that is of any importance. I have it all noted.

13,559. Mr. Shand.—It has been suggested that agents in the country should have the power of practising in the Court of Session. What is your opinion upon that subject?—Our society dealt with that matter in reporting on the bill of 1868; and what we reported was, that we saw no objection to country agents following their cases to the Court of Session; and that we did not see why it should be restricted to agency merely, or why they might not, if they chose, discuss their cases in the Court of Session as they do before the Sheriff. Our body had no objection to that course being adopted.

13,560. What is your own opinion upon that matter?—It is scarcely a practical question. I myself see no objection to all procurators being admitted by the authority of the court, and practising wherever they like. I see no objection to the abolishing of all monopolies; but practically it is impossible that country agents can practise in Edinburgh, and it would merely be a means of introducing the English system of doing business on agency terms.

13,561. When you say you see no objection to their practising, I presume you mean practising as agents?—Yes, that is what I mean.

13,562. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions?—Yes, I have some suggestions as to the Teind Court; and there are various other matters in the programme furnished to me, on which I should like to state my views.

(Examination adjourned.)

THURSDAY, 20TH MAY 1869.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.
THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.
THE LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.
LORD BARCAPLE.
E. S. GORDON, Esq., Q.C.
DR. BARCLAY.
JAMES CAMPBELL, Esq.
JAMES ADAM, Esq.
A. B. SHAND, Esq.
T. G. MURRAY, Esq.
CHARLES MORTON, Esq.
JAMES WEBSTER, Esq.
J. B. BAXTER, Esq.
ADAM PATERSON, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

JOHN CARMENT, Esq. Examination continued.

13,563. The Chairman.—You had some further suggestions to make to the Commission?—There is one thing which I omitted to advert to yesterday in speaking of petitions for the appointment of factors. I explained that, by allowing these to be signed by agents, and by superseding petitions for discharge, the expense might be reduced to a very small sum; but I omitted to refer specifically to the fee-fund dues, and that my view was that, if not in all cases, certainly in cases of small amount, the fee-fund dues should not be exacted. These amount to about £1, 18s. on each petition.

13,564. Mr. Baxter.—You referred yesterday to the management of the Inner House rolls now and at a former period, and you gave us an instance of the expense of a case heard under the old practice, and a case heard under the present system. Would you state whether it was an exceptional case that you gave us, or a sample of what usually occurs now?—I am sorry to say that it was by no means an exceptional case, and I can furnish the Commission with as many similar instances as they please. It is a thing, unfortunately, of almost everyday occurrence; and the evil, unless it has been diminished very recently, has been on the increase.

John Carment.

13,565. Have you any statement of an average of cases?—Some time ago, in order to satisfy my own mind as to the working of the thing, and to make sure that I was not theorizing, but proceeding upon facts, I had our books gone over, and selected twelve Inner House cases as dealt with about the time I commenced to attend Parliament House business in 1842 and downwards, and I then selected—taking them very much at random—twelve Inner House cases as these have been dealt with for the last three or four years; and I can state the result of that comparison in figures, showing how the expense has been increased by the mode in which the rolls are managed, and the hearing of the cases conducted.

13,566. Would you be kind enough to give us it?—In the twelve cases from 1842 to 1852 there were only two in which the hearing extended over more than one day. One of these was a troublesome question of accounting, and the other a proving of the tenor, which was continued to print an additional document. In the rest of these cases, the hearing was concluded on the day for which they were put out. In only one of these cases had there been written argument. Taking next the twelve cases commencing in 1865 and coming down to December last, there is only one of them where the hearing was completed in one day. The others occupied, some two days, some three, and in one instance four days. None of them were heavy cases, but just the ordinary run of Inner House cases.

13,567. Mr. Adam.—Were these cases taken just as they occurred in your books, or were they selected?—They were taken as fair samples of the ordinary run of Inner House cases, avoiding cases of unusual length or difficulty.

13,568. Mr. Baxter.—Can you give us the expense of both sets of cases?—In regard to the twelve cases during the last few years, there is this to be taken into account, that not only was a longer time occupied in hearing them, but they stood in the roll for days without being heard, at a cost of 13s. 4d. each day for attendances. There is only one of the twelve that was taken up on the day it was put out; the others stood, some of them two days, three days, four days, five, six, nine, and one of them twelve days in the roll, besides the days on which the hearing took place.

13,569. These are the recent cases?—Yes. Then, in regard to the expense of the hearings, I have struck an average of each set of cases; and I find that in the first set, the average of the twelve for fees to counsel was £8, 1s.; fees to counsel's clerks, 17s. 6d.; agent's fees, £1, 7s. 2d. In the second set of cases the average of counsel's fees was £18, 12s. 9d.; clerks, £2, 11s. 10d.; agents, £5.;—making a total of £10, 5s. 8d. for the first set, as compared with £26, 4s. 7d. for the second set. It is right to state that a part of that excess is due to a somewhat increased scale of fees to counsel. In the office in which I was bred, we were not remarkable for feeing counsel beyond what was considered necessary. Of late years everything has risen, and counsel, for the same work, receive rather a larger fee than formerly; so that, irrespective of anything in the management of the rolls and the mode of hearing cases, I should have expected that the expense of counsel's fees would have been a little larger.

13,570. To what do you impute the uncertainty of a case being heard on the day for which it is set down?—I consider it a very unfortunate result of the present system, that neither counsel, nor agent, nor client, nor country agent can tell with any degree of certainty beforehand when a case is to come on.

13,571. Does that arise from the quantity of business set down on the roll for the day?—It arises from the way in which the rolls are managed,—from a long roll of cases being put out, and the uncertainty as to how long previous cases may take. I am aware that there must always be a certain amount of difficulty about the management of the rolls, but I am under the impression that the present system is capable of great improvement. There is also another evil connected with it. A country correspondent sometimes writes to us: 'I am not satisfied that the Sheriff's judgment is right; can you tell me what it would cost to get the opinion of the Inner House?' Of old we could have approached the amount with a reasonable degree of certainty; but now we are obliged to say, 'It is impossible to tell,—it may be £20, or £30, or £50,' because, as I stated yesterday, there was a cost of £8 in one case incurred for attendances before it came on. I do not doubt in the least that the judges are most anxious from their point of view to manage matters in the best possible way, and I am merely stating how it strikes us from our point of view.

13,572. Do you consider it of importance often to have your client or country agent present at an advising?—It may be said that it is not of much practical importance, but that is not my view. I think it is of the utmost consequence that a client should have it in his power to attend and hear his case discussed. It is of great importance in a country like ours that the Court of Session should command the complete confidence of the public; and I cannot conceive anything more conducive to that end than that a litigant should attend in court, hear his cause ably argued, and see it carefully considered by the judges; and the result will be, that though the decision may be against him, he feels that every justice was done to his case. At present he cannot have that satisfaction.

13,573. Lord Barcaple.—Do I understand you to say that it is your experience that cases are not only less certainly heard on the day when they are put down, and more frequently heard in portions upon more than one day than they used to be, but also that the argument upon them actually occupies much longer time than it used to do?—Certainly I intended to say so. My recollection is, as matter of fact, that the arguments now are considerably longer than they used to be, and as matter of theory it is precisely what I would expect to result from the system that is now followed.

13,574. Do you attribute that greater length of the debates to any one cause; and if so, what is it?—I am not prepared to say that I do. Of course one must take into account this, that of old, in cases of importance or difficulty, we had written argument, the effect of which was that counsel did not consider it necessary to plead the case at such length in the Inner House; and I think the effect of that training was, that even in cases where there was no written argument, the counsel were not so—I don't like to use the word prolix, but whatever the suitable word may be—as they are now. That is the result of my observation.

13,575. In those days, was it not a common thing for the President of the Division to say to the counsel, where there had been written argument, 'Well, gentlemen, are we to have any further argument in this case;' and to be answered, 'We don't think that necessary; we leave it upon the writing?'—I don't remember at this moment that precise thing; but I think this very often happened—and I remember a particular instance of it—where the case had been fully argued in writing, but we thought it advisable that there should be some further argument, because one is never sure whether the judges may have thoroughly studied the papers, and the senior counsel got up and said he had a few observations to add; but the discussion was very short. Senior counsel alone spoke.

13,576. I think you said yesterday that the senior counsel always spoke first?—I did not mean exactly to say that. The discussion was often left entirely to senior counsel in the Inner House. I would just like to add, as to the mode in which Inner House cases are now dealt with, that from my position as Preses of the Society of Solicitors, I have the means of knowing pretty accurately what the sentiments of my brethren are on that matter; and I believe I am right in saying that the feeling of dissatisfaction with the present system is almost universal.

13,577. Have you observed any change on the general character of the causes which have been coming into the Court of Session since you began to practise, in reference either to their amount and importance, or to their complexity and the number of important and difficult questions which they involve?—Of course one judges of that by his own experience. Our own Parliament House business has been of late years considerably larger than it was when I entered the office; and in a mercantile country like ours it is what one would expect, that new and complicated cases should arise. My experience is, that we have had probably heavier and more complicated cases of late years than the general run of cases formerly, though we had of old a number of heavy cases. If you take a general average, I am not prepared to say that they are more difficult and important questions now than they were twenty-five years ago.

13,578. Have you directed your attention to that point?—No; I am only stating what occurs to me at the moment.

13,579. You were asked yesterday as to a case which was said to involve about £4000 in one aspect of it,—whether that was not a case of great importance. Was that, according to your experience of the causes now coming into court, a case of unusual amount, or materially beyond the average?—Certainly. In our own office the bulk of our cases do not involve anything like £4000. The majority of them relate to smaller matters.

13,580. Do you mean to sums under £1000?—Some of the cases that have cost us most in fees to counsel, in the list which I gave, did not involve matters of £30, apart from expenses; and therefore we felt the amount of the fees to be a hardship. The case which stood in the roll for twelve days without being heard, and cost so much for agents' fees, was a paltry case, at the instance of a man who was dismissed from a friendly society on the plea that he was drunk, and he got some £5 of damages.

13,581. Was that an advocation?—No. The action was raised in the Court of Session.

13,582. Mr. Gordon.—Was it a jury trial?—No. The court intimated that they thought we were wrong, and that we had better settle the case on the easiest terms we could. They would have found against us, and we settled it on that expression of opinion. In regard to the case of Adamson, Howie, and Co. referred to yesterday, it seemed to be supposed that my version of it was not correct. Now, I have looked into it since, and I find that I was right; and that the expense to which I referred was almost solely connected with the adjustment of issues, and arose mainly from the pursuer presenting issues in the first instance, which were latterly found to be unsuitable for the trial of the case. The issues were ultimately drawn by the court, and the result was that the pursuer abandoned the action. We were sued with reference to the same sum by a different party. The pursuers of the two actions, I believe, made some arrangement, and ultimately we had to pay; but the statement which I made yesterday was correct.

13,583. Lord Barcaple.—I don't think it was suggested that your statement was not precisely correct; the question was rather as to how the case could have been otherwise disposed of than by a full argument upon its legal merits?—The point was, whether the bulk of the expense related to the adjustment of the issues or not. The view suggested was, that it was caused by the discussion on the relevancy. My impression at the time was—and looking at the details of the case has confirmed me in it—that the expense was caused almost entirely by the procedure in connection with the adjustment of the issues.

13,584. Mr. Gordon.—But did that not involve the relevancy?—Unquestionably. It was disputed that the pursuer was entitled to any issue at all, and that question was involved.

13,585. The case was disposed of upon the irrelevancy of the claim?—No, the issues were allowed; and after they were settled, the pursuer abandoned the action.

13,586. Mr. Paterson.—Was it not brought under your notice, that what led chiefly to the compromise of the case of Adamson, Howie, and Co. was this, that two bankrupt estates were waiting the result, and that being pressed by creditors, they just divided the sum in dispute?—I suppose it was so, and that the delays of the law wearied the parties.

13,587. Mr. Gordon.—Written pleadings were given up about 1850, were they not?—I think so. Latterly they were seldom resorted to, and they gradually came to an end.

13,588. Do you propose that any statutory provision should be made as to the rolls of court with reference to the hearing of cases; and if so, can you suggest what that statutory provision should be?—I am afraid I could not. We have often seen statutory provisions which, after they were made, did not accomplish the result aimed at. It does not occur to me that the end could be attained by statute.

13,589. Is it not a matter for regulation by the court from time to time, according to what seems to be most suitable for the convenience of agents, counsel, and litigants?—Our idea is, that the convenience of litigants is often very much lost sight of.

13,590. You say it would be an advantage in many cases that the country agents and the clients should be present at the discussion of their cases. Do you propose that the expense caused by their attendance should be charged against the unsuccessful party?—No; in the case of a client, certainly not; but I think it is always desirable that a litigant should have it in his power, if he pleases, at his own expense, to attend and see how justice is administered. In regard to the country agent's expenses, that is connected with another subject; and I am not prepared to say that it would be fair to a losing party to subject him in the expense of the country agent attending the discussion. I would rather object to that.

13,591. Then what you have said really leads to no practical result so far as regards statutory provision?—I have not suggested that it should be dealt with by statute. What I meant to say as to the parties was, that from the mode in which the rolls are managed and the cases put out, they have not, as a general rule, the opportunity of attending the discussion.

13,592. Have not a number of cases recently come before the court connected with the insolvency of banks and with railways?—Yes; there have been very heavy cases of that sort.

13,593. These cases have occurred very much since 1850?—Yes.

13,594. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to make?—In regard to the extractor's office, one very essential matter is, that after a case has been fully litigated and decree got, there should be the utmost facility given for speedy execution. As it stands at present, the first thing is nine days in the minute-book. Now it seems to me that to the extent of nine days that is a very useless form, and that it might with advantage be shortened, if not got quit of altogether. It also frequently happens, that if at the end of a session a party gets decree against his opponent for a sum of money, and also for expenses, he cannot get an extract till next session, because, according to the existing forms, the extractor will not extract till the expenses have been taxed and the amount decerned for. The only way, in these circumstances, of getting a speedy extract is to write a minute abandoning the claim for expenses, in order to secure the principal sum. Now it does seem to many of us that this is a matter which the court might rectify at once, by causing it to be understood that in all these cases the extractor might give an interim extract for the principal sum, and let the decree for expenses be extracted after the auditor's report has been approved of. At present there is a manifest grievance, which often leads to great injustice.

13,595. Mr. Gordon.—There is a power to obtain immediate extract, is there not?—No.

John Clarment.

13,596. When the court pronounces judgment, may they not, upon application, allow it to be extracted as an interim extract?—I think they might, but in practice they don't. I have not made an application of the kind myself, but I am told that the court have refused in such circumstances to grant interim extract.

13,597. Lord Barcaple.—Does it appear to you that there is any real benefit in the existing practice, by which it is necessary, in order to get a decree for the expenses, that a party should come back to the court with the auditor's report, and get a formal decree? Might the court not, with equal advantage, decern at once for the expenses as they shall be taxed, so that the decree would be good for them immediately upon the taxation, unless there should be an appeal against the auditor's deliverance?—I am very glad that has been suggested, because it is a thing which I have regretted was not adopted in our practice. It seems to be a useless form, that the court should approve of the auditor's report when there are no objections to it.

13,598. And it is an expensive form?—It costs £2.

13,599. And in vacation it is productive of great delay?—Yes.

13,600. It is done in the way I have mentioned in cases of decree in absence?—Yes; these are the only cases in which it is done.

13,601. The Chairman.—What time would you allow a decree to be read in the minute-book before being extracted?—The reading in the minute-book should be dispensed with altogether as a bar to extract. The extract always takes a fortnight, and often longer, before it is ready; and if a party had any cause to show,—which rarely happens,—the reading in the minute-book, while the process was in the extractor's hands, would serve the purpose, and the extract could be stopped. I think the process might be sent to the extractors within twenty-four hours after the judgment was issued.

13,602. Would you apply that to a decree in absence?—I cannot see that there would be any practical evil resulting from it, because it is often in decrees in absence that, if you are to save anything, it is of most importance to have rapid execution; and as it always takes about a fortnight to get an extract, the issuing of the extract would be stopped if the party was reponed. The running in the minute-book should not prevent the process going to the extractor.

13,603. Mr. Gordon.—Does it always take a fortnight before you can get an extract?—I was taking a fortnight as the minimum time. At the end of the session it is impossible, with the amount of work thrown upon the extractor, that it can be got in that time.

13,604. The Chairman.—What is your next suggestion?—I would like to add to what I said yesterday about proofs before the Lords Ordinary, that in stating my preference for these over the previous system of proof on commission, I was not simply expressing my own view, but also what I know to be a very general feeling amongst my brethren on that subject.

13,605. Lord Barcaple.—Would you mention what was the particular ground of complaint against the old system of commissions?—For one thing, it was exceedingly difficult to bring a case to an end. The proof went on from day to day with constant adjournments, and the defender had it in his power to get up evidence after the case of the pursuer was disclosed; and we all know that in some classes of cases evidence can be manipulated. That was an evil; and latterly, so far as my experience went, the general rule came to be that there was a proof in replication. In my opinion the system of proofs on commission was latterly becoming an intolerable nuisance.

13,606. Could not the objection which you more particularly refer to have been got rid of by precisely the same regulations which have been applied by statute to proofs before the Lords Ordinary—viz., that they shall go on peremptorily on the day when the proof is fixed, and be brought to a close without adjournment?—Of course regulations might have been made for obviating some of the greater evils of proofs on commission, but I am not sure that they would have been effectual, because a commissioner has not the same authority or means of enforcing regulations that a judge has. Moreover, we all felt that, looking to the state of some of the rolls in the Outer House, it was not necessary to pay large fees to commissioners and their clerks for doing what some of us thought to be judicial work. It appeared to us that the state of the rolls was not such as to prevent the Lords Ordinary, without any undue pressure upon them, from taking the proof themselves. We had also this in view, that there is always an advantage in a judge having the witnesses before himself, and seeing how the evidence is given. All these things combined lead us to prefer the present system.

13,607. In regard to the expense of proofs by commission under the old system, you are aware that that was partly caused by the proofs being taken by commissioners who were not official persons. Has it occurred to you whether that might be got over to a certain extent, if it were otherwise desirable, by having commissioners or examiners, whose duty it should be, as officers of the court, to do such work?—Of course the fees paid to a commissioner would be got quit of if the work was done by an officer of court who was not paid by the parties. But if my recollection is right, the old system is the one that now exists. Of old the court took the proofs, and the taking of proofs by commission was an innovation. The original idea was the one to which we have reverted—viz., that the court took the proof.

13,608. There are undoubtedly cases in which it is desirable that the judge should see the witnesses; but I suppose there are other cases in which that is of less importance?—Certainly.

13,609. Is it consistent with your experience that there are a considerable number of cases in which there is no serious dispute as to the veracity of the witnesses?—No doubt of it; but, as a general rule, it is much better that the judge should see the witnesses, than that he should not.

13,610. If there is no dispute about their veracity, why is it better?—Dispute about veracity is one thing; but, apart from that, there is a great deal in the mode in which a witness gives his evidence which I think enables a judge to deal with a case more satisfactorily than merely reading the evidence in a proof taken on commission. The only answer I can give is, that according to the best consideration I have been able to give to it, the present system is a much better one than the former system.

13,611. Has the present system not led to much greater expense? According to the present system, in the great majority of cases there are two counsel on each side attending throughout the whole proof. Does that not lead to a great increase of expense?—I believe that the expense of taking proofs before the Lord Ordinary is greater than it need be. One of the things we all feel is, that the fees are sometimes larger than they require to be. But I am not prepared to say, looking on the other hand to the length of time occupied by proofs on commission, to the greater number of witnesses generally examined, and to the fact that the commissioner and his clerk were paid, that the expense now is greater than it was under that system. I have not instituted a comparison between the two; but if I were to state my impression, I should say that, on an average of cases, it would be found that the cost now is greatly less than under the old system.

13,612. Putting aside the expense of the commissioner and his clerk, is the expense increased by the present system, by which the whole proof is ordinarily attended by two counsel on each side?—I am not prepared to say that it is, because the time occupied is immensely shorter. Under the old system, there were generally both counsel and agent in attendance,—always one counsel; and my impression is, that the time now occupied on an average of cases is greatly less than one-half of what it was formerly, so that the balance of expense must be in favour of the new system.

13,613. Do you mean that the hours actually occupied in examining witnesses is less than one-half of what it used to be?—I mean that the whole time occupied in taking the proof must be less than one-half. Of course, where there were broken hours, and agents had to go to the place where the commissioner was, there was a great deal of time consumed.

13,614. Do you mean time occupied in travelling?—No; I mean the time occupied in attending the proof on commission. Of course the parties must go to the place where the commissioner sits. Taking the thing overhead, I think the time occupied in taking proofs on the present system must be at least one-half less than was occupied by proofs on commission.

13,615. Were there not a very large number of cases in which the proof was taken without the attendance of any counsel at all?—Not in my experience. Of late years, in almost every instance, we had counsel, though of old that was not so much the practice.

13,616. Was not the commission frequently executed where the witnesses were? Supposing that the witnesses were resident in Wick, was the commission not frequently executed in Wick?—It always came to be a question of what was the cheapest mode,—whether it was cheaper to take two counsel and two agents, and a commissioner and clerk, to where the witnesses were, or to bring the witnesses to where the commissioner was; and we always decided according to the expense.

13,617. Was it not a very common thing to have a commission issued to a gentleman resident on the spot,—the Sheriff-substitute very frequently in those days,—and to have the proof attended only by the country agents, who knew the whole facts, and who knew the witnesses, so that there was no travelling or attendance of commissioner or counsel or Edinburgh agents?—At one time that was very much the practice; but I think I am warranted in saying that latterly that was not so, and that in almost every instance the commission was granted to a counsel. In almost all important cases counsel attended also for the parties.

13,618. What made the profession go back from that old practice?—I am quite aware that some of the judges don't take very kindly to the new system; but there is a very strong feeling in the profession in its favour, and I think that if it was wrought as a recognised institution it would get on remarkably well.

13,619. Mr. Webster.—In cases where witnesses were examined on commission, and a debate took place afterwards, was there not always the expense of two copies on each side, for the use of counsel, of the depositions of the witnesses—all of which is saved under the present system?—I had omitted to advert to that. Of course we always had to print the proof or to make copies, and that is an expense which is now entirely saved.

13,620. Lord Barcaple.—Has that not to be done now?—If the case goes to the Inner House, it has to be done; not otherwise.

13,621. How many of your cases in which you have had proofs have not gone to the Inner House?—I think the last we had did not go to the Inner House.

13,622. But I suppose the great majority of them do go to the Inner House?—I am not prepared to say that the great majority of them go to the Inner House. Of course a large proportion of all cases of any importance in the Outer House do go to the Inner House.

13,623. And when they go to the Inner House, the proof has not been taken by any of the judges by whom the case is decided?—Of course not. You cannot have that in a court of review.

13,624. Mr. Baxter.—What is the use of having two counsel to attend the proof?—In the last case of the kind I had, we took two counsel, because we were not sure, if there was only one, that he would attend. The result was, that during a part of the time the proof was going on I was there alone, without any of the counsel.

13,625. Supposing the counsel to be absent for a time, how do they get the thread of the story?—I don't think that in practice they are very long absent.

13,626. Mr. Webster.—What is your opinion as to the system of a decision by one judge in the first instance reviewed by four other judges, or of having the case at once argued and decided by the four judges?—I am strongly in favour of continuing the present constitution of the court. I should regard it as a misfortune if we had not an Outer House and an Inner House, because we have no appeal after the Inner House, without going to the House of Lords; and in my own experience, I have frequently seen that the real points on which a case turned were not fully understood till the final hearing in the Inner House.

13,627. Lord Barcaple.—Understood by the parties, do you mean?—By the parties and the judge. I may safely say that I have seen repeated instances, where if there had been but a single hearing, injustice would have been done; and I regard it as one of the best features of our system, that we have the case first considered by the Lord Ordinary, and then carefully considered in the Inner House. I should regret very much to see that system altered.

13,628. The Chairman.—What is your next suggestion?—Our body, in reporting upon the Act of 1868, suggested that considerable changes should be made in the Teind Court. My own view is that it should be abolished as a separate jurisdiction. I don't see any reason for keeping up the Teind Court as an entirely separate court from the Court of Session. In regard to augmentations, they might be granted by either Division of the court; and it would be a great improvement if augmentations were prepared before the Lord Ordinary, because at present, when the Teind Court meets only once a fortnight, and the heritors have to be held as confessed, and the rental is repeatedly taken to see, where there is a large number of heritors, that leads to a fee to counsel for each motion, and it causes a considerable loss of time and considerable expense, without, so far as I see, any corresponding advantage.

13,629. Lord Barcaple.—Is that not all absolute formality, which might be done in the Teind Office?—It is entirely a formal matter. There might be a provision by which objections should be lodged to the rental, and that if none were lodged, the rental should stand. If the Teind Court was got rid of as a separate jurisdiction, Teind causes might be brought before any Lord Ordinary in the Outer House like other cases. I see no reason why that should not be so, not only as to augmentations, but also as to valuations and approbations, and other Teind processes; provings of the tenor are perhaps more delicate, but there is no reason why the ordinary run of cases, and petitions for feuing glebes, should not be dealt with as Outer House matters. The forms of summonses should also be assimilated to those of ordinary actions. In regard to the Teind Office as it stands just now, it is exceedingly unsatisfactory. I don't mean to say anything against the officers, who are all most excellent and intelligent persons; but if a case is to be in the roll on Monday, it must be enrolled on the previous Wednesday,—why, I have never been able to discover; but that is the rule; and an interlocutor pronounced on Monday cannot be got till Friday; it is not written out or signed,—why, I don't know. These things would not exist if there was not the separate jurisdiction for teinds. We regarded it as a very beneficial thing that the Mondays should be utilized for the sittings of the Teind Court, but there is a very natural unwillingness to bring out the judges if there is but a small roll; and it happened twice last winter, that we had a notice of this kind, that as only two or three cases were enrolled, the sitting of the Teind Court had been postponed by consent of the agents. Of course when it was put to an agent, Do you wish the judges to sit for your case? no agent would like to say yes; but I think it is unfortunate that the matter should be in that position.

13,630. The Chairman.—Were these cases enrolled merely for a formal motion?—I think it exceedingly likely that that was so; but it is always unfortunate, because no one can tell what the effect may be of not getting a formal motion disposed of at the time it ought to be taken up. We cannot follow that out to its consequences.

13,631. Lord Barcaple.—Do you know what time was in point of fact, on an average, occupied by the sitting of the Teind Court on the alternate Wednesdays?—I could only guess at it. It was often very short, but I have seen it occupy two hours or more.

John Carment.

13,632. You say you would abolish the separate jurisdiction of the Teind Court. Do you mean that you would also abolish the Teind Office and the Teind-clerk as a separate institution?—I think that office should be abolished, or at least entirely remodelled. The ordinary process work would fall in with the work of the other clerks of court as part of their ordinary business. But in regard to the preparation of schemes of locality, that must be done by a special officer. At present the delay is exceedingly great,—I suppose from the amount of work thrown on the party responsible, because it sometimes takes nearly two years, after a remit to the clerk, before the interim scheme of locality is ready. That is certainly an evil.

13,633. Do not a large number of the interlocutors pronounced in the motion roll of the Teind Ordinary require a clerk to prepare them who is thoroughly familiar both with Teind procedure, and also with the bearing of the particular step upon the existing state of the locality, and, it may be, on preceding localities in the parish?—I am quite aware that it requires a certain amount of training, and of course, while the thing is new, there would be some inconvenience in that respect; but one would expect the clerks to be intelligent men, and there are existing forms applicable to all cases. No doubt at first there would be inconvenience.

13,634. I am speaking of something beyond styles—viz., the application of the order that has been got to the existing state of the process and the rights of the parties in connection with what has previously taken place?—I should expect the agents to assist in keeping that right. Some of us think there is a great deal too much formality in the Teind Office, and that we would be better without it.

13,635. There is a great deal too much formality, but the existing institution of teinds in Scotland is so excessively conventional, and every locality depends on so many previous proceedings, that it is a very technical matter?—If that was held to be a very serious objection, it could be obviated by continuing a clerk specially for teinds.

13,636. That is what I am pointing at. In regard to the augmentations, does it occur to you that it is consistent with the ordinary practice of the country, in constituting a body who are to exercise a function so purely administrative as that of the Commissioners of Teinds, in fixing the amount of an augmentation, to hand it over to a body so small as a court of four judges; and do you think that it would be good for one of the ordinary courts to have the entire responsibility of that matter laid upon them?—That is a larger question; and my view is, if I was to go into it, that the court was not the best tribunal for it. The whole system of allocating stipends might be put on a different footing.

13,637. From what you said formerly, it was rather to be assumed that you were recommending that the fixing of stipends should be handed over to either the First or the Second Division, to be there disposed of by four judges, or, in the possible absence of one of them, by three judges. Would that be satisfactory to the heritors on the one side, and to the Church on the other?—I do not see why they should be less satisfied with the decision of the Division than they are with the decision of the whole court. Five judges are now a quorum of the Teind Court. Of course one would expect that, in awarding augmentations, there would be mutual communication and concert between the heads of the Divisions, and that the same system would be observed as far as possible. But I don't see why the change to the Divisions should be less satisfactory than the existing system.

13,638. Would there not be a risk of people—possibly erroneously—saying that such a case had been dealt with in a particular way because it happened to be in such a Division, or because such and such a judge did not happen to be present?—No doubt things of that kind might be said, and possibly are said now.

13,639. It does not involve any judicial work. There is no law whatever in determining whether a minister is to get 18 or 19 chalders?—It is very much a matter of discretion. One of the chief advantages of abolishing the Teind Court would be in regard to the work before the Lord Ordinary in the Outer House. At present, it is the most difficult thing in the world to get any Teind business done; and an ordinary debate drags through a whole session.

13,640. Mr. Webster.—What are your views as to the Bill Chamber?—That is another matter which is not in a satisfactory state; and I would suggest that the Bill Chamber should be abolished as a separate jurisdiction, and that Bill Chamber work during session should be done by any Outer House judge at chambers; that in vacation there should be a vacation judge as there is now, who would transact that sort of work. Bill Chamber cases often require great despatch; and from the way in which the roll is managed now, and the amount of work thrown on the junior Lord Ordinary, it is often difficult to get a pressing case through. I think it would be an advantage that the Bill Chamber should be abolished, and that each Outer House judge should take up Bill Chamber business. There might be a difficulty of the same sort as was suggested in reference to the Teind Court, that there are certain formal matters with which, from long practice, the Bill Chamber clerk is more familiar than the other clerks. Of course what one acquires, others may acquire; but that difficulty could be met by having a separate clerk if necessary.

13,641. Lord Barcaple.—Would it meet your view to relieve the Bill Chamber judge of the other summary business that is thrown upon him just now?—Scarcely. I think there is an advantage in not having work split up amongst so many different offices.

13,642. But that summary business which is called the Bill Chamber must be done by somebody?—Yes.

13,643. Well, does it appear to you that it is disadvantageous that it should be done during session by one judge who is pretty continuously applying his mind to that particular class of business?—I think it would be better if it were distributed among all the Lords Ordinary, and parties were not restricted to the junior judge.

13,644. What advantage would that be?—Because, as it stands just now, when several cases occur, all requiring despatch, it is difficult to get through them.

13,645. You mean proper Bill Chamber cases?—Yes; every case is put to the roll, and is generally discussed by counsel; but one often cannot get counsel, and as a practical matter there is a grievance just now.

13,646. That must be a very recent practice?—I don't think it is so very recent.

13,647. I never heard that every case was supposed to be discussed by counsel?—I don't mean to say absolutely every case, but every case of any importance.

13,648. I don't think anything approaching to that require to be discussed by counsel?—A large proportion of the Bill Chamber cases in which there is any real discussion are put to the motion roll; and I think it will be found that in by far the larger proportion of the cases so put to the motion roll, counsel are employed.

13,649. That is the choice of the agents?—I am not sure that it is. It is supposed to be so; but if cases were dealt with at chambers, many an agent would discuss them there who does not do so at the bar.

13,650. What do you mean by chambers?—Chambers I understand to be this: that the judge is not sitting with counsel at the bar, but as an unrobed judge, and that agents can discuss the cases before him quietly and calmly.

13,651. Is there not a good deal of that in the Bill Chamber practice?—There is to some extent; and what I desiderate is more of it.

13,652. If so, would the disseminating the business over all the judges cause a greater difficulty? They must all sit in chambers for that business?—I should have thought that would have lessened the difficulty, because it would be less trouble to each of them.

13,653. There is no difficulty in respect of trouble; but the fresh Bill Chamber cases generally come in about mid-day, or a little after it, and the judge is then in court; but if you required all the judges suddenly to turn from their other work, as the junior Lord Ordinary has at present to do, would that not be inconvenient to the suitors?—I think not. My impression is, that practically the abolition of the Bill Chamber, and the adoption of the course I have suggested, would work better than the present system.

13,654. Dr. Barclay.—Do you mean that all the judges of the Inner House and the Outer House should do that duty?—Certainly not; only the Outer House judges. Then there are certain writs which are at present signed by the Bill Chamber clerk, and these I think any judge's clerk should sign.

13,655. Mr. Shand.—Do you know that a good many people share the opinion which you have expressed as to the Bill Chamber?—I believe the opinion is pretty generally shared by my brethren.

13,656. The Chairman.—In speaking of judges' clerks, I suppose you mean the depute-clerks of Session attending the Outer House judges?—That is what I mean.

13,657. Mr. Shand.—In Lanarkshire, where there are three or four Sheriff-substitutes, and in Edinburgh, where there are several Sheriff-substitutes, do they not all exercise very much the functions of Bill Chamber judge?—Very likely it is so; but I do not know that.

13,658. Lord Barcaple.—If the business of the Bill Chamber is to be divided among the Lords Ordinary, a party presenting a note in an urgent case must go to the clerk of one of them, and find the Lord Ordinary in order to get a first order,—an interim interdict, it may be. The junior Lord Ordinary at present makes arrangements by which that can readily be done. Do you assume that the five Lords Ordinary are to make the same arrangements?—No.

13,659. What would be the result?—I assume that during session the Lords Ordinary would generally be found when they were wanted; and I assume that if a particular judge could not be found, some of his brethren would be found, and that there would be no difficulty in finding a Lord Ordinary to do it.

13,660. Then you would make this arrangement, that although the process is in the office immediately connected with a particular Lord Ordinary, if he is not found, another Lord Ordinary shall pronounce an order in his place?—That is matter of detail; and I do not anticipate any practical difficulty in arranging it satisfactorily.

13,661. Dr. Barclay.—You have seen mutual interdicts between two parties?—Yes.

13,662. What if one party should go to one Lord Ordinary, and the other to another Lord Ordinary?—The same thing would happen as happens now in other cases: the one Lord Ordinary would remit to the other. There would be no practical difficulty. As to the clerks of court, the court have settled by Act of Sederunt that the offices should not be open in the evening, but that they should be open from two till five o'clock. Now they are not in point of fact open at two o'clock. I don't know how that arises, but it is a good deal complained of.

13,663. Lord Barcaple.—Is the present arrangement, if it were fully carried out, a convenient one?—I was rather against it, but I yielded to the opinion of my brethren. I must say the practical inconvenience resulting from it has been less than I anticipated.

13,664. When you say the office is not open at two, what exactly do you mean?—The auditor's office shuts at three; and I believe it sometimes happens that when it is necessary to get an account marked at the clerk's office, in order to lodge it with the auditor the same day, there is difficulty in getting it done.

13,665. Do you mean that the clerk's office is sometimes not open till three?—I don't say that; but it is not open at two.

13,666. The Chairman.—Can you state in a few words the practical evils of the Bill Chamber being allowed to exist, and the practical advantages which you anticipate from its abolition?—As it stands just now, the Bill Chamber is not open the whole day. It is open from ten to twelve, and from two to four; the clerks are sometimes there and sometimes in the court, and there is often a difficulty in getting what we want at the time we want it. Then I think, as matter of expediency, it is desirable to centralize work as much as possible, and that instead of having to go to a separate office for all matters of that kind, all these judicial matters should be transacted by one tribunal, not having the Bill Chamber as a separate jurisdiction, but having the work done by any of the Outer House judges. I think there is a simplicity about that which recommends it. The present system keeps up a separate machinery for a kind of judicial work which it seems to me is very much of the same kind as what the judges are doing every day.

13,667. What part of that machinery could be dispensed with advantageously?—I think that the whole machinery of the Bill Chamber might be dispensed with—I mean as a Bill Chamber. A party wanting an interdict should apply to any judge through that judge's clerk.

13,668. Do you think he would in that way have greater facility of getting at the judge? If he can get at the Bill Chamber judge through a clerk called the Bill Chamber clerk, is that different from getting at another judge through his clerk?—Possibly not; but I know that in practice there is a very general feeling that things are not got so readily under the present system as they might be under a different system. It is difficult to go into the details.

13,669. As it is a separate office, with a separate clerk attending it, can you suggest any mode by which it would be more accessible during the whole day, because there is a period of time when the other clerks do not attend either?—That opens up another question. I have a strong idea that all clerks of court should be clerks of court and nothing else, and that a Bill Chamber clerk who devoted his whole time to it, and had nothing else to do, would probably be able to make different office arrangements. I don't mean to say that the present holder of the office does not do everything that is necessary, but I think that an office where the clerk was to devote his whole time to the administration of it might be more satisfactory than as it now stands.

13,670. What are the hours that are devoted to it now?—From ten to twelve and from two to four during session.

13,671. Lord Barcaple.—Is it not the case that the Bill Chamber clerk, or the assistant Bill Chamber clerk, is called on at all possible hours of the day, and sometimes of the night, at his own residence?—He is occasionally applied to at his residence, undoubtedly. I do not remember having had to go to him at night.

13,672. And he comes to the judge's house with the parties?—He generally marks the paper, and the agent goes to the judge.

13,673. Mr. Webster.—The pursuers and complainers in the court attach great importance to the power of selecting their judge, do they not?—They do. Every party likes to select the judge who is to deal with his case.

13,674. Is it not one of the complaints against the Bill Chamber that that power is practically not in existence, and that parties are tied to one judge so long as he continues to be junior judge?—Undoubtedly one of the chief advantages of a change in the system would be, that instead of being obliged to bring all these cases before the junior judge, the parties would have the selection of the judge, as is allowed to them in other cases.

13,675. The Chairman.—Is there any great advantage in having the selection?—I think there is.

13,676. To the pursuer?—If I was a pursuer, I would certainly like to select my judge.

John Carment.

13,677. If you were the defender, would you like to select your judge?—Very likely I would. But you must give the selection to one party; both can't have it.

13,678. If there is a selection, you must do so?—The Legislature has sanctioned the principle that the pursuer is entitled to select his judge.

13,679. Mr. Shand.—Is it not often of consequence to select a judge who has had experience of a particular kind of work; for example, interdicts in railway cases or entail cases? Under the system which you propose, would not that advantage be secured?—Certainly it would.

13,680. Mr. Webster.—Have you anything to state as to the Sheriff Court?—In regard to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, it seems to me that there is no part of our judicial system that has wrought better or given more general satisfaction than the existing system, and I should regret to see the double Sheriffship abolished. I am aware that in our body there is a considerable feeling in favour of the abolition; but I don't think they are at all agreed as to what they would substitute if the double Sheriffship was abolished. I have not heard any suggestion made of anything that in my judgment would be better, or nearly equal to the existing system.

13,681. The Chairman.—Would you be disposed to extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—Yes. I think that our legislation has proceeded upon the principle of a gradual extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction; the limit of finality, for instance, might be extended to £50.

13,682. You mean the limit of exclusion from the Court of Session?—Yes; excluding review in cases up to £50, instead of limiting it to £25, as as present—probably with power to the losing party to ask a case on any question of law where the value is above £25. Then there is a class of cases which I think should be excluded altogether from review, unless where there is difference of opinion—viz., actions of aliment in filiation cases. I think that where the Sheriffs are agreed, unless the limit exceeded £100, which it could scarcely do, the judgment of the Sheriffs should in all cases of that kind be final; and I further think it would be an advantage to make it incompetent to raise such an action in the Court of Session. The court very much discourage it, but still it is competent to bring such an action. I think it is also an evil at present, that where defenders reside in different counties, very small matters require to be brought into the Court of Session; and I should say that in cases up to £100 the Sheriff should have jurisdiction even where the defenders are not all within his county. Where persons are equally liable in an action, any one might be selected; or where one is primarily liable, and others are cited for their interest, the forum of the principal debtor should be sufficient. It is found to be a hardship that for exceedingly small sums one has to go to the Court of Session. I don't see also why, where jurisdiction is founded on a Sheriff's warrant, it should not be competent to sue a foreigner in the Sheriff Court where the sum is under £100. Then, in regard to suspensions, there seems no reason why the Sheriff's jurisdiction should not be extended, and the restriction to £25 in the Act of 1838 repealed, so as to make a suspension to any amount competent before the Sheriff. I think it is also a hardship that proceedings for the protection of a wife's property under the Conjugal Rights Act should not be competent before the Sheriff. There is also another class of cases in regard to which serious evils arise,—cases where rights of property of very small amount are concerned, and where nearly the whole value of the subject is sometimes swallowed up in a Court of Session process. In all cases when a question as to the right of property arises in a possessory question, I think the Sheriff should have jurisdiction if the annual value of the subject does not exceed £25. That was taken in one of the recent Acts as the limit of the Sheriff's jurisdiction in actions of declarator of irritancy ob non solutum canonem. Some extraordinary removings are not competent before the Sheriff. I think all removings should be competent before him.

13,683. When you speak of heritable subjects of the value of £25, what do you mean?—I mean £25 of annual value. In connection with the Sheriff Court there is an abuse which one sometimes sees in cases coming up to the Court of Session. I refer to long reclaiming petitions drawn on very unimportant matters; and my idea would be that the Sheriff Court procurators should not be allowed more for a reclaiming petition than for an oral debate. I had a case lately where the expense of the petition amounted to nearly £10 for a very small case.

13,684. Mr. Baxter.—You have had no practical experience in the Sheriff Courts?—No; but one sees from advocations occasionally how business is conducted there. In regard to the House of Lords, there is a very general feeling that the time within which appeals are competent should be shortened.

13,685. The Chairman.—It is now two years?—Yes; and it should be limited to six months.

13,686. Can you suggest anything in the way of limiting expense in the matter of the appeal committee, or otherwise?—The expense of an appeal at present is very heavy. There are a number of the fees which might be reduced; but I have great doubt whether it is desirable, as matter of public policy, to diminish very much the expense of an appeal to the House of Lords. There is, however, one improvement which I have often thought might be made, and that is, that substantial caution should be required, just as was required before the late Act in regard to appeals from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session. The caution at present required in the House of Lords is merely nominal. I think a party appealing should find substantial caution for costs in the event of his being unsuccessful.

13,687. Mr. Shand.—Do you know the cost of a prorogation for putting in an appeal case?—I know it is very expensive. Cases have come under my notice of what we would consider here very exorbitant fees. No doubt, if it was desirable to make appeals cheap, it might be done.

13,688. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion?—In regard to the Commissary Courts, as matters stand just now, a party can make up a title to heritable estate before the Sheriff of Chancery, irrespective of the domicile of the deceased party, and in that court all Court of Session procurators have a right to practise. In the Commissary Court we cannot obtain confirmation, where it is necessary to present a petition, without employing a Sheriff Court procurator. Now, we cannot see why the administering to moveable estate should not be put on the same footing as proceedings for administering to heritable estate; and our suggestion is, that it should be competent for the Court of Session procurators to take whatever proceedings are necessary for obtaining confirmation to moveable estate.

13,689. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose you had the power of becoming Commissary Court procurators?—We can lodge the inventory just now; but if a petition requires to be presented, we have to employ a Sheriff Court procurator. All that I mean is, that we should be allowed to conduct the necessary proceedings before the Sheriff. It is also an inconvenience at present that one requires to go to the Commissary of the domicile of the party; and I think that matter should also be assimilated to the procedure for administering to heritable estate, and that it should be competent to obtain confirmation before the Commissary at Edinburgh, wherever the deceased resided. There is another matter connected with the Commissary Court—viz., that every deed requires to be recorded of new in the Commissary books. It is difficult to see the reason of that, or what purpose it serves, because, where a deed has been already recorded, it seems reasonable that it should be sufficient in the Commissary Court to make a note of the register where it is recorded, and of the date, and any one requiring to search the Commissary records could at once trace the deed.

13,690. Mr. Murray.—Does what you have mentioned not arise from this, that the Commissary record is not a legal record, but is only kept for the purpose of the Inland Revenue?—I fancy it is kept for fiscal purposes.

13,691. You cannot get an extract of a deed from the Commissary Court?—I thought they could give you an extract if it was wanted. I may also state that by the existing form it is necessary, where one includes English assets, to lead proof of the domicile before the Sheriff. That sort of proof does not necessarily settle any question that may arise as to domicile; and it seems to me that it is a useless form, and that it would be sufficient to set forth the domicile in the affidavit, without putting the parties to the expense of leading proof.

13,692. Mr. Webster.—As is done in England?—Yes; I believe proof is not required there.

13,693. The Chairman.—If the change which you propose were introduced in the Commissary Court, would it not trench considerably upon the emoluments of the local Commissaries?—I don't think it would, because the emoluments which would be interfered with, must in any individual case be exceedingly small. Of course if it was made competent to confirm in the Edinburgh Commissary Court, that would increase the business there.

13,694. It would increase the business in Edinburgh?—Yes; and if you give the right to the Court of Session procurators, the country procurators would lose to a certain extent.

13,695. What I mean is, if the business were brought to Edinburgh, would that not trench on the emoluments of the district Commissary-clerks?—Certainly it would, where they are paid by fees. I misapprehended your Lordship's previous question, and thought it referred to agents. It would increase the fees in Edinburgh which are accounted for to Exchequer. John Carment.

13,696. Mr. Murray.—Do you see any objection to conjoining the offices of Sheriff-clerk and Commissary-clerk?—I am very much in favour of centralization. I think it conduces to efficiency, and I don't see any reason why there should be a separate staff.

13,697. As the offices fall vacant, the two might be conjoined in the counties?—It is my impression that they might be conjoined with advantage.

13,698. Dr. Barclay.—At present certain intimations in the locality are given on a petition being presented. If they were concentrated in Edinburgh, might there not be a chance of an intimation being given to the wrong person?—Intimation is now made edictally, and the record is published weekly.

13,699. Mr. Gordon.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—No. Permit me to add, that I have been requested by our society to bring under the notice of the Commission the terms of the old Act of Parliament relative to the appointment of principal clerks of Session. Writers to the Signet may be appointed, but Solicitors before the Supreme Courts are not mentioned. The Act as to depute-clerks allows solicitors to be appointed; and looking to the position which our society now occupies, we think it should be made competent to appoint members of our body to the office of principal clerk also.

FRIDAY, 21st MAY 1869.

Members Present:—

Lord Colonsay.	James Adam, Esq.
The Lord Justice-General.	George Harrison, Esq.
Lord Barcaple.	A. B. Shand, Esq.
E. S. Gordon, Esq., Q.C.	James Webster, Esq.
Dr. Barclay.	J. B. Baxter, Esq.
A. R. Clark, Esq.	A. Paterson, Esq.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

Charles Scott, Esq., examined.

13,700. The Chairman.—You are a practising member of the Scotch bar?—I am. Charles Scott.

13,701. How long have you been so?—Since 1848. I passed in 1847, but I did not commence practising till 1848.

13,702. You have had a good deal of experience of the working of the machinery of the court?—I have had a very large experience of it, and also of all the inferior courts.

13,703. I believe you have been furnished with a note of points as to which the Commissioners are inquiring. Have you any suggestions to make with regard to them?—In regard to the constitution of the Court of Session, I think that, if one or two slight alterations were made, it could not be further improved. My opinion is that the system of Lords Ordinary and Divisions is the best that could be devised for a Supreme Court; and I observe that the English lawyers are now anxious to have a similar system. I have thought over a great many other plans, but I do not see any that would work so well. The only alterations that I would propose are two: 1st, That where it becomes necessary for clearing off arrears to have a Third Division, it should be formed of one judge from each of the two Divisions, and one judge from the Outer House, so as not to interrupt the business of the Outer House. In the second place, I think it is inconvenient, and produces evils, that any one Lord Ordinary should be alone competent in a particular class of cases,—for example, Bill Chamber cases or petitions,—because it throws a very heavy amount of business on the least experienced judge, and whenever he begins to acquire experience, the business passes to another, who is also inexperienced.

13,704. Do you apply that remark to Teind causes also?—Yes.

13,705. Your suggestion is that they should go indifferently to any Lord Ordinary?—Yes; and particularly Bill Chamber cases, because they throw an excessive amount of work upon the junior judge.

13,706. Have you considered how the work of the Bill Chamber clerks could be managed?—If the alteration I propose were made, I suspect there would be no Bill Chamber clerks; at least I don't see how they could work between the different judges.

13,707. Lord Barcaple.—Do you say that from the apprehension that it would not readily work, rather than from any necessity, in point of principle, for there not being separate clerks?—I see no necessity for it on principle.

13,708. You mean no necessity in principle for the abolition of the Bill Chamber clerks?—None.

13,709. The Chairman.—Do you see any reason for having more hours for the reception of papers by the Bill Chamber clerks than in the offices of the other clerks?—The kind of business is more pressing and urgent; and I have sometimes seen inconvenience experienced from the Bill Chamber Office not being open. That, however, was a good many years ago.

Charles Scott.

13,710. Supposing the business to be distributed among the Lords Ordinary, do you think it would be an advantage to have a clerk in attendance in the Bill Chamber at times when the depute and assistant clerks are engaged in the Parliament House?—I think it would.

13,711. To keep the Bill Chamber Office open?—Yes.

13,712. Lord Barcaple.—Even at present there is more attendance given in the Bill Chamber Office than in the other offices?—Yes.

13,713. And your suggestion is that it is doubtful whether there is sufficient attendance in the Bill Chamber Office at present?—Yes. Bill Chamber cases frequently require immediate despatch, and often arise so unexpectedly, that the office would require to be almost always open. The clerks in attendance could relieve each other; and if the Bill Chamber business were competent to all the Lords Ordinary, one judge or other could always be accessible during session, at any reasonable hour.

13,714. The Chairman.—Might there not be inconvenience if the teinds were divided among the Lords Ordinary?—I speak with a great deal of doubt about teinds.

13,715. But your general view is that all the business should be distributed among all the judges, if that can be conveniently done?—Yes, for the reasons stated.

13,716. Have you any observation to make as to the jurisdiction of the court?—I think the jurisdiction of the court ought to be privative in all questions of status. My experience of these cases is, that whenever they are not allowed to go in absence, the parties always contest to the last; and cases of divorce, as well as every other case of status, would be quite certain to come to this court for review. A distinction has been taken between cases of divorce and cases of separation and aliment; but I have always found that the latter are more keenly contested than the former. They lead to a much more inconvenient result for the parties than even divorces, and they raise very delicate questions. They generally lead to great discomfort and degradation to one or both of the spouses; and they would always be appealed to the Court of Session, even if they were allowed to originate in the inferior court. I think, therefore, it is much better to leave that matter as it is at present.

13,717. Do you include in that observation declarators of marriage and of legitimacy?—Yes; and of bastardy. I ought here to remark that such processes are now very cheaply conducted in the Supreme Court, even if cheapness were the only element to be taken into account; but in such important matters the judicial qualities of the court are also to be considered, and these are very much higher in the Supreme Court. With regard to undefended divorces, there is sometimes even more delicacy, and there is also the risk of collusion. I have sometimes seen defenders assoilzied in such cases.

13,718. Have you any further observation to make in regard to this matter?—With respect to questions involving the nobile officium of the court, I think no alteration should be made. I am also of opinion, that wherever you have a case which goes to jury trial, that should take place in the Supreme Court.

13,719. Lord Barcaple.—There is no case at present which it is settled is to go to jury trial, if it is raised in the inferior court?—In a case raised in the inferior court there is an appeal for jury trial.

13,720. There is an appeal in any case, when a proof has been allowed, if it is above £40; but it may be disposed of, if no such appeal is taken, by a proof in the inferior court?—The party in the inferior court has the privilege of coming to the Court of Session.

13,721. The Chairman.—Is your proposition that jury trial should be confined to the Supreme Court?—Yes.

13,722. You mean that you would not extend jury trial in civil causes to the inferior court?—Yes; and I come to that conclusion, not only from the nature of jury trial, but from actually seeing its working in criminal cases in the Sheriff Courts.

13,723. Mr. Baxter.—Do you not think it works well in the Sheriff Courts?—I don't think the Sheriff has the same influence with a jury, or that his observations or charge to the jury are so good as the charge of the judge in the Supreme Court. I have noticed that particularly in regard to the charges of Sheriffs in criminal trials, and I have sometimes been struck with the contrast between the grasp taken by the jury of the substance of the case, and the biassed and imperfect charge of the judge. It would be worse in civil cases.

13,724. Mr. Paterson.—Does that observation refer to Sheriffs-principal or to Sheriffs-substitute, or to both?—To both.

13,725. Lord Barcaple.—In the case of a Sheriff-principal, it may be that in the following week he may be addressing a jury in the Supreme Court?—Yes. I am not referring to all the Sheriffs, either principals or substitutes; I am speaking generally. There are many exceptions. My remark has no application to the Sheriffs present, nor to Dr. Barclay.

13,726. Dr. Barclay.—You have stated that the Sheriff has not the same influence with a jury that a judge of the Supreme Court has. Do you mean influence in favour of acquittal or conviction?—What I particularly refer to is, that in their summings-up to the jury they do not take that impartial view of the evidence that I find taken by most of the judges of the Supreme Court that I have heard charge juries. The result is that they have not the same weight with the jury, and the jury often goes quite against the charge of the Sheriff.

13,727. In which direction does the bias to which you have spoken lie?—Generally for conviction. The charges in the Supreme Court are much more delicately balanced, and more impartial than the charges in the Sheriff Courts.

13,728. Mr. Harrison.—Do you think the Sheriffs do not take the same pains with the case that the judges of the Supreme Court do?—I think that the Sheriffs are careful and painstaking, but generally they are not equal in intellectual standing.

13,729. Dr. Barclay.—Is it not because they have not the same experience in criminal trials?—Some of them have larger experience in criminal cases; but they are not so qualified to benefit by it. I have had great experience in these cases in Sheriff Courts.

13,730. And you are generally very successful?—I have been successful sometimes.

13,731. The Chairman.—Have you anything to state as to the cumulative jurisdiction?—I think it stands very well at present.

13,732. Do you think it would be expedient to give to the Sheriff Courts jurisdiction in reference to small questions of heritable right?—I have certainly seen cases where there was great hardship from such questions not being competent in the Sheriff Courts, and if it were practicable to fix a limit, I think it might be expedient to do so; but the difficulty would be to have a simple rule.

13,733. As to the appellate jurisdiction, the recent Act has had some effect on that, has it not?—Yes; the expense of an appeal is certainly very much lessened, and I think it might be still more lessened in small causes, by dispensing with printing, and allowing only one counsel to be charged against the other side. I have got made out an account of the expense of such an appeal from the Sheriff Court under the new Act, in an ordinary cause which runs the ordinary course, and I find the amount is £8, 8s. 8d.

13,734. That is the expense on one side?—Yes; and adding something for any item that may have been omitted, I should say that £10 would be the cost on each side of an ordinary appeal. I am assuming that there is no printing, and only one counsel charged.

13,735. Dr. Barclay.—It is not an actual case that you are giving?—No. The items in the account are these:—

ACCOUNT OF EXPENSES IN APPEAL.

(Copy Record sent from country; no Printing; and one Counsel.)

Paid Fee-Fund Dues,	£0	15	0
Entering Appearance,	0	13	4
Borrowing Process,	0	2	0
Instructing Counsel,	0	6	8
Moving in Single Bills,	0	6	8
Fee for Agent going over Record,	1	1	0
Attendance at Hearing,	1	0	0
Instructing Counsel,	0	6	8
Fee to Counsel and Clerk,	3	10	6
Attendance procuring Copy Interlocutor,	0	3	4
Writing Letter therewith,	0	3	6
	£8	8	8
As some letters and incidents may be necessary, say	£10	0	0

13,736. Mr. Adam.—You mean that that is the necessary expense?—Yes; £8, 8s. 8d. includes all the necessary items, and I have got the account revised by an agent. I think there ought to be no difficulty in having a simple process of appeal for small cases, and another form for larger cases.

13,737. The Chairman.—What simplification would you make for small cases?—It would require very little simplification if the court would do as I have seen them do,—ask no print, but allow the copy of the record made in the Sheriff Court to be sent up to the Court of Session and used, and not require more than one counsel on each side. I don't think any further simplification would be required, except that the clerk of court might in such small cases himself at once enrol the cause for debate.

13,738. Dr. Barclay.—Have you seen cases disposed of without printing in the Inner House?—I have seen it in reclaiming notes in cessios. I have had very heavy cases of that sort, with a proof extending in one instance over 500 or 600 pages of writing, before Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, and I argued them—his Lordship having the Sheriff Court record and proof, and I having a copy.

13,739. Was that not done on account of the poverty of the party?—No; in such cases it is not necessary to print the record, under the statute. I have done that several times; and the result was conform to the justice of the case.

13,740. The Chairman.—You say you would do that in certain cases. How would you classify them? As to the amount at stake, or with reference to the nature of the cause?—The amount at stake, I think, in pecuniary causes.

13,741. Irrespective of the amount of oral proof?—Yes; I think the court would arrive at a perfectly satisfactory result from the hearing of the speeches of the two counsel, the President of the Division having the record and proof before him, and thus having the power of check. I suggest that for this reason, that I think, with our present extended system of suffrage, an appeal court that is not useful to the great body of the people is not in a proper position.

13,742. In the case you mentioned, the judge had the record copy of the proof, and you had a copy: was that copy made for you?—It had been used by the procurator in the Sheriff Court.

13,743. The other side required a copy, I suppose?—Yes; I presume they also got their copy sent up from the Sheriff Court.

13,744. Dr. Barclay.—Would you explain what effect the extension of the suffrage has on the mode of procedure?—The existence of no court is safe, unless it is suited to and popular with those who legislate for the country. I don't think any court is safe that is not in that position. In my opinion, such a court ought not to be safe.

13,745. Mr. Baxter.—Have you made out any note of the expense of an appeal, taking into account the printing?—It would be difficult to do that; but, on the average, with an ordinary print, it might bring it up to about £15 a side; and if there were two counsel, it might come up to £20.

13,746. It has been represented to me that the average expense of an appeal is £50 a side?—I don't see how that can be, unless there be some special matter to account for it. There may be an additional proof led.

13,747. Dr. Barclay.—Your estimate is made up, I suppose, on the footing of the case going direct from the Sheriff to the Inner House?—Yes. Under the recent Act, appeals always do so.

13,748. The Chairman.—As to the expense, something would depend on the amount of fees given to counsel?—No doubt; but I think there should be some sort of scale as against the opposite party. The fee to junior counsel is generally 2 guineas for a small appeal, but I have allowed 3 guineas in my estimate. With regard to the speed with which appeals are disposed of now, I don't think any improvement could be made in that respect. I have seen an appeal which appeared in the single bills on a Friday put out on Tuesday in the week after, and decided that day.

13,749. Dr. Barclay.—Does the alteration made by the recent Act, abolishing caution in appeals from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session, meet with your approval?—Yes; I think that the expense is so small, and the time that an appeal occupies so short, that there is not the same necessity for caution that there was before. When I came first to the bar, there was great necessity for the rule as to finding caution, because an advocation then took about two years to dispose of, and there was a great amount of writing and copying, and different stages of discussion. Now there is only one stage of discussion; and I think the very utmost time that an appeal can remain, if it be pushed on, is about a month, unless the state of the rolls prevent it. An appeal to the Supreme Court may often be more speedily carried through than an appeal to the Sheriff, and indeed occupies less time than used to be occupied in finding caution under the old system. It is owing to this speed that worthless or untenable cases are now more rarely appealed. In about half of the cases which I have had before me for appeal, an opinion has been taken on the point in dispute, and where this opinion was unfavourable, the appeal was not taken.

13,750. Then there is less inducement to appeal for the sake of delay?—There is none now. When I came to the bar, about half of the cases were for delay, and their disappearance was one cause of the diminution of the rolls. I don't think I could say that within the last two years I have seen more than two or three cases brought for delay, and there certainly was no delay given or got.

13,751. Mr. Adam.—Would you be inclined to increase the sum beyond which an appeal is not allowed?—No; £25, although it appears a small sum to us, is a very large sum to the great majority of people; and if you shut out an appeal under, say £50, you virtually deprive almost the whole population of the benefit of the court.

13,752. Lord Bercaple.—Do you not, on the other hand, give them somewhat of a countervailing advantage in defending them against being dragged through an expensive litigation about a comparatively small sum?—No doubt that is an advantage in cases where the litigation would be tedious and expensive. I think that cannot happen now in many appeals, and would be still less likely under the simpler system I have suggested for small cases. Farther, a more extended irresponsibility would be very corrupting to the inferior judges, and tend greatly to deteriorate their judicial character.

13,753. I suppose that small causes, as a general rule, are less complicated, and involve less difficult points than cases of greater moment?—I don't know that.

13,754. Mr. Adam.—In small cases, would you think it right to require the consent of the judge to an appeal?—No; I think that would put the judge in a very delicate position. It would cause great dissatisfaction if he refused leave.

Charles Scott.

13,755. Dr. Barclay.—Would you allow an appeal in cases below £25, where the Sheriff-principal came to a different opinion from the Sheriff-substitute?—I would scarcely be inclined to interfere with the present limit.

13,756. Lord Barcaple.—There is another class of cases in which there seems to be a peculiar rule in regard to the right of appeal—viz., suspension. There may be a suspension in the Sheriff Court to the amount of £25; but it seems to be held that the same suspension, although the sum charged for is not above £25, may be brought in the Court of Session?—Yes.

13,757. Have you noticed such cases?—Yes.

13,758. They are not very uncommon?—I don't think they are common—suspensions on bills under £21—in the Supreme Court.

13,759. Does not that seem to be an inconsistency, that if it be competent to appeal to the Sheriff in that form of suspension to the extent of £25, that class of cases should not be dealt with as other classes of cases, and that £25 should be the limit under which they should not go to the Court of Session?—Looking to the questions often involved in suspensions, I would not be inclined to make them privative to the Sheriff under £25. Suspensions of bills are about the most difficult cases that come before a court.

13,760. You give the choice entirely to the suspender of which court he will go to?—Yes. I cannot say that I have had above one or two cases of suspensions of bills under £25.

13,761. The Chairman.—Have you any further observations to make in regard to appeals?—There is one matter in regard to which I have found great inconvenience and evil, where a party has to go to the Circuit Court instead of coming at once to the High Court, if he chooses. I have had several cases from Glasgow and elsewhere, where that was virtually a denial of justice, and in one instance caused the party many hundred pounds of loss.

13,762. Dr. Barclay.—Have you found in these cases that the judges on circuit frequently certify to the High Court?—Sometimes they do.

13,763. And the expense in the Circuit Court is thrown away?—Yes.

13,764. The Chairman.—You are now alluding to appeals in civil causes?—Yes.

13,765. Dr. Barclay.—Are there any appeals in civil causes except under the Small Debt Act?—There are various statutory appeals. There was one police case where I was counsel in a suspension of the judgment, where a cab proprietor in Glasgow had gone to London to contest the last police bill for Glasgow, and got, as he thought, a special clause introduced, allowing unlicensed hackney coaches to stand at railway stations; he had a large number of cabs, half of them licensed and half unlicensed, and he put an equal number of each kind at the railway station. A complaint was brought against him for this, and he pleaded the statute; but the magistrates convicted him of an offence against the Act, and fined him. He appealed, and his appeal lay to the Circuit Court. But in the interval they brought another case against him, and I think they convicted him in eight cases, and announced their intention of going on convicting him till the circuit came. In order to avoid that, he brought a suspension to the High Court, but it was found incompetent; and the result was, that he had to give up the privilege which he thought he had obtained, and get all his cabs licensed, simply because, if he had waited till the circuit, he would have been ruined by the accumulation of fines.

13,766. The Chairman.—Then you think it should be competent in such a case to come at once to the court in Edinburgh?—Yes, in the same form.

13,767. Dr. Barclay.—You would do away with the appeal to the circuit?—No. In the general case they would go to the circuit; but where they choose, let them come to the court in Edinburgh.

13,768. The Chairman.—I understand the point of your citation of this case is, that the appeal to the court in Edinburgh was found to be incompetent, and therefore the party had no remedy but to go to the circuit?—Yes.

13,769. And not being able to get redress till the circuit came round, he was in the meantime subjected to a continuous assault. You think he ought to have had the power of coming at once to Edinburgh?—Yes.

13,770. Then it was not an appeal taken to the circuit for mere delay?—Oh no; it was a bona fide case.

13,771. You would still leave the power of appeal to the Circuit Court?—Yes.

13,772. Mr. Adam.—Do you happen to know the result of the appeal to the circuit?—It never was carried out. The appellant was obliged to get licences.

13,773. Dr. Barclay.—Could he not have appealed every one of the convictions?—But if he had been found wrong, he would have had to pay all the fines, and probably after several convictions would have been sent to jail. The amount of fines would have been ruinous.

13,774. But it would have been the same if he had appealed to the High Court?—He would have had to pay the first fine; but he would have got the point decided before the other cases were brought against him.

13,775. Mr. Shand.—But the party abandoned his case on the merits at the Circuit Court?—He had licensed his cabs by that time.

13,776. And he did not ask a decision on the merits?—No; because the evil was irretrievable. I have known a great many more cases of that sort.

13,777. The Chairman.—What is your next suggestion?—I think there ought to be a power given to any civil court to state a special case for the opinion of the High Court.

13,778. You think that in any inferior court the parties should have power to prepare a case, and submit it to the High Court?—Yes, with the consent of the judge.

13,779. Mr. Shand.—Or do you mean that the judge should have that power?—Yes.

13,780. Dr. Barclay.—In all classes of cases, small debts included?—Yes. There are some points on which the judge feels himself very much at a loss what to do in small debt cases; and I think there would be no abuse of it if the parties could not do it without the consent of the judge. The sum nominally at stake in such cases is often small, while the actual interest is very large.

13,781. The Chairman.—To relieve his difficulty?—Yes.

13,782. Lord Barcaple.—Would you apply the same thing in the Sheriff's ordinary jurisdiction?—I think it can be done under the Act.

13,783. Mr. Shand.—I suppose it is only in those cases in which just now review is excluded that you would give that remedy?—Yes; there are some cases which, though of small amount, really decide very serious interests. There is also a class of cases where I think it could be introduced with advantage—viz., where a referee or arbiter felt himself in a difficulty.

13,784. The Chairman.—You think he should be allowed to consult the court?—Yes.

13,785. Upon a case stated?—Yes.

13,786. Prepared by him?—Yes, or by the parties with his consent, or by his desire.

13,787. Stating his difficulty?—Yes.

13,788. Dr. Barclay.—Do you apply that to all references,—not only judicial references, but also submissions?—It is more to submissions that I do apply it. I think judicial referees might get over the difficulty better than other referees.

13,789. Mr. Paterson.—Might not an arbiter, when in the least degree puzzled about a case submitted to him, take an opinion of counsel as it were from the court, and decide according to that opinion, and in that way pocket his fee without doing the work?—It might be so in the case of some arbiters, but I would scarcely expect it.

13,790. Might not that encourage parties to have all their disputes settled by arbitration, knowing that the court was behind the arbiter, to keep him right?—It might have some effect. But I think the court is coming to be so much speedier and cheaper than an arbiter, that an arbiter will not be so much preferred now.

13,791. Lord Barcaple.—Have you observed whether the practice of going to an arbiter has increased or diminished in your time?—I don't think I can speak to that. I have been in a great many arbitrations of different kinds, but I never found an arbitration cheaper than the court, or more rapid. It is a very inferior kind of remedy in most cases, and the unsuccessful party has no respect for the judgment, and often sets himself to see how he can get rid of it.

13,792. Mr. Webster.—And when an arbiter dies, the whole falls?—Yes.

13,793. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the judicial business of the court has increased in quantity and in importance of late years?—I think that up to the passing of the late Act there was a diminution in the rolls, but that was owing to reasons entirely unconnected with the popularity of the court. In the first place, the cases brought for delay had to a great extent disappeared,—I mean comparing them with what they were when I came to the bar, when there was an immense number of them.

13,794. Lord Barcaple.—Do you apply that observation to causes generally?—Yes.

13,795. That is, there is a much smaller number of causes in which the defender appears merely for the purpose of delay?—Yes; and there has been a great number of statutes cutting off cases that were previously competent to the Court of Session, some of them of a very important kind. This I think was going in the wrong direction. Instead of withdrawing the cases from the court, it ought to have been made fit for the cases.

13,796. Mr. Baxter.—How do the cases stand in point of importance?—Very much the same, I think. The causes are much more bona fide.

13,797. Mr. Gordon.—Are these not more important, from the number of bank cases and railway cases?—Yes. I omitted to notice these; and there are also many other important cases in regard to companies.

13,798. Mr. Baxter.—Do you consider the judicial staff of the court at present more than is required for the due despatch of the business?—Even at present I don't think so; and for this reason, that the business is not up. I think the best test of that is whether the business is all done, or whether there is business before them. I think a court is not in a proper state unless its business is up.

13,799. Mr Shand.—And in point of fact there have been a great many duties thrown on the judges in recent times which they did not formerly perform, particularly in regard to inquiries into fact by the present system of proofs. That occupies the time of the judges to a very large extent, compared with what it used to do?—Yes; the Lords Ordinary, as a universal rule, come to court at ten o'clock and sit till three or four, and I have been before some of them till six o'clock. I have often been before Lord Barcaple long after four o'clock.

13,800. Don't you think it desirable that the judges should be more assisted than they are, by the clerks of court doing work in chambers?—I think that might be done, but it does not seem popular at present with the agents. To make it work well, you would require highly qualified clerks.

13,801. Even with that assistance, you don't see your way to any diminution of the judicial staff?—No. I have been informed by agents, and I believe from my own practice, that since the late Act passed, the business of the court has been gradually increasing.

13,802. Lord Barcaple.—You mean the business coming into court?—Yes; during last session and this session.

13,803. Dr. Barclay.—Do you refer to original cases, or to cases under appeal?—Both; but the increase is not so great in appeals as in cases of original jurisdiction.

13,804. Lord Barcaple.—Have you observed whether proof in some form is taken in a larger number of causes than formerly?—I think so.

13,805. Can you explain how that has happened?—There were a great many more decisions on relevancy than now. Farther, I think commissions worked very badly.

13,806. But I understand you to say that a larger proportion of causes were formerly decided without any proof being taken?—Yes.

13,807. The bad working of commissions does not seem at first sight to be the reason of that?—They had two alternatives formerly,—either a commission or a jury trial,—and they got over the difficulty in some way.

13,808. What did they do?—Sometimes they adjusted admissions.

13,809. Was that a very bad thing?—It was; when they had to give up what they thought the true state of the facts.

13,810. If they had to give up what they thought the true state of the facts; but if what was not the true state of the facts, that was not a bad result. Is not the taking of evidence in any form very much the most expensive part of litigation?—I think it is. It is what causes the great proportion of the expense.

13,811. Does any plan occur to you for diminishing the amount of evidence that is being taken in causes in court?—I have heard affidavits spoken of.

13,812. Have you any opinion with regard to that?—I think that, unless on incidental points, that would be a very dangerous kind of evidence, and would lead often to more expense, if it is to be as in England, where the party is entitled to cross-examine the deponent. Besides, I think that a party, outwith the presence of the judge and his opponent, might be led to swear to a manipulated affidavit, which he would require afterwards to adhere to at all hazards. But an affidavit might answer for a case where a motion is made for a mandatory, and it is denied that the party is out of the country, or for cases of that sort.

13,813. But, on the merits of the cause, what is it that appears to you to be unsatisfactory about the system of affidavits, worked as it is in England?—There is no means of cross-examination when the affidavit is taken. Farther, there is the other objection I referred to.

13,814. They do cross-examine in England?—That may be, but it is done afterwards in court. The expense is then much increased.

13,815. The Chairman.—It is in the power of the party to have the person who made the affidavit cross-examined if he chooses: consequently the affidavit is made in the knowledge that such a power exists, and is very often exercised. But if the party does not move to have the deponent cross-examined, he accepts the affidavit?—I am told that the English lawyers are endeavouring to get rid of that system, so far as it refers to proof on the merits. It has worked very well in services; we have it in such cases.

13,816. Lord Barcaple.—Are there not many points that are not admitted by an opponent on the record, but which he would admit at once if he saw proof that satisfied him that you were prepared to appear in court and swear to it?—That may be.

13,817. The Chairman.—Would it not have the effect of bringing the party to consider the veracity of his statement on record? A statement put on record at present is a sort of pleading: it is not the party himself pledged to it, and he does not feel committed to it. But if he deponed to it, his opponent might say, 'This is a respectable man—I don't believe he would swear falsely; and therefore I will not insist in my statement?'—I have no doubt it would have that effect in many cases.

13,818. Lord Barcaple.—You have said that there is a greatly increased amount of bona fides in litigation. That being so, and a party having quite honestly said he does not admit the things stated by his opponent, he does not personally know them, and he leaves his opponent to show how the matter really stands, he would be very well satisfied with the affidavit of respectable persons who are in a position in which they must know the facts?—In a case of that kind it would work very well.

Charles Scott.

13,819. Are there not many of these cases in modern practice?—A good many; a great many, I think.

13,820. Mr. Adam.—That would be something like extending the oath of calumny to ordinary cases?—Yes; but not altogether the same. It would be an oath to details.

13,821. Lord Barcaple.—It would do away with one of the leading evils that now exists in the expense of proofs which might be taken in that less expensive way, would it not?—Yes, if the other party was satisfied. If not, it would add to the expense.

13,822. In very many cases?—Yes.

13,823. Mr. Paterson.—Would you go the length of suggesting an ex parte affidavit in any case, sufficient to determine a disputed matter of fact in favour of the opponent?—No. That would lead to great evils.

13,824. You recommend it subject to the power of cross-examination? Who is to put the cross-interrogatories?—I understand that the party appears before the court; but I can scarcely say that I recommend it. The report of the English Judicature Commission appears to wish to get rid of these affidavits, except on incidental points.

13,825. Dr. Barclay.—In the case of a witness whose evidence was required for a jury trial, have you not seen the court sending down a commission with interrogatories, both in chief and in cross?—Yes.

13,826. And nobody attending but the commissioner?—I have not seen that.

13,827. Mr. Shand.—Is it matter of notoriety that several of the leading members of the bar have been repeatedly offered places on the bench, and have declined?—I have heard so.

13,828. To what do you attribute that?—It must be because their practice is more lucrative, or in some cases it may be political ambition.

13,829. Lord Barcaple.—There may be other causes?—These are what I have heard it generally attributed to.

13,830. Mr. Shand.—Is it to any extent attributable to the want of inducement in the shape of remuneration?—That is one reason which I have stated.

13,831. Is that the reason to which it is mainly attributed?—Yes, by public opinion at the bar.

13,832. The Chairman.—Does that arise from the salaries of the judges being too small, or the emoluments of the counsel being too great?—Some people might say both, but certainly the salaries of the judges are too small.

13,833. Mr. Harrison.—I suppose it is the tendency of the multitude in the present day to rush to one or two barristers, and give them the whole business?—Very often.

13,834. The Chairman.—Have you anything further to say as to the pleadings and procedure in the court, including the investigation of facts?—With reference to the pleadings and procedure apart from proof, I think that the leading object ought to be to come at the substance of the case as quickly as possible; and although it is almost as speedy now as in any court in the country, there are still one or two alterations which might make it speedier, and more to the satisfaction of the litigants. At the outset of the cause, when the summons has been served, I think it ought to be in the power of the parties, if they choose, instead of defences, to lodge a joint minute with an issue, or a joint minute with a special case, or a joint minute with a reference to oath, on the footing—agreed to in the joint minute—that the result should conclude the cause. I have seen many a case where parties were compelled to lodge defences to prevent decree, where there was nothing but a question of fact which could have been quite well stated in an issue.

13,835. Do you contemplate that the judgment should be pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, subject to appeal to the court?—Yes.

13,836. In a reference to oath, it would be on the import of the oath?—Yes.

13,837. Lord Barcaple.—Do you mean that the special case should go to the Lord Ordinary?—Yes.

13,838. At present special cases go per saltum to the Inner House. Do you see any objection to that?—None. A special case has the advantage of reducing the whole elements of the cause to a question of law, not complicated by irrelevant facts, and a record generally contains a good many of them. I find that the special case is becoming more popular every day, and they are increasing in number. I have myself recommended them in a great many cases. They satisfied every requirement of the parties.

13,839. And was that course adopted?—Either that course was adopted, or the parties settled after the special case was adjusted. It seemed to bring them to the definite question at issue.

13,840. The Chairman.—Have you, in adjusting the special case, found much difficulty in bringing the parties together?—The agents come together.

13,841. Do you find them easily brought to accord in regard to what the facts stated are to be?—It is sometimes difficult; but if they really wish to avoid delay and expense, they do come to a conclusion. One party prepares the case, and it is sent to the other party to revise, and there are mutual adjustments.

13,842. And in the course of time, if the special case is popular, it will become more habitual to concede unnecessary points?—Yes.

13,843. Mr. Adam.—Do you see any objection, when the record is closed and probation renounced, to allow the parties to go to the Inner House—both parties consenting to that course?—I would object to that in the general case, and I would object to the Lords Ordinary being turned into a chamber. I have thought over that a great deal, and I find that when the case is new, and the points are not defined by any judgment, one judge is the most satisfactory tribunal. You come much more familiarly into contact with the mind of the judge, and he with your argument, than where there are four or more judges. They are finding out this in England.

13,844. Lord Barcaple.—It involves an entire double procedure and double expense, however?—There may be a reclaiming note in some cases.

13,845. There is a reclaiming note in most cases?—No; I should say that in more than half the cases within my experience there is not a reclaiming note.

13,846. Of final judgments?—Yes. Besides, as I understand, the advocates of a chamber do not propose to make it final. They propose a chamber above a chamber; and I have no doubt the reclaiming would be the same as from a Lord Ordinary,—I mean if the appeal were to an independent tribunal really consisting of different judges. Two or even three chambers, occasionally resolving themselves into an appeal chamber, could not possibly get through the business of the court. On the other hand, if there were no appeal within Scotland, it would be a great misfortune, and would necessarily lead to a more accessible appeal tribunal in London, and ultimately to the transference of the Supreme Court to London. Further, if the court were transformed into two or three chambers, half a dozen men would attach themselves to each, and the rest of the bar would be annihilated, thus sapping the very foundation of the Supreme Court.

13,847. Mr. Shand.—You highly approve of the system of special cases?—Yes.

13,848. And of these cases being disposed of by the Divisions rather than by a Lord Ordinary?—Yes; although I cannot overlook the disadvantage of there being no appeal within Scotland.

13,849. If the parties, by renouncing probation, have made their cases special cases, why should they not go to the Inner House?—If they put their case into the proper shape of a special case, and not into a lengthy or vague record, I see no objection, if you once fix down the definite facts that the court have to go on, and save them from wading through the record.

13,850. But if that is done upon a record by statements and answers, and the parties have agreed on the facts or ascertained the facts by minutes, why should that not be treated as a special case?—I was not adverting to the settling of the facts by minute. But then the minute must be a proper special case, stating a few definite facts, and ending with a question of law. Almost all the minutes which I see only admit a few minor facts, and bring the case to no definite point whatever. The minute, to go to the Inner House, should be a proper special case, and exclude everything not in it.

13,851. But in that case, do you think Mr. Adam's proposal could be a good one?—I think it might. On this point I may say that though records are much improved, I think they might be still further improved by the parties in respect of brevity.

13,852. Lord Barcaple.—Have you observed how the new system is working, by which the defender having given in his defences, and there not being a demand for revisal, or if there is such a demand, it not having been sanctioned by the Lord Ordinary, the record is closed simpliciter on the summons and defences, with no answer of any kind to the defender's statement, if he has made a statement?—I have seen no reason to complain of that, so far as my own practice is concerned.

13,853. The statement, if properly made, gives fair information to the pursuer of what case the defender is to make?—Yes.

13,854. But the other object of the record, in the old sense of the word, is not attained, if in any way limiting the disputed facts of the case by obtaining admissions. Does it occur to you that there is a practical evil resulting from that?—In some cases there is; but in the great majority of cases I think it sufficiently fixes their statements.

13,855. Do I understand it to be your opinion, that upon the whole matter the balance of convenience and advantage is in favour of the new system?—I think decidedly so.

13,856. Mr. Shand.—It is a great advantage, is it not, to be able to close the record at once, upon a general denial, either expressed in a minute, or understood without any minute?—Yes.

13,857. And where the parties can narrow the case by admissions, that can be done, and is done, in the summary debate roll?—Yes.

13,858. The parties can then, by minutes of admission, admit enough to enable the court to dispose of the case?—Yes; but I have very rarely seen them do so.

13,859. You think that system works well?—I think so. There are particular cases, which are much in the minority, where it is right that there should be an answer to the statement.

13,860. Lord Barcaple.—In these cases you have to satisfy the Lord Ordinary that there should be revisal?—Yes. I think also that on adjustment a pursuer is entitled to reply to the answers to his condescendence. That somewhat narrows the case, even where there is no revisal.

13,861. There is a mode in which that object is attained in England—viz. by asking the court to allow special interrogatories to be answered. Suppose the defender wishes the pursuer to admit or deny certain specific points, he may go to the court with interrogatories prepared, and ask that the defender be appointed to answer these on oath?—I think that might work very well in many cases.

13,862. It might cause some little expense, but it might greatly limit the expense of a proof, and make it unnecessary to bring certain witnesses; or it might even make a proof altogether unnecessary?—I suggested a provision of that kind some time ago.

13,863. Mr. Clark.—Could the interrogatories be adjusted, do you think, without the intervention of the judge?—On the application to settle them, I think the judge would require to interfere.

13,864. Do you think that expense and delay might be saved by getting an officer of court to do it?—I don't know any that could be entrusted with it.

13,865. Mr. Gordon.—Might it not be done in this way: interrogatories might be prepared, and the judge appealed to only in the event of there being any objection?—Yes. There is a little difficulty just now, which the court could easily correct, as to the effect of not putting in a minute of denial of the defender's statement.

13,866. The Chairman.—What is the doubt?—Different judges have different opinions about it. For example, in the First Division some of the judges seem to think that if the pursuer does not put in a minute of denial of the defender's statement, he is held to admit it.

13,867. Lord Barcaple.—The pursuer has never had an opportunity by law of saying that he either admits or denies it?—That is just the doubt. It is held by some that the old system remains as to that.

13,868. But that would not be exactly the old system. On the old system he abandoned the right to revise, on condition of that explanation, but now he does not abandon anything?—That is just the point as to which one would like to know whether all the judges are of the same opinion. I am obliged to put in a minute of denial, for safety.

13,869. The Chairman.—You think that ought to be settled?—I think so.

13,870. Mr. Shand.—An Act of Sederunt would do it?—Yes. I mention this because, in the First Division the other day, the Lord President asked me if there was a minute of denial, and luckily I had a minute of denial in; but some of the judges do not think it necessary.

13,871. The statute does not provide for anything of the kind?—No.

13,872. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion about pleading?—Sometimes the Sheriff's judgment is brought under review by suspension or by reduction. Now, where nothing is wanted but a review of the judgment on the same grounds as were stated in the Sheriff Court, I think it ought to be by simple note of appeal,—in the case of a suspension, craving suspension, and in the case of a reduction, craving reduction, and let it just go, like an appeal at present, to the Division.

13,873. Mr. Clark.—How would you serve the appeal where the process has been extracted?—You go to the single bills and get a warrant for production of the process, just as in a reduction at present you get from the Lord Ordinary a warrant to get the process. I see no use of stating over again in a record the grounds stated in the Sheriff Court.

13,874. Mr. Gordon.—But in suspensions at present you require to go over the same grounds?—You have a note of suspension, and that has to run the course of the Outer House. I don't see any more reason for having a record, or for going through the Outer House in mere review by suspension or reduction, than in review that used to be by advocation. And in the single bills the question of sist would arise.

13,875. The Lord-Justice General.—An appeal of that kind would require to be served in the same way as an original summons?—In the same way as a note of appeal in a sequestration.

13,876. How is that done?—By a messenger serving it.

13,877. The Lord Justice-General.—On what induciæ is the respondent called?—I think it is eight days. Then under the warrant you would get the Sheriff Court record, and you have all the grounds there the same as in an advocation.

13,878. Mr. Shand.—Do you think the service might be by post?—Just now an appeal is just served by letter.

13,879. Do you know that jurymen are now cited by post letters?—Yes.

13,880. And that on the late circuits it has been found that the attendance was quite complete?—I don't know a single case where there was any miscarriage.

13,881. Mr. Adam.—Do you think a certificate by an agent or an agent's clerk, who is responsible, should be taken as sufficient evidence of service, as is done in the Bill Chamber?—I think that might work well enough. There might be some cases where it would be doubtful.

Charles Scott.

13,882. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make as to juries?—With reference to juries, I think it is a pity that jury trial should get into desuetude. I have had a very large experience of juries, and I think I may safely say that I recollect no case where they were very far from the substance and justice of the case.

13,883. Lord Barcaple.—You are speaking specially of civil causes?—Yes. I have thought a good deal on this subject; and for the purpose of a decision upon a question of fact, I don't know that a mind which has been highly cultivated in one direction is the best judge of it. I think you get a more satisfactory decision from average men brought together, than from a man highly cultivated in one direction.

13,884. And a more satisfactory decision on a point of fact depending on common matters from twelve minds than from one?—Yes; they neutralize each other's specialties.

13,885. Mr. Adam.—From twelve minds instructed by one educated mind?—Yes; I think it is a very satisfactory tribunal for most kinds of cases. There are complicated accountings, and other cases of that kind, which are unfitted for jury trial; but where it is a question of fact that can be put into an issue,—a question of fact not involving arithmetical calculations,—I have found them always very satisfactory, whether they were against me or for me. The only necessity is to diminish the expense of jury trial. That is the only difficulty now in the way of jury trial, and that was the real cause of its unpopularity,—the long time that each trial occupied, and the expense of the jury. The expense of the witnesses is just the same as in a proof, except for the longer time occupied.

13,886. The Lord Justice-General.—Have you any suggestion to make with a view to diminish the expense?—I think a shorthand writer would diminish it.

13,887. Lord Barcaple.—In what way?—I have very often seen delay caused by the judge taking notes, by having to wait for the judge. Some judges take notes much more rapidly than others; but in the general case it is impossible for a judge, if he takes down the evidence correctly or properly, to be so quick as a shorthand writer.

13,888. He cannot write so quickly as a shorthand writer; but, after all, he cannot go quicker than the evidence?—No.

13,889. Does an ordinary judge not generally go just as fast as the evidence goes?—If he does so, he must be omitting a great deal that is said.

13,890. Why?—I have often had to wait, while the judge was taking his notes, to watch the judge's pen, that I might know when to go on.

13,891. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you find generally that you have to wait much?—Not very much at each question; but the whole delay comes to be large.

13,892. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think that the judge has not quite as often to wait for the counsel?—Sometimes, I daresay.

13,893. The Lord Justice-General.—Don't you think that is the more common case?—I scarcely think so. A counsel gets into a bad practice of not being prepared to put his questions quickly; but certainly any counsel that I have seen, much employed in proofs, put their questions more rapidly in succession in a proof than in a jury trial.

13,894. Why should that be?—Owing to the shorthand writer taking the proof.

13,895. How does the employment of a shorthand writer make the counsel more ready with his questions?—It does not make him more ready; but he has not to wait.

13,896. You mean it enables him to be faster?—Yes; and he rapidly gets skilful in doing it.

13,897. Mr. Gordon.—Are you judging from your experience in proofs before the Lords Ordinary?—Yes.

13,898. Your experience is, that the questions are put more rapidly in proofs than in jury trials?—Yes.

13,899. The Chairman.—Do you think that jury trials occupy longer time now than they did when you were first engaged in them?—I have not noticed much difference; if anything, I think they are shorter.

13,900. You don't recollect the period when perhaps a couple of cases or more were tried in a day?—No.

13,901. Lord Barcaple.—But you think that latterly there has been rather an improvement in that respect?—I think so, within my time.

13,902. Mr. Shand.—It happens occasionally now that cases are disposed of in a day?—Yes. In the majority of cases, all the evidence is taken in a day.

13,903. Lord Justice-General.—In connection with the diminution of expense, don't you think that the judge in taking notes is enabled to condense the evidence a great deal more, and to make the notes a good deal shorter, than if it were taken by a shorthand writer?—No doubt of it.

13,904. Does not that conduce to save expense afterwards if the notes come to be printed?—It must necessarily save some expense in printing, although about that there are very exaggerated notions; but the shortening of the evidence in taking it down is a very perilous process.

13,905. Do you think in practice that the substance of the evidence is not fairly represented in the judge's notes?—The bones of the evidence are there, but very often neither the body nor the spirit is there.

13,906. Lord Barcaple.—Is it not more likely, if the judge is abstracting it, that he will give the spirit without the body?—No doubt; but the difficulty is this, that it is very often not the true spirit of the case, but the spirit as the judge conceives it. The counsel, when he begins his case, generally knows much better than the judge can do the points which he is to make; the judge has the record and the issue, but that is all; and he very often looks on something in the evidence as not important, which appears to the counsel to be important, and which afterwards turns out to be important.

13,907. I don't think the suggestion is that he leaves out things, but it is that he shortens the expression of them?—It is very difficult to do that, without leaving out the substance also. Sometimes it is on the expression that the opinion of the jury turns.

13,908. Lord Justice-General.—But if a particular line of evidence with which the pursuer commences his case is important, and the judge is not aware of that, must it not be the fault of the opening speech?—It may be, to some extent.

13,909. Must it not necessarily be so?—Not necessarily.

13,910. Do you think an important line of evidence should not be indicated and explained in the opening speech?—I don't refer so much to the omission of a line of evidence, as of some fact which bears strongly on the case when other facts come to be linked along with it.

13,911. That is a particular fact?—Yes.

13,912. But if the counsel says to the judge at the time, 'This will turn out to be material,' the judge will invariably take it down?—Yes; but I have seen a difficulty about that. I have also seen unwillingness expressed, and also a treatment of the request in such a way as to prejudice the jury against the importance of the evidence. A counsel will suffer a good deal rather than contend with the judge, especially in presence of the jury.

13,913. The Chairman.—If a shorthand writer takes down what passes, question and answer, and that is afterwards written out and printed, don't two evils result from it: in the first place, that there is great expense occasioned by its length; and in the second place, that there is a great deal of matter which is of no value, and it is difficult to find in it what is of value?—There may to a certain extent be something of that kind, but I cannot say that in cases that I have had, I have seen the disadvantage. I could put before your Lordship a great many printed proofs, from which I don't see that very much could be spared. It has the advantage of being an exact photograph of the evidence. Farther, no shorthand writer employed in my cases ever extended the evidence in the shape of question and answer, unless in some special matters, as where the counsel put a leading question. An incompetent shorthand writer may do so; and I have seen one or two proofs extended in that form. But such a shorthand writer ought never to be employed; and such a thing could not happen if the judge employed the shorthand writer, as I hold is contemplated by the Act.

13,914. Have you not seen a good deal of questioning that came to nothing?—Yes. I have also often seen the judge, with the consent of the counsel, direct the shorthand writer to draw his pen through such questionings.

13,915. The Lord-Justice General.—Is it not liable to the objections to which all other photographs are liable,—that certain unimportant things loom very large?—No doubt there are disadvantages connected with it; but these unimportant things will not loom very large in the eye of the court.

13,916. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to make with a view to secure speed and economy in jury trials?—No.

13,917. Or as to the form of pleading? Do you think the way they are addressed on the evidence is a good system?—I think so.

13,918. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think that counsel could in any way limit the amount of evidence and the number of witnesses, of which there is so much cause of complaint in jury trials?—It is a very delicate thing to do, because a jury in Scotland is very exacting. If you leave anything unexplained, they are sure to suspect something. But a case is often overlaid.

13,919. Mr. Gordon.—You have expressed an opinion in favour of jury trial. What do you say to the system of trial by the Lords Ordinary without a jury?—I think that works very well, subject to review. A trial before the Lords Ordinary, not subject to review, was possible before, and is possible still; but it turned out the most unpopular system of all. There were two ways in which it could be got,—by taking the Lord Ordinary as a jury, or by getting specific points which the Lord Ordinary determined without review; but there were some cases which went to the Divisions in law, and there being no review on the facts, they could not get at the law, and the moment that came to be known in the profession, there never was any other proof in that form.

13,920. Mr. Shand.—Is it not very expensive to have the notes taken in shorthand, and thereafter printed at great length, and made the subject of debate in the Inner House?—It certainly is expensive—more expensive than the judge's notes, where the shorthand writer is unskilful; but you will never get any process that has not disadvantages. I am comparing the present mode of procedure with what I was accustomed to before, and I find that it is an immense improvement, and that it gives great satisfaction to the agents and the litigants.

13,921. Lord Barcaple.—What are you comparing it with?—With the only alternatives we had—viz., a jury trial or a commission, or the Lord Ordinary not subject to review.

13,922. You are comparing it, among other things, with jury trial?—Yes, in cases unfitted for it.

13,923. But in cases fitted for a jury trial, does it occur to you that the mode of dealing with them by a proof before the Lord Ordinary is better?—No; I prefer a jury.

13,924. If a case goes before a jury, there is something very nearly approaching to finality on the day of trial?—Yes.

13,925. Mr. Shand.—Do you think that any unpopularity which attaches to jury trial to any extent, arose from the uncertainty of verdicts,—I mean from the fact that they were allowed to be somewhat easily disturbed during a certain period by new trials being granted?—There was some dissatisfaction for some time, owing to one or two cases in which there had been three trials.

13,926. Have you not heard it remarked on in the profession that new trials were granted on too slight grounds?—Not further than that sort of dissatisfaction which I heard expressed for a short time.

13,927. The Lord-Justice General.—What time was that?—I think about two years ago. I cannot exactly state the time.

13,928. Lord Barcaple.—For some years prior to the passing of the Evidence Act, did you observe whether jury trial had been increasing or diminishing?—I don't think I could speak to that.

13,929. You are aware that there were jury trials at the sittings, and there were also jury trials during the session, before the Lords Ordinary? You are not aware whether, putting these two together, the number of trials had not been gradually increasing?—My impression is, that they were gradually increasing, but I cannot speak distinctly to that.

13,930. The Lord Justice-General.—If a jury trial is conducted fairly, and with a due regard to economy, would you expect that, or a trial before the Lord Ordinary with review in the Inner House, to be the more expensive proceeding?—I think a trial before the Lord Ordinary with review would be the more expensive.

13,931. Mr. Baxter.—Why so?—The original expense would be the same, I think, if jury trial were fairly conducted.

13,932. The Lord Justice-General.—Except the expense of paying the jury?—Which is only £6 now.

13,933. Mr. Paterson.—It is pretty strongly put in the report of the Commission of 1834, that the result in jury cases was in some instances due more to management at the bar than to the intrinsic merits of the case. What is your experience as to that?—That is not my experience. Of course, good management must always have its effect, whether before judge or jury.

13,934. Lord Barcaple.—Did not that refer to the then existing form of proceeding at the jury trial, by which it was in the choice of the defender to get the last word?—I think so. In most cases, with a good charge, the system of jury trial is about the best possible for expiscating facts.

13,935. Mr. Paterson.—Did it never occur to you that the jury gave more weight to evidence plausibly and confidentially given, than they did to evidence that was hesitatingly or diffidently given, though both witnesses might equally be speaking the truth?—I think they are very quick at noticing the difference of character in witnesses—often quicker than the judge.

13,936. Take the case where the pursuer and defender are both examined in the same trial, is there nothing in the risk of that sometimes occurring?—They might take an idea that a hesitating man was dishonest, but I don't think they are more liable to do that than a judge.

13,937. The Lord Justice-General.—You think a judge is quite as liable to such a prejudice as a jury?—I think one judge is quite as liable to it as twelve jurymen. I have seen a judge make gross mistakes as to the character and credibility of witnesses. I wish to remark, in regard to the matter of proof, that so far as I have seen, the determination of a question of complicated fact is about the most difficult task that anybody can have to do. It is more difficult even than deciding a question of law; and I don't at all agree with the observation which I have heard made as to distinguishing between the finality of a judgment on the fact and of a judgment on the law. I think a judge goes as often wrong on the fact as on the law, and the fact is truly the substance of the case; the law merely arises out of it.

13,938. The Chairman.—What inference do you deduce from that observation?—I deduce this, that the suggestions for making the Lord Ordinary final in questions of fact go in a wrong direction altogether. If the judgment on fact is erroneous, argument on the law is mere trifling. I have particularly felt this in suspensions in Justiciary, where nothing but law could be urged; and it was impossible not to feel that kept away from the fact, you were merely arguing upon shadows and fancies. The points argued were often mere trifles, while the true question, and almost only important question, was, whether the panel was guilty in point of fact.

Charles Scott.

13,939. Mr. Baxter.—We were told in London, on very high authority, that in questions before juries at the instance of private parties against railway companies, and tenants against landlords, and servants against masters—in short, the weak against the strong—the leaning was always in favour of the weaker party. Have you found that?—I have not found that in cases by servants against masters. I think the leaning generally is in favour of masters. The jury is generally composed of masters. In the case of a railway company there may be that feeling at some particular time, when many serious accidents have occurred; and I have seen cases of that kind, where the feeling was against the railway company and against companies generally; but I don't think it was an unwholesome one.

13,940. Mr. Shand.—Did you ever see a verdict of a jury in favour of a master where the judge had not stated in the strongest possible way that he considered the master ought to win the case?—I have. In a question between master and servant, I don't think the jury at all favour the servant. I have seen juries give verdicts in favour of masters under great temptations to do the opposite. I had one trial, which lasted three days, before Lord Barcaple, by a servant against a master; and although the jury were severely tested, their verdict was for the master.

13,941. Mr. Clark.—Has a railway company much chance?—It runs rather a risk.

13,942. Or an insurance company, or a landlord?—With regard to cases against insurance companies, in one important case which I had, the jury struck off a very large sum from the claim. I don't think a jury would do injustice to a landlord.

13,943. Did you ever know a landlord to win?—Yes.

13,944. Lord Barcaple.—I suppose that if juries are properly constituted, they will contain a proportion of all these classes—not railway companies, of course, but persons connected with railway companies, and landlords and masters?—Yes. I think a jury is generally very conscientious.

13,945. The Lord Justice-General.—You have been engaged, I daresay, in a good many trials against railway companies, at the instance of persons injured by accidents on the line?—Yes, a great many.

13,946. Have you found many bad verdicts against the railway company in the course of your experience?—I have not. I have been in cases where the railway company got a verdict in their favour.

13,947. But have you found, in the course of your experience, any verdicts against railway companies in such cases, that ought not to have been returned?—I don't think I ever saw a case where they did not deserve it.

13,948. I suppose you have seen a great many cases in which the railway company thought they were bad verdicts?—Yes.

13,949. Lord Barcaple.—I suppose generally, when there was dissatisfaction with the verdict, it had reference rather to the amount of damages given than to the liability for damage?—Very often. And sometimes they might be technically wrong in the verdict; that is to say, on some subtle principle of law they might be wrong.

13,950. The Lord Justice-General.—In cases of that description, have you ever found the jury go wrong against the charge of the judge?—I have not.

13,951. Mr. Harrison.—Is not the amount of damages given by juries apparently a matter of haphazard?—That is a much more difficult question.

13,952. Lord Barcaple.—Is it not a very difficult and delicate problem for any man or set of men to determine the damages to be given by a railway company for an accident?—No man can do it accurately; it is just a guess.

13,953. Is there not in it an unusual element of difficulty from endeavouring to make the company recompense the pursuer for a matter that did not properly enter into the contract between them—either life or health?—Yes; and often the total uncertainty of how the accident is to result, in the case of a party injured.

13,954. Mr. Shand.—Can you charge your memory with any one case in which you can characterize the damages given in such cases in Scotland as being extravagant?—Not in any case that I have had; but I have read of cases in which large damages were given.

13,955. In Scotland, are you aware of any case in which you could characterize the damages as large?—No. The cases in which I have been, have been generally cases where a comparatively moderate amount of damages was given. I have read of cases where very large damages were given.

13,956. Lord Barcaple.—In cases of large damages, I presume the pursuer is usually in rather a superior rank?—Yes, very often.

13,957. Must it not necessarily be so?—I have seen comparatively large damages given where the man was likely during life to be subjected to great torture. I have had one or two cases of that kind, where it was clear from the nature of the injury that the man must always undergo great torture from a change of weather, or some cause of that sort.

13,958. What amount of damages was given there?—£1100.

13,959. In the cases where thousands have been given, I presume the pursuer was necessarily a person of a superior rank?—Not necessarily, but very often.

13,960. They were not persons in humble position?—No.

13,961. Lord Justice-General.—And therefore not so likely to enlist the sympathies of the jury?—The jury generally take the station of the pursuer into account in estimating the damages.

13,962. Mr. Shand. Is it your experience, with reference to jury trial, that jurymen as a rule are disposed to give great weight to any indication which the judge may give of his opinion?—Always.

13,963. Mr. Harrison.—That is to say, where the decisions of juries are satisfactory, it is generally because they have accepted the directions of the judge?—I would not say that. I have seen them give a very satisfactory judgment against the suggestion of the judge.

13,964. Mr. Shand.—Or where there has been no indication from the judge?—Or where there has been a contrary indication. In their opinions on the facts, the jury are very often right, and the judge wrong.

13,965. Lord Justice-General.—Supposing the judge to have great weight with the jury, don't you think the presence of the jury has great influence upon the judge in making up his mind upon the evidence?—Yes.

13,966. And that he will form a much better opinion upon the evidence because he has got the jury to charge?—No doubt of it. I have heard a great deal said against jury trial and against the verdicts of juries; but looking back on my own experience, whether the verdicts were for or against me, I cannot say that I can discover any cases justifying that opinion, except that very often those against whom the verdicts are given take a dislike to the jury. Self-willed judges are also apt to dislike juries.

13,967. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Have you had experience in cases of right of way?—Yes.

13,968. Have you found satisfactory verdicts by juries in such cases?—Yes. Of course there is generally room for two opinions.

13,969. Is it not generally observed that the verdicts are in favour of the public, and against the proprietors?—The tendency is in that way, but there are verdicts both ways, and I cannot say that I could point to any case where they did so unjustly.

13,970. Lord Barcaple.—May that not be accounted for by the fact that in the majority of the cases the right judgment is in favour of the party seeking to establish the right of way?—Yes. He prepares his case, and understands the facts before bringing the action generally. There are cases, I daresay, where there was a failure owing to not taking into account some principle of law. For example, there was a clamant case before the First Division, from Elgin, where the jury had not noticed, or did not give effect to a sort of short gap in the continuity of the possession or use of the road, and gave a verdict for the pursuer, where it ought to have been for the defender. The court set that right.

13,971. The Lord Justice-General.—The trial to which you are referring occurred in the Second Division?—Yes, I think so.

13,972. Mr. Paterson.—Did you never in any case get a verdict in your favour when you had made up your mind that you were to lose the case?—Yes, I think I have sometimes.

13,973. And I suppose you have lost several which you considered you were fully entitled to gain?—I have.

13,974. Lord Barcaple.—Did that never happen to you in cases that were not before a jury?—Very often it happens before the Lord Ordinary or the Division; but when you go before a jury, though you may have the opinion that you will gain or lose, the facts often come out quite differently from what you expected.

13,975. Mr. Paterson.—But I refer to the opinion you formed at the close of the case, when the jury retired?—Yes, that is what I meant.

13,976. The Lord Justice-General.—Has it ever occurred to you that your first impression of a verdict against you was that it was wrong, and afterwards, on reflection, you came to change your mind?—I very often thought they were right within half an hour after they had delivered their verdict, when I began to think of it. A counsel is necessarily biassed in regard to his case.

13,977. The Chairman.—What is your next suggestion?—There is one remark I wish to make in regard to proofs. It seems to be thought that only one counsel a side is to be allowed to speak after a proof is led, which would be a great injustice in many cases of difficult law. But I don't read the Act in that way. Only one counsel is allowed in summing up the evidence—if it is merely summing up the evidence. But suppose a case which has several branches, on one of which only is proof allowed: when that proof is led, and counsel come to address the court upon the case, I don't think the Act confines it to one counsel a side.

13,978. Lord Barcaple.—Nor to going on the same day?—I think not.

13,979. There are no doubt cases in which either upon a branch of the cause, or upon the whole of it, there is a question of fact that has been remitted to proof, and where there is summing up of the evidence and a judgment very much of the nature of a verdict on the evidence; and there it has been my practice generally to dispose of them on the spot; but that is a very rare instance indeed. The much more common case in our court is a case in which there are a certain number of disputed facts, but there are also a certain number of admitted facts, and there is a great deal of law, the whole going to make up one course; and it would be impossible to pronounce a separate verdict upon the facts; at least if it were done, it would only end in complication and additional procedure. Does it appear to you—if you agree with me that that is a common description of case—that it is desirable that it should be dealt with by calling on the counsel for an immediate argument by one counsel a side on the proof?—I don't think it is desirable. I don't think justice can be done to it in that way; and the delay caused by sending it to the ordinary roll would not be great. Or two counsel a side might be heard at once.

13,980. Mr. Shand.—Would not the expense be very much increased if the case were adjourned, by the fact that copies or prints of the evidence have to be sent to counsel, that counsel must be again instructed, and that the debate would occupy double the time?—I don't think it would occupy double the time, but it would be greater expense.

13,981. Lord Barcaple.—If a case is to go to the Inner House, the evidence has to be printed?—Yes.

13,982. And therefore there would be no written copies of it?—No.

13,983. In that case the difficulty would be got over?—There is almost never any written copy now, except the copy supplied by the shorthand writer.

13,984. Is there not a great risk of additional expense being created, if you create a risk of an unsatisfactory judgment by an unsatisfactory hearing?—No doubt.

13,985. You have said, to my surprise, that you think half the cases of final judgments are not taken to the Inner House; but if there is an unsatisfactory judgment, I presume it will go to the Inner House. If the judge is obliged to give a judgment on matters on which he has not heard counsel, it is apt to go to the Inner House?—No doubt. But I have known what I thought unsatisfactory judgments not reclaimed against.

13,986. Have you observed in your own experience that there have been very important matters which have not come out in argument in these summary debates at the end of proofs?—I have; and which probably don't occur to the mind of counsel till perhaps next day. But that is not very often.

13,987. The pursuer's counsel has spoken upon his impression of the case without having heard what the defender has to say?—At the same time I don't think that is at all necessary, because I think it is quite competent to hear two counsel on each side.

13,988. Mr. Shand.—Is there any reason why counsel should not prepare themselves before the proof, for the legal points that are to come out, just as they do in a jury trial for the law that is to come out there?—None. But counsel, like other men, are not perfect.

13,989. Lord Barcaple.—But at the jury trial the judge does not pronounce judgment on law. He disposes of all the questions necessary, in order to enable him to conduct the trial and advise the jury; but he does no more?—No.

13,990. At the end of the proof he pronounces a judgment on the cause?—Yes.

13,991. The Lord Justice-General.—In the trial of an issue which exhausts the cause, the whole case—both law and fact—is disposed of at the trial, and by verdict?—Yes.

13,992. Mr. Shand.—Would it meet any evil which you think exists at present, if it were understood that it is within the power of the judge to allow the counsel to be heard oftener than once, if he thinks it desirable, or to allow him to reply in special cases?—I think that would do away with the greater part of the evil. The system is working so well and so satisfactorily, that it would be a pity to disturb it much.

13,993. Lord Barcaple.—Can you explain why it should be less necessary to have an argument by four counsel in a cause in which, in addition to all the legal questions, there is also a question of disputed fact?—I never saw any reason for limiting it to two counsel. As I already mentioned, I consider the question of fact often much more difficult to discuss than the law.

13,994. Mr. Shand.—You would not propose that two counsel should speak on each side at the end of a jury trial, after the evidence has been led?—No.

13,995. The Lord Justice-General.—Nor before the Lord Ordinary on a question of fact?—I don't see any reason for a change.

13,996. Don't you think it might be left to the discretion of the Lord Ordinary?—Yes. I may refer to one very complicated case, Forbes v. Grant, tried before Lord Barcaple.

13,997. Mr. Shand.—Was not that exactly a case in which one speech on each side was sufficient?—I don't know that.

13,998. Was not the complication there entirely upon the facts?—Yes.

13,999. In such a case as that, you surely would not propose that there should be four speeches?—I think it would have conduced to the expiscation of the case if a reply had been got to the defender's counsel.

14,000. Why should you, in a case where the sole difficulty is on the facts, have two speeches on each side after the evidence before the judge, and only one before a jury?—I propose to leave it to the discretion of the judge. But I think a jury (though it is difficult to say why) arrive at the truth of a case much more easily than the judge.

14,001. Mr. Clark.—They are not so particular about the road they go, so that they get home?—When you reduce it to its elements, it comes to what I said,—that the average mind is a much better judge of the facts than the highly cultivated mind.

Charles Scott.

14,002. The Chairman.—Do you think it desirable to continue the system of having issues prepared to be sent to the jury?—I think there may be cases when it is not necessary; but, in the majority of cases, it would very much confuse the jury if they got the record put before them. I never could suppose a case in which that should be done; for then they would be left to the counsel to tell them what the point was, and there would be constant interference by the judge as to the statements of counsel in regard to that matter.

14,003. Lord Barcaple.—Would there not be great difficulty in expressing their verdict also?—Yes, I think so. It would be very unsafe, without the judge interfering, to state the point to the jury.

14,004. The Chairman.—Can you make any suggestion with a view to diminish the expense of the preparation of issues?—The new Act allows that to be done at the same stage with the disposal of all points before proof. It is not a separate thing now.

14,005. And that works well?—It does.

14,006. Lord Barcaple.—There is a provision of the statute by which the pursuer is to lodge an issue in all cases; but that seems to be very much neglected?—I suppose that provision was introduced for the purpose of taking care that it should be adjusted, if necessary, at that time.

14,007. There are many cases in which there never will be an issue to adjust?—Yes; in divorce cases, for example. These cases never go to a jury; but still the issue is put in.

14,008. The issue is not put in now in the majority of cases?—I put it in in every case.

14,009. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think it is a regulation in many cases more honoured in the breach than in the observance?—I think so.

14,010. Owing to the great number of cases in which it is totally inapplicable?—If it were a case in which a pursuer had not thought an issue necessary, and had not put it in, I see no difficulty in preparing and adjusting an issue on the spot. But either the issue should be put in, or the party should be required to adjust it on the spot.

14,011. The Chairman.—You have said that you approve of the system of a decision by the Lord Ordinary in the first place, and a review by the court?—Yes. I think it is essential to have a review within Scotland.

14,012. The expense and delay of that are somewhat reduced by the late Act?—I think the time now occupied by it is extremely short. I don't think any one can complain now of the delay of the court in any of its departments.

14,013. Have you any suggestions to make on the subject of that review?—No.

14,014. As to review by the House of Lords, have you any suggestion to make?—I would be very sorry to see that done away with.

14,015. It has been suggested by some that an appeal should be allowed to the House of Lords direct from the Lord Ordinary. Would you approve of that?—No. It is so very expensive a review, that I think it is right that the remedies here should be exhausted.

14,016. Mr. Gordon.—Have you any suggestions to make for improving the proceeding after the closing of the record—I mean in the way of bringing parties as speedily as possible to adjust the issue if there is a question of fact to be inquired into, or to dispose of the question of law?—I think it should not be made compulsory to send the case to the summary debate roll. I think the purpose of that roll was to have everything disposed of before proof. There are many cases where parties are ready to go to proof at once, and there is no necessity for sending these to the summary debate roll. It only causes delay and expense.

14,017. Mr. Shand.—If parties are agreed at present to take an order for proof or for issues, it is not refused?—I never had it granted.

14,018. Have you ever asked for it, both parties consenting?—No; but the provision by which everything before proof is settled at once is a great improvement. I have seen, under the previous system, five or six separate discussions before proof was allowed.

14,019. The Lord Justice-General.—Previous to the late Act?—Yes.

14,020. Mr. Gordon.—There used to be frequently a discussion whether there was a question of fact material to be inquired into?—I have seen first a discussion on a question of title or a preliminary plea; then upon prescription; then came the question of relevancy; and the adjusting of issues generally took two separate discussions.

14,021. Lord Barcaple.—Do you find that counsel generally come prepared in the summary debate roll to discuss all these matters?—I do so.

14,022. But is there not a difficulty occasionally in getting the thing to go on quite so quickly as you are putting it now? Supposing there is a discussion on the title, and the Lord Ordinary announces that he is prepared to repel the objection to the title, do you find that generally the parties are quite ready to discuss all the other matters which precede proof?—I don't think counsel or agents have got completely accustomed to the system yet. They very often forget that everything is to be disposed of at that stage.

14,023. The Lord Justice-General.—But you think that the true theory of the statute is, that at the first discussion in the summary debate roll counsel should come prepared to discuss and dispose of everything that stands in the way either of proof, if there is to be proof, or of the judgment on the merits of the cause, if there is to be no proof?—I assume that to be the theory.

14,024. Including the adjustment of an issue, if necessary?—Yes.

14,025. Lord Barcaple.—Is there not a difficulty experienced at present in this way, that counsel for one party are not aware what line the counsel for the other party are going to take? They are not aware what branch of the case he is going to open fire upon; and when he is heard, the other side are apt to say, 'We were not prepared for this—we must be allowed to consider it,' and to ask the judge to continue the cause?—If I was the Lord Ordinary I would refuse to continue it.

14,026. The result might be that he would pronounce a decision which would not stand, and that after a great deal of procedure, probably, the Inner House would go back on it?—It might. The same difficulty occurs in a more serious form in appeals or in reclaiming notes. You can bring up all the previous points of the cause, and it is very difficult to know beforehand what your adversary is to do. But that disadvantage is more than counterbalanced by the great advantage of shortening the process and reducing the expense.

14,027. The Lord Justice-General.—Have you found in the case of reclaiming notes bringing up all the interlocutors in the cause, that the respondent in the reclaiming note is ever taken by surprise?—I never saw such a case; but I can suppose the difficulty to be greater there than before the Lord Ordinary in the summary debate roll. In appeals it must be very great, because the whole previous interlocutors come up, and counsel may attack any one of them.

14,028. Is it not the same as a reclaiming note? When a final judgment is pronounced on the merits, the reclaiming note brings up every judgment in the case?—Yes; but there may have been previously a reclaiming note. But the advantage of having, at the very utmost, just two debates and a proof, is very great.

14,029. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to make?—In regard to the signet, I think that is really a useless form now.

14,030. Mr. Baxter.—You would abolish it?—Yes.

14,031. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to the taxation of costs in the inferior court?—I think the inferior court agent scarcely gets justice in regard to that. Costs are taxed on too abstract a principle. It is essential to make use of the inferior court agent in many matters where the auditor does not allow the expenses: He proceeds on the principle that the litigant should come personally to the agent here, which is utterly impossible.

14,032. What would you suggest?—I am not well acquainted with the subject. It is more a matter for the agents to consider what would be best for their interests.

14,033. I suppose you say the same as to the privileges of agents?—Yes. I have an opinion on the subject, but it might not be welcome.

14,034. Can you make any suggestions as to simplifying, economizing, or expediting processes of accounting?—I think they have been very much simplified by the late Act.

14,035. Is there not great expense in accountants' fees?—Yes; I think there ought to be a taxing officer there.

14,036. It has been suggested that there might be an officer, or if necessary two paid officers, connected with the court, to whom such questions should be sent?—Yes; I think there is much need of something of the kind. The expenses there appear to be out of all proportion to what is done.

14,037. And there is no control over it?—No. But now that the accountant does not require to prepare elaborate states, but merely to give a general report without states, unless required, the expense is greatly lessened.

14,038. Do they still give the long narrative?—Yes; but that is not essential.

14,039. Lord Barcaple.—You don't mean that they give a long narrative of the procedure?—Very often they do. That would be taxed off if there was a taxing officer.

14,040. The Chairman.—In regard to the Court of Justiciary, have you any suggestion to make?—I have heard great complaints of the fees of court in suspensions: they seem to be very large; and the parties who come there are generally very poor.

14,041. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—That extends probably also to appeals to the circuit?—Yes.

14,042. Mr. Adam.—Judges on circuit, if a question of difficulty occurs, have the power of certifying it for the opinion of the High Court?—Yes.

14,043. The High Court may now sit with a single judge?—Yes. Supposing a case of difficulty occurs at a trial, the single judge would have to dispose of it without any appeal to the High Court?—Yes.

14,044. Does that suggest to you that there might be an appeal on matters of law in the High Court?—I think there ought to be the same remedy there as in a civil jury trial.

14,045. The Lord Justice-General.—But that is not confined to the High Court?—No.

14,046. The judge trying a cause upon circuit has no more power of referring a point of law to the full court than a judge sitting in the High Court has?—No.

14,047. But the question which has now been put to you involves very large considerations as to review in criminal trials?—Yes.

14,048. Have you considered that subject at all?—Yes, I have thought over it; but the difficulty about it is, that I have very seldom heard a supreme judge give a wrong direction in point of law in a criminal trial. In the inferior court that often occurs. I was told of one the other day that must have led to a conviction: it was a case of culpable homicide by furious driving tried in the Sheriff Court, and the Sheriff laid down to the jury that if one party drove furiously, and the other two persons who were beside him did not interfere to prevent him, they were equally guilty; and the whole three were convicted.

14,049. The Chairman.—Were they in the same carriage with him?—Yes.

14,050. Sitting beside him?—Yes. I understand so.

14,051. Mr. Baxter.—There were conflicting judgments at circuit on the subject of a former conviction of theft, and it was at last settled by three judges in the High Court. How are these points now to be determined without a review?—They can easily arrange for more than one judge sitting.

14,052. But it is not known beforehand that the point is to arise?—They could decide it on a bill of exceptions.

14,053. The Lord Justice-General.—Would you propose to have a bill of exceptions?—Yes, for a case like that.

14,054. Mr. Gordon.—You are aware that in the High Court there is a power to call in other judges when the case is likely to give rise to any question of difficulty?—Yes; but I seldom remember in my own experience of hearing in the Court of Justiciary, in a criminal case, what I could say was a manifestly wrong direction in point of law.

14,055. It might give rise to considerable delay in the administration of criminal justice if an exception were admitted?—Yes.

14,056. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make as to the review in the Court of Justiciary?—I think there is a great deficiency at present in the means of getting justice afforded to parties tried for the first time for disgraceful offences,—crimes such as theft. I would not include assault, because it does not affect character so much; but I mean offences that affect the status and whole life of the party. I think it is quite wrong that a party should be convicted without the means of redress on the facts.

14,057. The Lord Justice-General.—You mean by an inferior court, without review?—Yes; I think it is a very anomalous state of matters that you have redress on a £25 account, and not in regard to the sacrifice of your whole life.

14,058. Mr. Shand.—Do you mean your observation to apply to cases tried before the Sheriff and a jury?—No.

14,059. Mr. Clark.—Police cases?—Yes.

14,060. The Lord Justice-General.—And summary trials before the Sheriff?—Yes.

14,061. The Chairman.—In Police cases would you keep a record of the evidence taken in the Police Court?—Yes, I would have a shorthand writer.

14,062. In the Police Court?—Yes.

14,063. The Lord Justice-General.—Who is to pay for him?—I have no doubt that injustice is very often done there, especially to young persons alleged to be criminal, and which ends in their destruction.

14,064. How would you provide for the expense of it?—I would leave it to the party.

14,065. To provide the shorthand writer?—Yes.

14,066. Would you leave it to the accused?—Yes; and I never saw any case, where there was a substantial case, where the party could not get pecuniary assistance for the trial.

14,067. The Chairman.—You mean that in the Police Court a party brought up for theft should be allowed an opportunity of employing a shorthand writer?—Of asking the court to employ one. I would not allow him to employ the shorthand writer.

14,068. To ask the court to employ one at the expense of the party making the request?—Yes.

14,069. Mr. Gordon.—That is in the case of a first offence?—In the case of a first offence only. Another way might be for the magistrate to take notes. Properly speaking, I think there should be an official shorthand writer attached to all courts.

14,070. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think a great deal of care is generally taken by the magistrate in such a case, not to convict if it can possibly be avoided?—The magistrate acts to the best of his ability, but the proceedings are not always satisfactory, nor the result safe.

14,071. Was that where a stipendiary magistrate was sitting?—In both cases. They have a way of knocking through a case.

14,072. What class of judges do you refer to? That would not be so before a Sheriff?—It might. In the Edinburgh Police Court, I have sometimes seen highly experienced bailies, who were in no way inferior to the Sheriffs in handling such cases. There was one very noted case that perhaps may be in the recollection of some here as appearing in the newspapers, where an inspector of markets in Edinburgh was charged with an indecent assault upon a woman whose husband he had brought up for selling unclean salmon. He was convicted, and the evidence appeared to be unsatisfactory as it appeared in the newspapers, although what it really was I don't know. That man was dismissed from his employment at once by the Town Council, who could not help themselves after the conviction; thus utterly destroying his whole future life on the mere judgment of a Sheriff-substitute. The conviction may have been quite right, but it was wrong that it should have been final.

Charles Scott.

14,073. The Chairman.—Was he tried without a jury?—Yes; in the Police Court.

14,074. Mr. Clark.—In England there is a sort of remedy in these cases, by allowing the party to indict for perjury?—That might or might not have done in that case. I do not know on which side the truth lay.

14,075. The Lord Justice-General.—Don't you think the great error in the case you have been describing to us was in sending such a case to be tried without a jury?—I don't think it should have been tried without a jury; it was too serious a case.

14,076. Mr. Clark.—Was it libelled as assault with intent?—I am not sure.

14,077. The Chairman.—And it was dealt with by the Police without being remitted to the Sheriff?—It was dealt with by a Sheriff-substitute on the Police bench.

14,078. It had not been remitted to the Sheriff as a serious case?—No. There was another case the other day, where a policeman was convicted of assaulting a man in the Grassmarket, and dismissed from the force, and the detective who was with him was also dismissed. These men will never get employment again; and it appears to be a very anomalous thing that there should be no appeal in such cases. I have known great numbers of cases of the kind.

14,079.—You suggest review where a party can afford the expense of a shorthand writer?—Yes.

14,080. That could not be reached by a poor party who could not afford a shorthand writer?—I have seen a large number of suspensions, and there never is a case where there is any substance in favour of the party alleged to be criminal, where friends or sympathisers do not come forward to supply the funds. But as I already said, there ought to be an official shorthand writer. Or the judge might take notes.

14,081. Have you any other suggestion as to criminal procedure?—No; except that in serious offences under the Licensing Acts, the Game Acts, Master and Servant Acts, or the like, there should also be an appeal. A judge with social crotchets or prejudices is often a mere oppressor, to whom it is vain to address argument. Farther, the suggestion as to a special case to be stated by the judge applies to these courts as well as to civil courts, if the judge feels a difficulty on a point of law.

14,082. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Or power to reserve for consideration?—Yes; that would be a still better plan.

14,083. Mr. Shand.—If questions of difficulty arise in the High Court of Justiciary, where one judge is sitting alone, do you think it an advantage that he should have the power of reserving points for review?—I think it would do away very much with the difficulty which I have stated.

14,084.—Suppose he had given a decision, and reserved leave to have it reviewed, would you give a new trial in case of his decision being reversed?—I think that should be left to the court. There is only one thing that I have omitted to say with reference to a shorthand writer. I think if the system extends much, or even as it stands at present, it will be essential that a shorthand writer should be appointed by the court, as a functionary of the court. I think there will be gross abuses immediately, connected with the system of allowing the shorthand writer to be employed by the parties. He is too important a functionary to allow him to be employed by the party.

14,085. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Is the shorthand writer not named by some of the judges at present?—No; he is generally employed by the pursuer.

14,086. Without the authority of the judge?—Yes; and I am afraid a system will be introduced of competition and underbidding, whereby incompetent men will come to act as shorthand writers. Respectable shorthand writers will then withdraw. The shorthand writer should be an official paid by salary.

14,087. The Chairman.—I think you said you did not desire to give any opinions on Teind matters?—No.

14,088. Are there any other points on the civil or criminal matters that you desire to state to the Commission?—I don't think so. I had prepared a number of suggestions upon special kinds of actions, such as rankings and sales; and special actions that don't go according to the ordinary modes of process,—with a view to simplifying them.

14,089. You can hand these in.—Yes, I will do so.

14,090. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you embrace multiplepoindings?—Yes; and poindings of the ground.

14,091. Lord Barcaple.—You have stated that where divorces are defended they are very earnestly defended, and that if they commenced in the inferior court, they would, as a matter of course, come to the Court of Session; and for that and other reasons, you think it expedient that they should commence in the Court of Session?—Yes.

14,092. I suppose you are aware that in a very large proportion of divorces there is no defence at all?—Yes; I should say in about one-half.

14,093. But there is a proof?—Yes; and the defender often appears at it, though no defences have been lodged.

14,094. A large number of the divorces are brought at the instance of poor people?—Yes.

14,095. Does it occur to you that there is a hardship to that class of persons in being precluded from bringing their divorce in the inferior court, where there is no defence? They cannot be at the expense—especially persons at a distance—of bringing a divorce in the Court of Session, and sending witnesses from a distant county; and therefore they submit to all the consequences, moral and otherwise, of being without a divorce?—I have heard a great deal said about such cases. I never met with any, and I doubt their existing in any number.

14,096. Does it occur to you that it might be proper to allow the divorce to be brought in the inferior court, but leave it in the power of either party to move it into the Court of Session?—That depends very much upon the relative expense. As matters at present stand, a divorce in the Court of Session, where there is no defence, is a very inexpensive process.

14,097. I am putting to you the element of distance. There are divorces at the instance of poor people living in Edinburgh, and there are some also from Glasgow; otherwise, I don't think there are any at all. But suppose the parties live in Caithness, it would be a very inexpensive proceeding, if the existence of the adultery is clear, to prove the facts and get a decree in the Sheriff Court there; but to bring the witnesses to Edinburgh is very expensive?—There would be the difference of the railway fares.

14,098. And payment of witnesses and subsistence?—Generally that is the same in the country.

14,099. Mr. Baxter.—Are you not aware that it does operate as a bar?—I never saw it; and I have acted as counsel for many poor people in the Court of Session. I have principally heard it spoken of by parties interested in nursing the Sheriff Courts. I never heard it spoken of by workmen.

14,100. Mr. Shand.—Have you not very frequently heard the expense made the subject of complaint?—No. I should like to know the relative cost of the action in the Sheriff Court and in the Court of Session. I don't think the difference is very great. But it is not merely a matter of cost, because you have to take into consideration the judge who is to test the proof.

14,101. The Lord Justice-General.—An undefended divorce cause is a cause in which there may be apprehension of collusion?—Yes.

14,102. It is therefore a very delicate judicial proceeding, to pronounce a decree of divorce in an unde-fended cause?—I think it is a more delicate task for the judge than where it is defended.

14,103. Lord Barcaple.—Have you generally found it to be a delicate case at all when you came to the end of the proof?—I have had cases where the judge, after reading the proof, assoilzied the defender.

14,104. The Chairman.—Have you considered the matter of the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of the Sheriff and his substitutes?—I have thought a good deal over that.

14,105. What view do you take of it?—When I came to the bar, or up to a very late period, the Sheriff-principal was essential. Where an advocation lasted for two or three years, and caution required to be found, it was essential to have an appeal within the Sheriff Court. It is not so necessary now; but still there may be a great many little appeals within the Sheriff Court.

14,106. Do you think it expedient that there should be a power in that way of correcting the errors of the Sheriff-substitute, if he commits any, at a small expense?—If the Sheriff-substitute was a man of much higher position, with a very large income—a man of eminence in his profession—it might not be so necessary. But the office of Sheriff is a very old institution, and I would not be disposed to interfere with it. At the same time the court ought not to discourage appellants passing over the Sheriffs. That would prevent bad appointments, and greatly sharpen up the Sheriffs.

14,107. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose you had to re-organize it, or to institute it for the first time, would you have a double judge?—Not since the late Act.

14,108. The Lord Justice-General.—You mean the late Court of Session Act?—Yes. It is a matter of fact now that an appeal to the Sheriff may delay a cause more than an appeal to the Court of Session. The one may be more quickly decided than the other.

14,109. The Chairman.—Do you think the appeal to the Sheriff would admit of acceleration?—I think it would.

14,110. Mr. Baxter.—If you are correct in your estimate of the expense of £8 a side, you would rather have an appeal to the Court of Session?—That might depend on the matter to be appealed. I was much struck by reading the evidence of Mr. Bell as to the immense number of small appeals that came before him. It would be impracticable for the Court of Session, in its present condition, to dispose of these appeals. I think he said there were about 1100 in a year.

Charles Scott.

14,111. The Chairman.—Do you think that an advocate resident in Edinburgh, and attending the courts, keeps up his law better than one who goes to the country and resides there?—That must be the case generally, but there may be exceptions. It depends very much on his practice. I don't think an advocate without practice keeps up his law very much.

14,112. Mr. Baxter.—And there are a number of the Sheriffs who have not an extensive practice?—A few of them. But speaking generally, the Sheriffs as a class are superior to the Sheriff-substitutes. There may be individual exceptions. There is one thing which I would add with reference to the appeal in the Sheriff Courts, if it is to be retained: I think it is in the best possible form. Any suggestion I have heard as to altering it, would make a much worse system than the present one.

14,113. Mr. Clark.—You mean from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff?—Yes. A court of three Sheriffs would make a very bad court. A court of three Sheriff-substitutes would make a still worse court. Such a petty court, aping a little Court of Session, would command no respect in the country, and would probably not command itself. I would add that the institution of the Sheriffs, though a valuable one, did great injury to the Supreme Court, which was often purposely crippled in order to maintain them; and the wholesome development of the law was thus much retarded, and we had frequently to go to England for our best principles. If the Sheriffs-principal are in the future to injure the Supreme Court and to become aggressive on it, I consider that they ought to be abolished. I cannot overrate the value to the country, and to the development and consolidation of the law, of a powerful Supreme Court superintending and directing all inferior courts. I do not know any Supreme Court more calculated by its present constitution to become popular than the Court of Session; and the outcry raised against it has generally arisen from interested parties.

SATURDAY, 22D MAY 1869.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.
THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.
LORD BARCAPLE.
EDWARD GORDON, Esq., Q.C.
JAMES CAMPBELL, Esq.
DR. BARCLAY.
JAMES ADAM, Esq.
A. B. SHAND, Esq.
GEORGE HARRISON, Esq.
T. G. MURRAY, Esq.
J. B. BAXTER, Esq.
ADAM PATERSON, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

GEORGE MONRO, Esq., examined.

George Monro.

14,114. The Chairman.—You are a practising advocate at the Scotch bar?—Yes.

14,115. How long have you been so?—Upwards of forty years.

14,116. You have had occasion to consider the system of procedure in the court?—I have.

14,117. Would you state your views on the note of points furnished to you, as to which the Commission are desirous to obtain information?—I am very well satisfied with the constitution of the court, and the distribution of the business thereof between the Outer House and the Inner House. With regard to the new court of the Lords Ordinary, we have not had much experience of it.

14,118. That is the temporary court formed by four Lords Ordinary?—Yes. It produced a good deal of delay in the Outer House procedure; but I think it is a valuable institution to be resorted to in case of need. With regard to Teind causes, I think there is very much need of considerable alteration on the whole procedure of the Teind Court, and in the keeping of its records; but probably this Commission will have information upon that subject from persons who have had more experience in that court than I have had. I have devoted some attention to it, and have notes partly proceeding upon conversations which I had last year and this year with a friend of mine who is very well conversant with it, and who has formed a scheme for improving the Teind Court; but probably this Commission had better get his ideas directly from himself.

George Monro.

14,119. Dr. Barclay.—Would you give us his name?—Mr. M'Gillivray, 16 St. Andrew Square.—With regard to the constitution of the court, I am of opinion that the salaries of the judges ought to be raised. The present salaries were fixed at a time when the expense of living was smaller than it is, and they are not sufficient to attract the ablest men at the bar. I think the efficiency of the court would be greatly promoted by an increase of the salaries. I am inclined to think that the additional duties thrown upon the judges by the legislation of last year and previous years must become too onerous, and it may be necessary soon to increase the number of judges; but I state that with great diffidence.

14,120. The Chairman.—Do you approve of the constitution of the court, as consisting of Lords Ordinary and two Divisions?—Decidedly.—The next point is the jurisdiction of the court—privative jurisdiction. I much incline to think that the Sheriff Courts ought to have a co-ordinate jurisdiction in questions of heritable right, and in reductions where the value of the cause is of small amount — perhaps not exceeding £200.

14,121. Dr. Barclay.—Annual value?—No, total value. I don't think the Sheriff Courts are at all so well fitted for that jurisdiction as the Supreme Court; but it is very desirable to encourage people in moderate circumstances to have heritable property, and to have the means of protecting and vindicating their rights at a cost that is suited to their means. That is my only motive for thinking so. Sheriffs have occasional difficulty in questions which are in a great degree questions of possession, yet where points arise as to which there is doubt whether the jurisdiction of the Court of Session may not be privative.

14,122. How would you find the value?—With reference to the ascertainment of the value, I think a sort of precedent may be found in the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, where advocation, with a view to jury trial, is made competent in causes over the value of £40; and there was an Act of Sederunt passed for ascertaining the value where the cause was not simply pecuniary. I don't think there could be much practical difficulty there; and I think the judgment of the Sheriff upon that point, subject to the review of the Sheriff-principal, should be conclusive, because a judgment on the merits can always be carried to the Court of Session by appeal.

14,123. Mr. Baxter.—You say you think the inferior courts are not so well fitted for disposing of questions of heritage. Would you give your reasons for thinking so?—The system of land rights, necessarily from its very nature, is more complex a great deal than questions of personal right or questions of obligation.

14,124. Dr. Barclay.—Is it not much less complex than it was when you went to the bar?—The procedure for making up titles is much simpler; but when questions arise, I don't know that they are any simpler. Perhaps they are more complex, because, as we have always to go back forty years for a prescriptive title, we have three or four successive systems to deal with.

14,125. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think we in the country should be a little up to titles, seeing that we have to frame them?—No doubt you should, and I hope that the Procurators Act, and improved education, will have an effect, but still a great deal of the conveyancing of Scotland, of the highest kind, is concentrated in Edinburgh; and, speaking from my own experience and observation as a Sheriff, and of the way that the procurators deal with questions of heritable right, I would say that Sheriff Courts are not so well fitted for the disposal of such questions. The procurators have not the same extent of business, and I think questions of heritable right, where the amount was great, would always come to the Court of Session. I have the highest respect for the Sheriff Court procurators, but all men get rusty in law that are not every day practising.—I also very much incline to think that it would be well that the Sheriffs had some power of appointing judicial factors upon small estates,—perhaps to the maximum of £200, and subject to the jurisdiction of the Accountant of Court. I think that would be beneficial to many people in moderate circumstances.—Then, so far as regards appeals from the Sheriff Courts, I have considerable doubts whether it was advisable, as was done in the Act of last session, to allow appeals from the Sheriff Court entirely without caution. I have not been able to ascertain that as yet any evil has arisen from that, but I have seen great injustice arise in regard to appeals to the House of Lords from the power that poor parties have of menacing their successful antagonists with an appeal to the House of Lords, which can easily be taken without any security at all; and I have little doubt that the same thing will occur in appeals from Sheriffs. Whether the right of appealing without caution might be limited to the case of a difference of opinion between the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff-principal, may be worth considering.

14,126. The Chairman.—You mean that the question of whether caution should be found might be made to depend upon that?—Yes; if the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff agreed in opinion, that then the party should not be entitled to appeal without finding caution. I think it would be worth consideration also, particularly if the rule as to not finding caution continues, whether the respondent might not be entitled to allow the case to go ex parte, as is done in the House of Lords. For example, where a case is brought up to the Court of Session on judgments on a proof, or what we call a concluded cause, where the whole elements for decision are present, if a party felt very confident that his cause was just, and was not well able to afford the expense of litigation, he might allow the other party to plead the case, and the court to decide it; and if the court should pronounce any judgment requiring a further proof, or requiring further attention on the part of the respondent, there might be an order to give notice to him. With reference also to appeals, the Act of last year limited the power of review by appeal to six months; but, so far as I have observed, there is no limitation of the power of appeal by reductions on the head of iniquity. That is a competent process, and I don't see why there might not be some limitation of the review of Sheriffs' judgments in that form. Probably the same limitation as has been applied to appeals should also be applied to reductions on the head of iniquity. Of course there may be other grounds of reduction which it might not be proper to limit; but reductions of the nature of appeal ——

14,127. Reductions for review?—Yes; that is probably the proper expression; these might be so limited. With reference to writs, pleadings, and procedure, there are various processes—some of them by petition, and some by summons of adjudication, and the like—for making up titles to land, and in these it is necessary to call the heirs of parties deceased; and I have found, particularly since emigration became so common, that it is often difficult to know who the heir of a party is, or whether he had any heirs of his body, or any heirs at all, and in that way sometimes you really cannot get a summons raised. I have heard of parties raising summonses directed against persons whom they knew to be alive thirty years before, as the nearest approximation they could make to it. But why should there not be a power, subject to restriction and with leave of the judge, to cite the heirs of the party deceased, in general terms, simply as the heirs of such and such a person? I think that would be convenient.

14,128. Dr. Barclay.—Edictally?—Of course it must be.

14,129. Lord Barcaple.—After an incidental application to the court for authority to do so, do you mean?—I have not considered the form in which it might be done. But the citation might be given, and the sanction of the judge applied to it after it came into court. It is desirable to make it as simple and cheap as possible.

14,130. Mr. Paterson.—Would you have newspaper publication as a condition of that?—I think these edictal citations are published somewhere.

14,131. Dr. Barclay.—They are published to the profession?—But I think some publication in newspapers or gazettes would be very proper,—whatever would tend to make it sufficiently public without too much expense. I have known great expense incurred by publishing in papers here and there.—I should say the form of summons of reduction, which is a very old and cumbrous form, should be simplified, and that there should be more power to hold a summons of reduction or declarator as repeated in any case where that is necessary to explicate the cause, and where all the parties are already in court.—With regard to the Act of last session, perhaps the phraseology of section 27 in regard to the summary debate roll is rather too stringent—that it is necessary to send every case to the summary debate roll, where parties don't renounce probation. There are a good many cases where it can be seen at once at the closing of the record that there must be probation. I don't say the Act does not admit of that, but I believe there are different constructions upon the subject; and I think, as the counsel and agents have the nature of the case fully in view when they are closing the record and stating whether they can renounce probation or no, that in many cases it could at once be held without going to the summary debate roll, that probation is necessary, and how it should be taken. I would give a little more power to the Lord Ordinary, or make it clear that he has the power. Perhaps at that stage he might have the power to order issues, looking to the nature of the case; because I rather think that in the same section the rule as to parties lodging issues before the case comes on for debate in the summary debate roll, is rather stringent, and in a great many cases we prepare issues without knowing very well whether they are to be of use or no, and there is a good deal of trouble connected with that.

14,132. Lord Barcaple.—Don't you often prepare them when you are confident there never will be issues?—I prepared a very troublesome issue no longer ago than yesterday, in that very position. I think something should be done to prevent that. I understand that of the issues actually lodged, very few come to be adjusted as issues.

14,133. And in a large number of cases, are there no issues lodged?—I believe in a great many they are not lodged.—With reference to the same section, perhaps it would be as well to give the Lord Ordinary power to allow a general answer by the pursuer to the defender's statement to be added upon the record, and any adjustment either of the condescendence or defences that he might think fit, without a revisal.—I also think the rule as to having the debate on a proof immediately after it is concluded is a little too stringent, because it often happens that questions of law depending upon the facts that may be ascertained in the course of the proof have to be argued, and counsel have not sufficient opportunity of considering the case, examining the authorities, and giving all the assistance in their power to the judge, without some short interval for that purpose. I think the judge might have a little more power and discretion given to him in regard to that.—I am also inclined to think that in debates on reclaiming notes in the Inner House, the senior counsel ought to open instead of the junior. The practice that at present exists seems to have sprung out of, although it is not exactly in accordance with, a communication that was made by the court to the Faculty, and which is printed at p. 839 of the 4th vol. of Shaw and Dunlop. This was immediately following the Judicature Act of 1825. It is not satisfactory when the court, after hearing merely the junior counsel for the party, refuse the reclaiming note. Parties are very apt to think that their case has not been fully stated; and such a result is not at all in accordance with the communication by the court in 1826, which is to this effect, that the junior counsel was only to state the facts and explain their bearing on the pleas in law, but that the discussion of the law and the application of the law to the pleas raised by the parties were to be left entirely in the hands of the senior counsel.

14,134. Dr. Barclay.—How if the senior counsel is not there?—That is a different thing. You must take the counsel that is there.

14,135. Mr. Gordon.—Could that be well carried out unless you made the arrangement that the two counsel for the reclaimer should be heard?—The consequence would be, that we must adopt the practice that prevails in the House of Lords in appeals; and I am now speaking entirely of the appellate jurisdiction of the Inner House. George Monro.

14,136. That would involve two speeches for the reclaimer, two speeches for the respondent, and a fifth speech in reply for the reclaimer?—Yes. I don't know that that would be found much longer; but at any rate it would enable the court, I think, more satisfactorily, where they thought that the proper course, to refuse the reclaiming note on the statement of the reclaimer, without calling upon counsel on the other side.—By the Act of last session, the prayer of reclaiming notes was abolished. I think it was quite right to take away the stringency attached to the prayer, but it strikes me that there should be some mode of the party indicating what he wants. I think that would be fair to the court and to the other party, because, although in some cases it is obvious that the party wants the judgment against himself to be altered, there are many reclaiming notes where he wants it altered in part, or to a certain effect. I think it would be well that the court knew what he wanted before they proceed to look into the case at home. Some judges like to read the case at home, but it is very unsatisfactory to read a whole case, and then it turns out that it is a mere minor matter upon which the alteration is wanted. The reclaiming note comes a good deal into the same predicament as an appeal in the Sheriff Court, which is in a few words: 'I appeal against the above interlocutor.' I have felt the same inconvenience there; I did not know what the party wanted. At all events, it should be made not informal that the party should have some mode of explaining what he wants.

14,137. Dr. Barclay.—Do you think it would be objectionable, under the Act, in an appeal from the Sheriff Court, to say, 'I appeal against the above interlocutor, so far as it finds me not entitled to expenses?'—The Act gives a certain form of words, as if they were verba solennia.

14,138. Was that not to do away with a long advocation?—Probably it was, and I don't know that there would be any objection to that; but I believe, in consequence of the way in which the Act is worded, it is very seldom that anything else is said. I think it should be made clear, that the party may state what he wants; and if in the course of a discussion on the reclaiming note new points are started, that may give rise to questions of expenses.

14,139. The Chairman.—Your view is, that if the party does not mean to reclaim against the whole interlocutor, he should give an indication of what part it is that he does reclaim against?—Just so. Then with reference to appeals to the House of Lords, I think the time within which such appeals are competent should be very much limited. I think too long a time is now allowed for appealing. Probably six months would be sufficient—six months from the date of the judgment, without regard to whether Parliament is sitting or no.

14,140. Dr. Barclay.—Would that not be rather severe in the case of a party who was abroad in Australia?—One may say the same thing in regard to the reclaiming note in the Court of Session. Whether a party is in the country or not, it must be lodged within twenty-one days, or within a shorter period in certain cases. I don't press six months, but I think the time should be considerably limited within what it is at present. The present term was adopted under a very different state of circumstances from that which now exists.—These are all the matters in the paper which I have to mention.

14,141. The Chairman.—Have you considered whether it would or would not be expedient to distribute among the Lords Ordinary indiscriminately all kinds of business, without limiting certain classes of cases to individual Lords Ordinary? For example, teinds are now assigned to one Lord Ordinary, and the Bill Chamber work to the junior Lord Ordinary. Have you considered whether it would be desirable to allow these cases to go to any Lord Ordinary that the parties might prefer?—I have considered it, but I have not heard much complaint as to the present system. My own impression is, that the matter is better as it stands.

George Monro.

14,142. Mr. Gordon.—Do you think that the giving to the pursuer the choice of his judge is a good rule, or ought it to be altered?—The rule that prevailed when I came to the bar was altered, I think, very much for the worse; and that rule, again, has been modified by the power of distribution given to the head of the court. I think that power of distribution was a great improvement. There used to be a Lord Ordinary for the week; and if you enrolled your case for that week, it went to that Lord Ordinary and to a particular Division; but if you did not like that Lord Ordinary and that Division, you had to wait for the Lord Ordinary you wanted. You could not wait beyond a certain time, because the other party could put up protestation against you. I would be very sorry to deprive the public altogether of the power of selecting their judge, because I believe there are some judges, such as the late Lord Curriehill, who have special qualifications for particular branches of law and practice, as he had in feudal cases.

14,143. Dr. Barclay.—But the selection is always on one side. The defender has no power of selection?—That cannot be helped.

14,144. The Chairman.—The pursuer selects not only his own judge, but his opponent's judge?—That is true; but still I think, in the general case, the pursuer believes that he is wronged, and therefore selects a judge in bona fide.

14,145. And he also looks for expedition?—Yes.

14,146. But you think that the power of distribution has remedied the evils that existed from the crowding of the rolls of one judge, while another had not enough of cases to occupy him?—A good deal.

14,147. Dr. Barclay.—Have you heard it proposed that the Bill Chamber should cease as an independent branch, and that applications of the character now made in the Bill Chamber should be made to any Lord Ordinary, the clerk of each acting in these cases?—I have heard that proposed, but it is rather a recent idea.

14,148. Lord Barcaple.—You have had a good deal of experience in Bill Chamber causes?—Yes.

14,149. Have you found that department of the work of the Court of Session to be at any disadvantage in regard to the office of the clerks, or the mode in which it is dealt with?—No, I am not aware of that.

14,150. The Chairman.—Has anything occurred to you as to criminal procedure in the public court?—No. I am not aware that there is anything requiring a remedy at present.

14,151. Mr. Campbell.—It has been suggested that the Sheriff should have the power of sentencing to penal servitude in cases in which there are repeated convictions: have you considered that?—Yes; and I am against extending the power of the Sheriffs to pronouncing sentences of penal servitude. I think it stands very well as it is.

14,152. The Chairman.—Do you see any objection to the Sheriff having the power of disposing of questions of robbery, when such cases were remitted to him by the Lord Advocate, that being an indication that penal servitude was an excessive punishment for such a case?—It is sometimes doubtful whether an offence is theft or robbery; and I have seen that question very nicely raised,—a man snatching a watch from another's pocket,—whether he jostled him in doing it.

14,153. Do you think it would be safe to give the Sheriff the power of going on with the case, although it should so turn out?—I think it would be quite safe, because it is subject to the control of the Lord Advocate and his deputes.

14,154. Mr. Paterson.—With reference to the constitution of the Supreme Court, I should like to have your opinion as to some theories which have been put forward. Allowing for all the improvements of the recent Act, it is said in some quarters that the efficiency of the court in regard to economy and despatch might even yet be increased. What is your view with reference to that?—I think the Act of last year did a great deal to accomplish that.

14,155. But there are people who still maintain that it might be more improved in matters of economy and despatch?—I am not aware of any improvement that could be made. If any particular suggestion were made, I could state my opinion on it.

14,156. Do you think it would be practicable or necessary that the sittings of the judges should be further prolonged than they are under the recent Act?—I have some idea of the fatigue incurred by the judges from long sittings, and it strikes me that they are quite sufficiently long already. My impression is, that the judges of the Court of Session are the hardest worked elderly gentlemen in the country.

14,157. You think it would hardly be fair to the judges, looking to the extent and importance of their duties, to lay a greater burden upon them?—I think not. I indicated already that it might be necessary to increase their number.

14,158. Would it be possible so to organize the court, with the present number of judges, or if required, by enlarging their numbers, so as to give continuous sittings of a Division over the twelve months?—I don't see that that is necessary. Wherever there is any wrong requiring a sudden remedy, it is given in the Bill Chamber.

14,159. Have you heard it complained by parties or agents that the remedy got in the Bill Chamber, especially in the long vacation, is generally of an interim character; and that after a suspension or interdict gets to a certain stage, it stops until the court resumes?—I have not seen any practical evil from that, and I think by the late Act the Bill Chamber has the power of ordering things to be done; it is not confined to mere prohibitions or interdicts.

14,160. Mr. Gordon.—The process of going through the rolls of court has also been abolished?—Yes. I should think it would be very difficult to produce many instances of any grievance of the kind referred to.

14,161. Mr. Paterson.—Supposing an interdict refused in the Bill Chamber, and you have to wait for perhaps three months till the court meets, in order to present a reclaiming note, may the party not be aggrieved by that delay?—I think, wherever there is an appearance of serious question, the Lord Ordinary either grants the interdict, or only refuses it upon some condition which effectually protects the complainer against damage. It will be found that that is more a speculative complaint than a real one.

14,162. Supposing it is either granted or refused, may it not be a hardship on one of the parties to have to wait two or three months?—Sometimes it is granted on condition of finding caution for wrongous interdicting.

14,163. Mr. Harrison.—I suppose you mean us to understand that the popular belief that there is unnecessary delay and expense in the procedure of the Supreme Court applies rather to the past than to the present working of the court?—I think there was a good deal more made of it than was just, even under the former state of things, because, whenever there was what is called a summary case, it was always heard with despatch. At the same time I think the arrears of cases in the long rolls of the Inner House, and even of debates before some of the Lords Ordinary, were too great to be satisfactory; but there has been a very great clearance of these rolls since the late Act, and I have every hope that the Act will be effectual in preventing any such arrears for the future.

14,164. Mr. Gordon.—Even before the Act passed, I believe there was a reduction of the arrears, through the anxious desire of the judges to get rid of these arrears?—Yes; they were gradually being reduced by the power given to the court of prolonging the sittings.

14,165. Lord Barcaple.—Which has been regularly exercised by the Inner House for a considerable period?—Yes. I think the Act of last session a very excellent one, and I have hopes that it will prevent the recurrence of these and many other evils.

14,166. The Lord Justice-General.—Has not the amount of arrears in particular rolls been also very much diminished by the power of distributing the business under the Act of 1856?—No doubt of it; very greatly.

14,167. Dr. Barclay.—Might there not be a division of counsel between the Outer House and the Inner House, and perhaps a subdivision of them between the First and Second Divisions, so that parties might always be secure of having their counsel present? I suppose you are aware that many fees are paid, and all the benefit got for them is having counsel's name printed on the paper?—I have often thought of making such a division.

14,168. Is it not done in England? Do not counsel attach themselves to particular courts there?—Not by law. They choose to do so. I have often thought it would be an advisable thing, for it is very unsatisfactory for the parties to have counsel employed, and not to have the benefit of their assistance at the debate.

14,169. And equally unsatisfactory to the court to have only the junior counsel present, when the Act of Sederunt says that the senior shall expound the law of the case?—I should think that must be unsatisfactory to the court.

14,170. The Chairman.—Do you think that the business of one Division would be such as to attract to it any considerable number of counsel of standing, or would it help to raise the standard of the bar to make such a subdivision?—Perhaps the result would not be different from what it is at present in regard to that,—that a few men might have all the business almost in one Division, and a few all the business of the other Division. At the same time it might be dangerous to make such a division by law. If the bar itself were to think seriously of it and do it, I don't know that it would be to the detriment of the public.

14,171. In that case, do you think there would be introduced the system which prevails in another place, that when a particular counsel was taken from his own Division to the other, he must get a special retainer,—a large fee of 50 or a 100 guineas?—I have heard that that prevails in England, though I don't know to what extent; but it certainly might lead to that evil.

ADAM GIFFORD, Esq., examined.

14,172. The Chairman.—You are a practising member of the Scotch bar?—Yes.

14,173. How long have you been so?—For twenty years, within a few months, and during the last half of that period I have had pretty full experience, chiefly in the civil practice of the Court of Session, although not exclusively.

14,174. You have had occasion to consider the efficiency of the system on which the business of the court is carried on?—I have; and in general I may say that so far as the constitution and arrangement of the court is concerned, I do not for my own part desire any sweeping or radical alteration.

14,175. You do not desire any organic change?—No. I think that, as a whole, and if well wrought, the arrangement of the court in regard to the Outer House, with the general system of review by the Inner House, is a beneficial and expedient arrangement.

14,176. Does it occur to you that any improvement could be made upon the procedure by the distribution of business or otherwise?—I cannot say that there should be any serious or fundamental change in that respect. It has been suggested that the Bill Chamber as a separate institution might perhaps be beneficially merged in the general machinery of the court,—that an application for interdict might be presented to any of the Lords Ordinary in the same way as any ordinary application, subject to the same final review on the merits, and subject to instant review so far as possession is concerned. That, however, is rather a matter of detail than of fundamental change in the business. I don't think there is any call for a permanent Third Division.

Adam Gifford.

14,177. Lord Barcaple.—Before you go to that, you say that a change in the Bill Chamber has been suggested. Do we understand that you concur in thinking it a desirable change?—In some respects I think it might be desirable.

14,178. Would you state the ground on which you would expect advantage to result from it?—I do not think that there is any great advantage in having what may be called the summary jurisdiction of the court confined to one judge. The jurisdiction of all the judges in the Outer House, considering them as primary judges, may be fairly put on the same footing; and it does not occur to me that there are advantages to counterbalance the separate machinery which the Bill Chamber involves.

14,179. Including the office of the Bill Chamber as a separate establishment?—Including the office of the Bill Chamber as a separate establishment.

14,180. Mr. Gordon.—Is there not an advantage in having one judge on whose presence in Edinburgh you can rely, instead of leaving it uncertain whether a judge can be got?—I understand that there would always be a judge on whose presence you could rely, for I would not abolish the existing practice of there being a constant permanent single judge, at all events, sitting during vacation.

14,181. The Chairman.—But the question alluded more to having a particular chamber open, with a clerk in attendance on it, where all people could go for Bill Chamber work, whoever might be the judge?—But that advantage does not seem to me to be any greater than would exist when all the other offices are open so many hours a day, and when, apart from office hours, a party may seek out the clerk or the judge.

14,182. Dr. Barclay.—You would require to put up a caveat in all the offices?—Yes; and that is an objection, no doubt.

14,183. Mr. Adam.—Have you felt any practical grievance from the present system?—I don't think we have; it is a little more expensive, probably.

14,184. Mr. Campbell.—A very little ingenuity would devise a particular locality where all caveats might be intimated?—Yes.

14,185. Lord Barcaple.—Would it be easy in that case for five clerks to get notice of the caveat?—It might enter the rolls of court in some way.

14,186. The Lord Justice-General.—It could only be published in the rolls of court once in twenty-four hours?—It would.

14,187. Would that be enough?—It might not. That is a practical difficulty.

14,188. The Bill Chamber judge at present is accessible for twenty-four hours a day. Is it desirable to subject all the Outer House judges to the same infliction?—I don't know that the Bill Chamber judge is more tied than any of the other judges. However, I don't attach much importance to that.

14,189. The Chairman.—Does it appear to you that the Act of last session has tended much to acceleration and economy?—I think it has, so far as it has gone. In part I think it is yet on its trial, but in many respects it has undoubtedly tended to acceleration in the decision of causes; and in reference to the making up of records, and in various other particulars, I think it is working very well.

14,190. Have you any suggestion to make in the way of accelerating and economizing causes?—I approve entirely of the general principle of records as they are at present made up, consisting of a simple statement in untechnical language of the facts which each party alleges, and a note of pleas in law deduced therefrom. I think that is a very philosophical as well as convenient arrangement.

14,191. Lord Barcaple.—There is another element in the present record—an answer by the defender to the pursuer's statement?—I don't attach so much importance to that as to the untechnical statement by each party of his case, and the deduction of his legal rights therefrom.

Adam Gifford.

14,192. Then you do not, I presume, attach any importance to the absence of an answer by the pursuer to the defender's statement?—Practically I do not.

14,193. Mr. Gordon.—But do these answers produce any evil?—I don't know that they do, excepting delay.

14,194. But I mean answers to the pursuer's statement?—The present form is an answer to the pursuer's statement, and a separate statement if required. Lord Barcaple's question referred rather to the duply.

14,195. Lord Barcaple.—What I meant is this: At present we have an answer by the defender to every article of the pursuer's statement; we have not, unless there be a revisal, an answer by the pursuer to the articles of the defender's statement. Now the answers may be important or not important; but I presume, if they are important on the one side, they will be important on the other; and I wanted your opinion—and I understand I have got it—that you think they are really of comparatively little importance on either side?—I attach so little importance to it, that I think it not worth while to order a revisal for the purpose of getting them. Of course an admission cannot be implied where there has been no opportunity of answering.

14,196. The only use of an answer would be ——?—To narrow to some extent the subsequent inquiry.

14,197. In practice you think that is not material?—I think not. I was going to add that I think the present form of the record an advantage on account of its popular form. In a legal question, I think it is of some importance that the dispute in the pleadings should not be wrapped up in technical language, but should be such as can be understood by unprofessional persons; and that is an advantage so great, that I would be prepared to sacrifice the precision which might arise from a technical rule of pleading, rather than lose that popularization of the statement.

14,198. Do you attach importance to the pleas in law?—I think pleas in law are important, not by any means as narrowing the questions, but as indicating the points to which the parties think their case comes.

14,199. Then I suppose you would wish to maintain the pleas in law, but on the footing that additions to them should be very readily allowed?—Very easily allowed. And in reference to the new Act, which allows additions and alterations to a very large extent, I think that is a very great improvement on the old system.

14,200. Is there not often an error in practice in the counsel stating a great accumulation of pleas?—Perhaps there may; and I am not quite sure but that error, as well as the error of a great detail of facts, has arisen from the old rule that everything should be stated on record, and from a terror—perhaps an unfounded terror, but still a terror, that practically operated in lengthening the pleadings—that perhaps they might omit something, and a desire to put it in all shapes, so that they might have everything on record. As the operation of the new Act extends, I should expect that evil of the unnecessary length of the pleas would be obviated.

14,201. Mr. Gordon.—Have pleas in law not a beneficial effect on the mind of the party preparing them?—I think they have.

14,202. By directing his attention to the points that will fall to be argued, and thereby leading him to make the statement more concise and relevant?—I think so. In short, it is an anticipation of the pleading which he must come to, sooner or later.

14,203. And the adding of the pleas in law costs nothing additional?—Nothing.

14,204. The Lord Justice-General.—That depends, I should apprehend, on whether you would diminish the fees for preparing the condescendence, if there were no pleas in law?—Probably it does; but I should not contemplate any such diminution.

14,205. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose an important plea in law is omitted?—Then under the existing Act, of which I entirely approve, it might be supplied; and if expense has been occasioned by its omission, an award of expenses is the remedy. The working of the existing Act might be extended, perhaps. The court is appointed to do substantial justice between the parties, admitting every real question that arises; but there are restraints as to the amount concluded for. I would even take away these. If you have the parties before you, and it comes out in the course of the investigation that a particular right arises, I would not even fetter the court by the limit of the conclusions of the action.

14,206. The Lord Justice-General.—You would not extend the conclusions of the action except of consent, would you?—I think so. If it appears, when the real dispute is disclosed, that justice cannot be done without a supplementary summons, I would dispense with the necessity for that.

14,207. Lord Barcaple.—There is another purpose for which a supplementary summons is at present frequently used—viz. calling new parties. Should a similar facility be given there?—I think there might be; a new party might be called by an order of court; but I have not considered the details of how that might be applied. I think it might be done without the formality of a new summons.

14,208. The Lord Justice-General.—In approving of the use of popular and not technical language in statements of fact, do you extend it to the framing of pleas in law?—No; I think the pleas in law are contrasted with the statements, and there the technical rule of law ought to be expressed in technical language.

14,209. You would rather encourage the use of technical language in pleas?—Certainly; because there it is the precise canon of law that is to be applied that should be announced.

14,210. Mr. Shand.—If that can be expressed in plain language, should it not be so?—Perhaps so; but in law, as in other sciences, technical language will be more precise than ordinary language.

14,211. The Lord Justice-General.—Don't you find that some of the most superfluous and utterly useless pleas in law which appear on record are those expressed in popular language?—Very often.

14,212. The Chairman.—You said you thought the recent Act, so far as it goes, is working beneficially. Have you any suggestion to make as to any parts of it that don't work beneficially?—The appointment of a Third Division for the despatch of business was found to be very inconvenient.

14,213. You mean the occasional Court of Lords Ordinary?—Yes, the occasional abstraction of the Lords Ordinary from the Outer House. That was very inconvenient; and if hereafter it should be found necessary, from the accumulation of business, that an occasional Third Division should be appointed, I think it would be better, even at the expense of weakening the Inner House, that a judge should be taken from each Division, and one from the Outer House, instead of taking four of the Lords Ordinary from their work.

14,214. If that could not be done, you think that the sittings of the Lords Ordinary should not be of the length to which they were extended last session?—I hope it will not be necessary to have recourse to that arrangement again.

14,215. If it were not necessary that they should sit above a few days, the inconvenience would be comparatively small?—It would. The next point in regard to the working of the new Act, besides the records—which I have no more to add about—is the procedure thereafter. There has been a little practical inconvenience felt in the course of the procedure which takes place when parties close the record, and do not renounce probation. The case then, according to the existing Act, goes to the summary debate roll, and parties have to lodge issues. Practically, that has created considerable obstruction in the Outer House; but I should expect that the inconvenience of it would diminish as the working of the Act goes on, and that the summary debate roll will not be such an obstruction to the ordinary debate roll as it has hitherto proved.

14,216. Lord Barcaple.—Has it not rather swallowed up the ordinary debate roll?—Perhaps it has; but the ordinary debate roll of some of the Lords Ordinary was in abeyance for a considerable period. I should expect the present inconvenience to diminish gradually, and I don't disapprove of the plan of the Act.

14,217. Mr. Gordon.—Was the choking up of the ordinary debate roll caused by the Lords Ordinary Court?—To some extent it was.

14,218. Mr. Shand.—You approve of that as the stage at which parties should endeavour by admissions, if they can, to bring out the points of law in controversy between them?—I think so.

14,219. And you think that should be the stage for doing so, rather than in the earlier stage of the pleadings?—I think that is the proper stage for the adjusting of issues or renouncing probation.

14,220. Lord Barcaple.—Have you seen the procedure in that roll to have any effect in procuring or encouraging admissions?—I don't know that it has.

14,221. Has there more or less ultimate controversy about point of fact arisen?—The practical working of that roll is, that when parties come up to debate in the summary debate roll, they have issues in. That is one of the prerequisites. Issues ought to be in by that time: if probation is not renounced, issues must be prepared. That narrows the case in the view of the parties; and they ought to be then ready for either taking an issue or order for proof, or a judgment upon the law; and I think, that practically, if the Act gets fair play in working,—and all Acts must get fair play in working, as one of the conditions of their success,—that will be found to be the working of the summary debate roll, which will be found to be beneficial.

14,222. Mr. Gordon.—The object is to make the debate available either for the adjustment of issues if further proof is required, or for the determination of the case if no further proof is required?—Yes.

14,223. It brings the parties to issue on point of fact?—The summary debate roll ought always to issue in one of three things,—an issue adjusted, an order for proof before the Lord Ordinary, or a judgment, if it be found that what the case requires is a judgment in point of law.

14,224. Lord Barcaple.—Do you mean necessarily a final judgment?—Not necessarily so; a judgment to some extent disposing of the merits of the cause.

14,225. But a judgment which may possibly be the precursor of proof or further procedure in various ways?—It might lead to that. For example, a plea of prescription would or might be disposed of in the summary debate roll.

14,226. Are there not a large portion of the causes in the summary debate roll which result in a debate which may not dispose of the cause, but which is nevertheless a long and anxious debate, necessarily involving careful consideration of the cause by the judge at home?—No doubt; but I am endeavouring to classify the results to which that debate would come.

14,227. But I wanted to see whether that case fell under your last remark?—Yes, I think so.

14,228. There is a misapprehension about that; and, do as we will, there are a great number of causes requiring law to be settled at that stage, and that cannot be settled summarily?—That is the third class to which I was bringing the actions—namely, issues, order for proof, or judgment on some point of law.

14,229. The Chairman.—You don't mean a judgment pronounced on the spot?—Not necessarily; but judgment as the result of the debate.

14,230. The judge might make avizandum?—Yes.

14,231. Mr. Shand.—And that might dispose of the case, or of some point of law preliminary to the merits?—Yes. Proof is perhaps the next point, when dispute arises in point of fact, and I think that is one of the matters on which perhaps the new Act is on its trial as yet. I cannot say that the new mode of taking proofs before the Lord Ordinary with a shorthand writer has been sufficiently tried, to enable me to say either that it has failed or that it has succeeded. It has been found to be very expensive in many cases; and when review comes to be asked, the print is generally long, and the cost considerable. I fear that that cannot be avoided, and that, large as the expense is, it would be less than a jury trial. I think that a jury trial, besides the other objections to it, would not be cheaper than the mode adopted under the present Act, of taking the evidence by a shorthand writer before the Lord Ordinary. Then I think I may say, speaking not as a litigant, but as a counsel, that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is always more satisfactory than the verdict of the jury. I think most of us feel that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary upon evidence led before himself, is more satisfactory than the verdict of a jury would be upon the same point.

14,232. The Lord Justice-General.—In regard to the matter of expense, have you ever compared the expense of two similar causes,—one tried before the Lord Ordinary without a jury, and then carried to review in the Inner House, and another tried before a jury, and coming to end with the verdict?—I cannot say that I ever have, in figures; I only speak generally. It is not my part of the profession to see the accounts of the expenses, and I can only speak very generally; but I have heard complaints from agents as to the expense of proofs, from the detail and the printing which they involve. But no doubt, if there was to be the same inquiry before a jury, there would be the same expense, and a less satisfactory result. As to the machinery for taking the proof, a shorthand writer is of recent introduction, and it is certainly a great saving of judicial time. It involves a little reading when the proof comes to be printed; but it saves time when the proof is taken, and, upon the whole, it is the quickest mode of taking the proof. It does occur to me that as the shorthand writer is now a part of the court, there should be an approval of him by the court as the shorthand writer. No abuse that I know of has yet been found, but I can easily see that if the parties are to have the appointment of the shorthand writer, and not the judge, there may possibly be abuses; and I wish to forestall the possibility of that by recognising a body of gentlemen as shorthand writers, and admitting them as such on proof of their qualifications, or otherwise.

14,233. The Lord Justice-General.—Are you quite confident in your opinion that the taking of the evidence by a shorthand writer, instead of the judge making a note of it, saves much judicial time?—I think it does, upon the whole.

14,234. I suppose you don't think the difference is very great?—Not very great.

14,235. It depends a good deal upon the rapidity of the judge's writing?—It does; and upon the style of notes which a judge takes. One judge will take much more full notes than another; but in the case of a judge who takes short notes, that is almost always objected to by one or other of the parties. All complaint of that kind is obviated when the witness's whole words are taken down.

14,236. Lord Barcaple.—Do you say that the judge's notes are objected to?—They may be objected to.

14,237. According to your experience, have you found, when causes have come up after a jury trial on a bill of exceptions, or a motion for a new trial, that on either side the counsel for the parties felt any serious grievance of that kind?—I have not practically heard of it.

14,238. In taking the evidence by a shorthand writer, you think that there is greater rapidity in the writing of it?—Yes; I think so, on the whole.

14,239. On the other hand, is there not a difficulty, costing time, when the judge wishes to refer to some particular point in the evidence already taken, which he cannot easily do in the shorthand writer's notes?—I don't think there is practically very much difficulty there, because the shorthand writer can easily refer back to his notes.

14,240. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you contemplate in what you have been saying, that the shorthand writer is to take down the evidence in the narrative form, and not question and answer?—I understand that the shorthand writer at present takes the words down question and answer, but in extending them he puts it into the form of a narrative.

Adam Gifford.

14,241. Do you expect that all shorthand writers who may be employed, if this system is extended, would be sufficiently skilled to be trusted with that manipulation?—Subject to the check of the judge or of the parties, I think they might.

14,242. What check?—In my practice I have often seen the shorthand writer called, in the case of an examination, to take the evidence question and answer, and the judge has the same check.

14,243. Mr. Gordon.—If the shorthand writer takes it down question and answer, and it is thought that he has committed any error in extending it, he can refer back to his notes?—Yes.

14,244. Lord Barcaple.—At what stage is that to happen?—The notes are written out afterwards and certified by the judge, who, I suppose, reads them or glances over them. That is the stage at which it might be done.

14,245. The proof comes to the judge, consisting very often of several hundred pages, and under the Act of Parliament he reads it over; but do you think he is likely to discover any error in it?—I rather pointed to the check arising at the time the evidence is given.

14,246. Does it occur to you, who have been present at many of these proofs, that it is possible for the judge, in any honest sense of the word, to certify the correctness of the notes?—I think a perusal of them by the judge may entitle him to say that it is a fair report of the evidence.

14,247. The Lord Justice-General.—What is the certificate that the judge gives?—'I certify that this is a true report.'

14,248. If he certifies the report of the evidence as correct, that ought to be the result of a comparison of the report with his own recollection of the depositions of the witnesses?—I suppose so.

14,249. Do you think that in practice it is possible for a judge conscientiously to grant such a certificate?—I scarcely think it. He can have nothing more than the most general recollection of the evidence.

14,250. Lord Barcaple.—You are aware that the shorthand writer is sworn for the particular service?—Yes.

14,251. Mr. Adam.—Supposing there is an error made in the taking down of the notes after they have been certified by the judge, there is at present no means of getting it put right?—I am not aware that there is, further than by the judge getting the shorthand writer to read the notes, coupled with his own recollection of what the witness said.

14,252. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you think the judges generally have so much reliance on their own memory, that they would set it up in competition with what was taken down at the time by a skilful shorthand writer?—I can understand cases where they might do so: for example, where a witness deponed negative, and a shorthand writer omitted the 'not.'

14,253. Only in such cases?—Only.

14,254. Lord Barcaple.—Suppose the judge sends for the shorthand writer, and the shorthand writer tells him he is quite sure that the 'not' was not said, how would you settle it?—If I were the judge, and had a distinct recollection of the negative being given by the witness, I would trust my memory.

14,255. Has the judge any authority to alter the shorthand writer's notes?—I have great doubts about that. But these difficulties to some extent arise in whatever form the evidence is taken. The same mistake may occur in the longhand notes of the judge.

14,256. Dr. Barclay.—Have the agents no opportunity of looking at the notes before they go to the judge?—No; the notes are extended by the shorthand writer, and transmitted to the judge without being communicated to the parties.

14,257. Mr. Shand.—Having seen a great many proofs, I suppose you can say that, practically, none of the inconveniences which have been suggested have been felt?—Not to any sensible degree.

14,258. The proof is furnished by the shorthand writer in the narrative form, except in its very important passages, or at the critical point of the case, or where the shorthand writer is specially requested to give it question and answer?—Yes; and we have been very fortunate with our shorthand writers hitherto.

14,259. Mr. Paterson.—Have you ever known any question to arise as to inaccuracies in the proofs?—I have not known any case in my own experience, but I have heard of a case in which there was a very important statement said to have been erroneously taken down.

14,260. And what was the result?—I believe it is still open at this moment.

14,261. Lord Barcaple.—Formerly evidence was taken in the Court of Session, either in the form of jury trial, or of commission. Now it is taken either by jury trial, or by a proof before the Lord Ordinary. Does it appear to you that at present we have a larger amount of evidence taken, and evidence taken in a greater proportion of cases, than we used to have formerly?—I rather think we have.

14,262. Can you explain that?—I think there are more proofs taken now than formerly, but I don't know what the exact explanation of that may be. One explanation arises from this, that parties are asked to renounce probation, and there is always a shrinking from that, in case there be some point not admitted, which may afterwards turn out to be important. When there is an enforcement of the rule to renounce probation, there will be a good many proofs led unnecessarily, because parties will lead them, as a precautionary measure, in case there be any fact which may ultimately turn out to be important: that may have had a tendency to increase the number of proofs. Another thing which may account in some degree for it, is the desire which has prevailed lately to have the facts ascertained before dealing finally with the law,—to have the whole cause before the court, and not what may in some aspects be called a tentative judgment on points of law, which may be superseded on the facts being ascertained.

14,263. I think there were some observations made at one period in the House of Lords, which were supposed to have led the court to be cautious about not exhausting inquiry into the facts?—Yes, and that may have tended in that direction; but perhaps we are now going to the opposite extreme.

14,264. The Outer House were more apt to go wrong in that way, and to decide the case without exhausting the facts?—Perhaps so; I can hardly say that. Sometimes an Outer House judge, pressed by the parties that to decide a certain point of law would settle the case, was good-natured enough to do it; but in the Inner House the judges were not so pliant.

14,265. And the result was, that a proof was allowed before answer?—Yes; it is proofs before answer that have increased.

14,266. Have there not been very many instances in which, however accurate and artistic a mode that may be for dealing with a case, it arrived at the same result, which was the obvious result upon the case as it stood before the proof?—Sometimes; I have not the least doubt of that. Sometimes the proof before answer was found not materially to have shifted the case.

14,267. Is not the taking of evidence always a very expensive portion of a litigation?—It is.

14,268. In whatever mode it is taken?—Yes.

14,269. It is impossible to take it cheaply in any way at present recognised by the law of Scotland?—It is.

14,270. It is also, I suppose, a very remunerative branch of litigation to the persons employed in it, in all branches of the profession?—I suppose it is.

14,271. Possibly it does not make so much difference in the remuneration of counsel?—I don't think it does make very much difference.

14,272. But, one way or another, the preparation for these cases is very remunerative to the other branch of the profession?—I should think so; but I have not the means of knowing that.

14,273. Have you ever thought whether there is any way in which the necessity for proof, assuming that it must be taken, could be mitigated? Have you considered the working of the English system of affidavits?—I have not. My own impression is, that the system of taking proofs is in general a better system than the system of affidavits.

14,274. If you want to test very absolutely the truth of the matter. But may there not be very many cases in which the one party would be satisfied of what is the obvious result of an investigation, upon seeing the affidavits of his opponent?—I can quite conceive that there may be a great many cases of that kind.

14,275. Does it not frequently happen that, upon the eve of a jury trial, or sometimes at the very commencement of a jury trial, the parties arrange their dispute?—A compromise before a jury trial has not been an unusual occurrence.

14,276. Does it occur to you that that has been brought about in many cases by the parties having by precognition ascertained truly what the case which they can present is?—I could not say that. I think it has arisen very much from the uncertainty of the result of the pending trial, both parties being afraid to some extent of the tribunal. I don't say that is always so, but very frequently it has not arisen so much from one of the parties being satisfied upon precognition that they were in the wrong, as from both parties feeling that there was a great risk, and that they had better settle.

14,277. They may not feel satisfied that they are in the wrong, and yet they may be advised that on the face of their precognitions they have not got a strong case. Do you think they are as likely to get that advice before the precognitions are fully taken and laid before counsel?—It would be better, if in every case the full precognition could be got at the beginning of a case, but you cannot have that; and I should say, the compromises before a jury trial generally arise from the uncertainty of the tribunal. I believe that even the party who is advised that he has a strong case to go to a jury with, will yet make a considerable sacrifice to get a settlement without going to a jury; and therefore the compromises of such cases are perhaps compromises in which the weak party has got a better settlement than he would otherwise have got, just by pressing the other party to the eve of a jury trial.

14,278. The Lord Justice-General.—In proofs, according to your experience, are there a good many facts established by the evidence, about which there is no very serious dispute between the parties?—Very often; and that lengthens the proof a good deal.

14,279. And cumbers the proof with matter about which the parties are not thereafter to have any controversy?—Yes.

14,280. Don't you think that if the pursuer, at the stage at which the cause comes into the summary debate roll, we shall say, lodged affidavits in process, demonstrating to his opponent that he is in a condition to prove all these facts, it would cheapen very much the proof afterwards, and in some cases perhaps even prevent the necessity for a proof at all, particularly if the facts which he so proves are facts that cannot be within his opponent's knowledge, but are within his own?—It might have a tendency to do that. I scarcely understand your Lordship's question, however. Does it point to a voluntary act?

14,281. Yes; affidavits taken before a magistrate?—At the choice of the party?

14,282. Yes; either the party himself, or his witnesses; but with liberty afterwards to the opposite party, if he thinks it right, to ask for a cross-examination of the witness in court, in presence of the judge?—Does your Lordship point to that as a separate proceeding from the ultimate proof that is to be allowed?

14,283. It may or may not, according to what is most convenient in the conduct of the cause. If there is to be a proof, or a trial afterwards, probably that would be the best time at which to cross-examine the witness who has already deponed on affidavit. If a proof is not necessary, then there would be a separate proceeding before the judge?—If I understand your Lordship's question, it points to a mixed system in which affidavits might be tendered, though they could not be called for or compelled.

14,284. Yes?—I think that might lead to settlement in some cases; but only in those cases where the parties were thoroughly reasonable and willing to meet each other; and in such cases probably that machinery might not be necessary.

14,285. But the case to which I wanted to ask your attention, is a case in which there may be a serious controversy about some matter of fact, but a non-admission of a great many other facts, without any very serious controversy about them. Don't you think that the lodging affidavits in the way I have suggested would tend, in such a case, very much to limit the extent of the proof?—It might, certainly.

14,286. And to a great extent also to diminish the expense of it?—It might. But that might also be accomplished by the party calling for an admission of a fact within his own knowledge, and to which he would be quite ready to make affidavit. That would be practically the same thing.

14,287. The Chairman.—An affidavit emitted under the knowledge that the party may be called into court and cross-examined upon it, would probably have greater weight than the course you suggest?—Probably it might.

14,288. Lord Barcaple.—Are there not a great many proofs, a large portion of which consists in each party vouching his facts, as it were, by producing the evidence for them, the opposite party having no evidence to produce on the subject?—There are a good many such cases.

14,289. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think it would save expense in many cases where the witnesses are at a great distance, if the Lord Ordinary, after seeing the nature of the case, and hearing the parties in the debate roll, had power to allow a proof by affidavit, subject to cross-examination, so that each party would put in affidavits so as to form the proof?—I have not considered the subject of affidavits sufficiently to give a precise answer to that question.

14,290. Lord Barcaple.—Does it strike you that there would be any bad result from either party being entitled to apply to the Lord Ordinary to have the opposite party appointed to answer certain interrogatories upon oath?—I think that might be a very expedient power. A power of that kind used to be inherent in courts. The oath of calumny originally was part of that system of testing the party.

14,291. Dr. Barclay.—But that was a general oath?—Yes.

14,292. The Chairman.—A judicial examination?—Yes; which used to be more common than it is now. I think a power of that kind might be very beneficial and very useful.

14,293. Mr. Shand.—You had a great deal of experience in proofs by commission?—I cannot say that I had.

14,294. Have you any hesitation in saying that the present system is much better than that?—It is much better; and, dear as it is, it is cheaper than the interminable proofs before Commissioners, which went on, a witness and a half at a time, and then an adjournment.

14,295. Dr. Barclay.—And numerous objections?—Constant objections.

14,296. The Chairman.—I think you have indicated that you think there is an indisposition to jury trial?—I have felt that in my own experience. I think that nowadays really important patrimonial cases very seldom go to a jury, if both parties seriously wish to try them. We find them better tried before the judges, with the review of the Inner House if necessary, than by taking the chance of a jury trial. Hence jury trials are practically confined to cases of slander, and one or two other categories of cases.

14,297. Actions of damages?—Yes.

14,298. Does it appear to you that the number of jury trials in the court, including those before Lords Ordinary, has, upon the whole, increased lately?—I can only speak for the last ten years. I rather think that the jury trials have increased during the last ten years.

Adam Gifford.

14,299. Lord Barcaple.—They have been diminished since the last Act?—Yes; but in the last ten years I think they have rather increased.

14,300. The Chairman.—You think that more cases on the whole have gone to proof than used to do so?—A great many more.

14,301. And chiefly before the Lords Ordinary?—Yes.

14,302. If there have been more investigations of fact before juries, and more investigations of fact otherwise, does it appear to you that the number of causes has increased much, or is it that a larger proportion of them are questions of fact?—A larger number of them have involved an inquiry into fact—that is to say, have landed in a proof or in a jury trial—than formerly. I don't think there has been an increase in the number of causes; but that is matter of statistics.

14,303. But how did they get over the difficulties in fact formerly?—I was referring to that point in answer to a question by Lord Barcaple. The law was more readily reached.

14,304. In disregard of fact?—Not in disregard of fact, but without finding the necessity for full investigation into all the disputed facts.

14,305. Lord Barcaple.—The judges held, I suppose, that they had facts enough?—Yes.

14,306. The Lord Justice-General.—You are not partial to jury trial?—I am not.

14,307. Can you tell me, according to your experience, what is the percentage of bad verdicts?—I don't think it is very large.

14,308. How much would you suppose it to be?—I should say five out of every six, or six out of every seven, verdicts are undoubtedly right.

14,309. You think that one in seven is bad?—That is the merest guess.

14,310. Have you ever considered what is the percentage of bad judgments by a judge, especially upon questions of fact?—I don't perhaps exercise the same freedom of review as to these that I do in reference to the verdicts of juries.

14,311. But suppose you were to form your opinion, and deduce your percentage from the ultimate result of cases upon review, either in the Inner House or in the House of Lords, what would you say as to the percentage of bad judgments by Lords Ordinary on questions of fact?—I would say it is much less than that of juries. I think juries are much more apt to go wrong; but I confess my judgment on that point is hardly a judgment of figures; it rather goes on the à priori likelihood of the tribunal.

14,312. You think it is more likely, but you are not prepared to give an opinion on the matter of fact, as falling within your own experience?—I scarcely am.

14,313. Mr. Campbell.—You have had large experience in regard to Sheriff Court processes?—I have not very large experience in that respect. I have not more than a dozen appeals in the year.

14,314. But as a counsel?—Oh yes.

14,315. A large number of the cases there are substantially questions of fact, such as would be disposed of by a jury if they occurred in the Court of Session. What is your experience as to the judgment in the first instance by the judge there, with reference to the review both of the Sheriff, and when it has come to the Court of Session?—I think it is very generally correct in point of fact.

14,316. They rarely err, although they are the humblest members of the judicial body?—Very rarely.

14,317. Mr. Shand.—Are there not many cases in which you are of opinion that jury trial is the best mode of trial?—Except in cases of damages for slander, and cases of that kind, I would almost say that there is no other case for which jury trial is the best tribunal.

14,318. The Lord Justice-General.—Even mercantile contracts?—I find that juries are not good judges of mercantile contracts. Two days before the present session commenced we had a question of contract as to esparto: the question was, what was the contract, and it turned on a correspondence extending over sixty pages of print; we had to construe that correspondence, and we had to read it to the jury; the judge had it, but the jury were not allowed to look at it: and yet the question was the true mercantile meaning of that correspondence. That is the last jury trial I was in, and I felt the extreme unfitness of the jury as a tribunal for the disposal of it.

14,319. The Lord Justice-General.—Probably that was a case not very well adapted for trial by jury; and if the parties had been well advised, they would have taken the proof in some other way. Is that not so?—Well, it came naturally enough to trial by jury.

14,320. A case where the evidence is entirely, or almost entirely, documentary, as that was, is not well suited for a jury?—The contract was documentary, but there was a question of the fulfilment of the contract, and of the quality of the esparto. The true dispute on the documents was, whether it was a sale by a particular sample cargo, or a sale of a good quality generally; and one question which arose was the sufficiency of the esparto supplied.

14,321. But you said the real question of the difficulty was the construction of the correspondence?—Yes.

14,322. Was not that a case very ill adapted to jury trial?—Certainly.

14,323. And it ought not, in your opinion, to have been sent to a jury?—The pursuer demanding it, I am not sure that it could have been resisted.

14,324. The court has the power?—But there is an unwillingness sometimes.

14,325. Mr. Shand.—Are you satisfied that it should remain as at present, the court determining in each case what is the best mode of inquiring into the disputed facts?—I can see no better plan.

14,326. Mr. Paterson.—Of the cases set down to be tried by jury, I understand that there is a proportion that never go to trial?—About one half disappear at the date of trial.

14,327. By way of compromise?—Or arrangement, or a reference.

14,328. Can you tell us, from your observation, what you consider that owing to?—I have already said it is the distrust of the parties in the tribunal. That is the chief reason.

14,329. Mr. Adam.—Cases are not compromised in the same way on the eve of a proof before the Lord Ordinary?—They are not; nor on reclaiming note to the Inner House.

14,330. Lord Barcaple.—Have there not been a large number of cases set down for proof compromised?—There may have been; but in my own practice I am not aware that there have been so many settlements of cases on the eve of a proof as on the eve of a jury trial.

14,331. Mr. Paterson.—The cases I refer to are cases where all the expenses of preparing for trial have been incurred, and they are within a few days of being tried. Have you known such cases taken out of the Jury Court?—Very frequently.

14,332. Even after the expenses for the trial have been incurred?—After much of them has been incurred.

14,333. And that you attribute to uncertainty as to the result?—A distrust of the tribunal is one of the reasons.

14,334. The Chairman.—Accountings occupy a great deal of time, and cost a great deal of money?—They do.

14,335. Could you make any suggestion as to economizing time and money in regard to them?—I think that is another of the points on which the late Act is on its trial. There are provisions in that Act for calling on the accountant to sit beside the judge, and arrangements of that kind, which have not yet been fairly tried, but which I think are calculated to diminish expense in complicated accountings, as far as that can be done. I would be disposed to allow the Act a fair trial in these respects.

14,336. We have been told that the system, which used to exist to a large extent, of alternative tables annexed to the states as an appendix, and very long prefaces, extending sometimes to twenty or forty printed pages, are very much abridged?—Yes; we have had very short reports recently from many accountants, and that is always desirable. The details of the figures don't require in general to enter the formal report of the accountant.

14,337. It has been suggested that it might be expedient to have one or two official persons connected with the court,—salaried officers, to whom remits in cases of accounting should be made?—I have not considered that suggestion, and I am not prepared to say whether it is a good one. To some extent it might be; but I rather incline to think that the existing practice—there being a professional body of accountants to whom the court can always have recourse—is sufficient.

14,338. Accountants charge by time, and there is no check on it?—That is a practical difficulty which has long been felt with reference to accountants' fees. An accountant's fee is necessarily a very arbitrary thing.

14,339. Mr. Paterson.—And very large?—Yes.

14,340. Lord Barcaple.—Does it not happen that an accountant's work, in an accounting, involves a great deal of matter of importance to the parties, or one or other of them, independent of their merely obtaining a judgment in the cause?—Sometimes that is so; and in such a case as that it would be an abuse to get the services of a judicial officer.

14,341. The Chairman.—Have you anything to suggest with reference to multiplepoindings, beyond what the late Act provides?—I think not. The facilities given by the late Act as to joint cases are applicable to all cases, and have been found to work very beneficially. We have been able to make a joint case in a multiplepoinding in which there were fifty or sixty claimants, and get the principles announced; and then we go back to the Lord Ordinary, and decrees are given. We never would have been able to do that without a formal multiplepoinding; but the parties being brought into court by that action, saw that the whole questions depended on the construction of certain deeds, which were then settled by a joint case. I refer to the 'Rosetta' case, Young v Young, in the First Division.

14,342. The Lord Justice-General.—But in that case there must have been considerable expense incurred in the preparation of the record?—There was a mistake committed in regard to that. The record should not have been closed; but it was very difficult to prevent claims coming in in the ordinary course, and as there was hardly any revisal, the record was just the claims which had been lodged. It was a very long record, but that was unavoidable from the number of claimants.

14,343. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make as to the order of hearing causes in the Inner House?—The only suggestion I have to make on that point has been already practically given effect to—namely, that the hearing should, as far as possible, be continuous; that when a case is called in the summar roll or the short roll, the hearing of it should be continued till its close, and not interrupted by any other case. But really that is now practically enforced; and we do not now find the inconvenience, which was at one time felt, of having each day a summar roll which went far on into the day, and a short roll case lasting an hour or two a day for a week.

14,344. The Lord Justice-General.—Any interruption to the hearing of causes arises generally from the engagement of counsel elsewhere?—Generally; and it is reduced almost to a minimum.

14,345. You cannot suggest any remedy for that?—That is very difficult. The remedy for that is with the agents and litigants, not with the court probably.

14,346. Mr. Campbell.—We have been informed here that of late there have occurred instances where leading counsel at the bar have declined to accept a position on the bench of the Supreme Court. Do you attribute that to any particular cause?—There are two causes probably: one cause is that the party who has made the declinature has preferred the prospect of public life, which the elevation to the bench would deprive him of. The other cause is—and it is quite right that it should be mentioned—that the emoluments of the bench are not equal to the emoluments which some of the leading members of the bar enjoy; and if it is for me to give an opinion, I should certainly say that there is room for a strong appeal that the salaries of the judges should be somewhat enlarged.

14,347. As a member of the bar, are you decidedly of opinion that the prospects of the bench are deteriorated by the smallness of the remuneration of the judges?—The salaries of the judges being what they are, is one of the circumstances which will always operate, as long as they remain so, to lead men, who would otherwise accept that honour, to decline it.

14,348. And in the interest of the public service, you think a change should be made in that respect?—I think, in fairness to the judges, the salaries should be somewhat raised. I understand that in England and Ireland the salaries are considerably larger, and I don't think there is any good reason for judicial salaries being smaller in Scotland than in other parts of the kingdom.

14,349. Mr. Paterson.—Do you consider that the court, on which great improvements have been made by the recent Act, is capable of being still further improved in regard to economy and despatch?—It is difficult to say that any limit has been attained,—everything is capable of improvement; but I have already said I would make no sweeping fundamental or radical change. The changes called for are changes in the direction of those which have been already enunciated, and intended to give them fair play.

14,350. With reference to a theory which we sometimes hear stated, do you consider that the sittings of the court could be further prolonged than they are at present?—I think they are long enough. The business will be accomplished during these sittings, I think; and if the avocations of judges and counsel, and the necessary work done in vacation be taken into account, it will be found that there is a very fair year's work done by our judges.

14,351. Measuring the year's work according to its present extent, do you think there would be continuous employment for the court, were it to sit every working day of the year?—In that case there could be no circuit, and all the Bill Chamber work done in vacation would be part of the general work. You might get more done in vacation, but I doubt if it would be better done.

14,352. The Lord Justice-General.—Are you aware of any human constitution that could stand that?—No.

14,353. Mr. Paterson.—I assume that you had an organization of the court which would admit of its sitting every working day, either by re-distributing the judges, or by adding to their number. If that were so, would there be an amount of business to keep the court at work every working day of the year?—If you mean that the existing 13 judges should sit six days a week for 52 weeks a year, I think it would be unjust to the judges, and it is unnecessary for the business of the country. It is unnecessary for the business that 13 judges of the Court of Session should sit six days of the week all the year through.

14,354. There would be no utility in that as compared with the present system?—None.

14,355. You are also satisfied that an organization of that kind would be very unfair towards the individual judges?—I think it would.

14,356. Mr. Gordon.—And pretty severe to gentlemen practising at the bar?—Yes.

14,357. Mr. Paterson.—In regard to the expense of litigation in the Supreme Court, have you considered how that expense might be lessened?—I don't think that the expense of litigation will ever be made what law reformers say is small. I think, as long as there are important interests at stake, parties will, by buying the best talent both behind the bar and at it, make litigation a matter of more or less expense. It is impossible to carry on litigation without expense.

Adam Gifford.

14,358. Then you don't think the expense could be lessened?—I don't think it could be very materially lessened.

14,359. We have heard it said that there should be a scale of fees for counsel, compiled partly on the ad valorem principle, and partly with reference to the time occupied. Do you think that practicable?—I don't think so.

14,360. Mr. Adam.—Do you approve of the recent change in the constitution of the High Court of Justiciary by which one judge is a quorum?—I have not been in the High Court of Justiciary since the change took place; but I think the ordinary business may be transacted quite safely by one judge.

14,361. Then a single judge, without review, may be called on to decide an important point of law?—He may. In difficult cases there would probably be more than one.

14,362. A difficult point may arise in the course of a trial, and he may have to decide it at once?—I have not considered that.

14,363. The Chairman.—That was always the case on circuit?—Yes.

14,364. Mr. Adam.—But they could certify at circuit?—Yes.

14,365. Mr. Murray.—Have you considered whether there is not a class of cases before the court, in which it would be desirable that the court should have the power of compulsory arbitration?—I have not considered that. It is a very common thing in England. It is rather against our principles to compel arbitration, and I have not thought whether a compulsory power of that kind might be beneficially introduced. If it is a matter of practical skill, a remit to an arbiter is a kind of arbitration on that point; and beyond that, I don't think there is any call for change.

14,366. Are there not cases where the trial in the ordinary way would cause an expenditure of time and money disproportioned to the case, and which might be more conveniently settled by arbitration?—I don't think so.

14,367. The Lord Justice-General.—Is arbitration a rapid and economical way of conducting cases?—I have not found it so.

14,368. Mr. Murray.—I mean judicial arbitration?—Any kind of arbitration. It is just another law plea; and if it is a question of skill, a remit is the proper thing.

14,369. The Lord Justice-General.—And it is another law plea before a court that has no power to enforce its own order, and therefore the delay may be infinite?—Yes.

LETTER, Francis Russell, Esq., Sheriff-substitute, Jedburgh, to the Right Hon. Lord Colonsay, Chairman of the Law Courts Commission.

Jedburgh, June 30, 1869.

My Lord,—My attention having been called, at a late meeting of the Justices of the Peace of the county of Roxburgh, to certain passages in my evidence before the Law Courts Commissioners, which may convey an impression not altogether correct, and somewhat beyond my meaning, I have to ask the leave of the Commissioners to lay before them a more particular, and I believe a more accurate statement as to these matters.

The first relates to the amount of the fees paid to the Clerk of the Peace, and will be found at the foot of the second column of page 58 of the First Report. I am satisfied, by inquiries which I have made, that I had misunderstood my informant (who had paid the fees), and that the sums I have there named as the amount of the clerk's fees, sometimes paid in respect of the cases tried at one sitting of the court, ought to have been stated as the amount sometimes paid in respect of the cases tried at two sittings. I furnished to the Commissioners a copy of the table of fees now in force. Since my attention was specially called to the matter, I have seen a statement prepared by the Clerk of the Peace, and returns prepared by direction of the Commissioners, of the fees received by the clerks in each district of the county. These returns show that in a few instances the fees paid in respect of the cases tried at one sitting of the court reach the amount which my evidence, as now corrected, would indicate. But on this point I would simply refer the Commissioners to the returns now before them. I may be allowed to add, that in mentioning the matter to the Commissioners, I had no intention of expressing any opinion to the effect that the emoluments of the Clerk of the Peace ought to be diminished, but desired to call their attention to the costs chargeable against persons convicted of statutory offences, and to the considerable element in these costs, which consisted of the clerk's fees; my opinion being that the clerk ought to be paid not by fees, but by salary, and that the costs exigible from persons convicted of such offences (if the exaction of them be at all retained) ought to be materially reduced. In the Sheriff Court, I found the costs in prosecutions for offences under the Tweed Acts very frequently to amount to more than £2 in each case, and thus to exceed the maximum statutory penalty for the offence charged.

The other statement in my evidence which I desire to qualify, relates to the practice observed as regards the notice given to Justices when Courts of Petty Sessions are to be held, and will be found at the foot of the first column of page 59 of the Report.

In making that statement, I had especially in view the practice in the district of Jedburgh, which had come under my own observation. With respect to the other districts of the county, I am satisfied, by inquiries I have made, that in all cases each of the resident and acting Justices receives a notice of every diet fixed for the holding of a court in the district; so that to the practice in these districts my criticism is clearly inapplicable, and I regret that the language I used should have in any quarter caused a different impression.

As regards the district of Jedburgh, the statement of the Clerk of the Peace on this point is as follows:—'In the district of Jedburgh the same practice is followed' [that is, the practice of convening the Justices to courts by written circulars], 'except in cases of apprehension, which are disposed of at once (Jedburgh being the residence of the Procurator-fiscal, who holds that appointment for all the districts of the county), and when there is only one complaint to be disposed of; and in these cases only a few of the nearest Justices are asked to attend.' Accepting this statement as substantially correct, I am still of opinion that the practice which I had in view is, even to the limited extent to which it is admitted to prevail, objectionable; and I have reason to believe that the attention which has been directed to it in consequence of my evidence, will lead to its discontinuance.

I have only to add, that in speaking of 'poaching cases' I referred especially to cases of river poaching; which, from the complexity and stringency of the provisions of the Tweed Acts, and from other considerations, appear to me cases peculiarly requiring calm, judicial investigation, and careful sifting of evidence, and therefore to be among the very last of the classes of cases which may be safely dealt with by a court, the constitution of which is not entirely satisfactory.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's obedient servant,

Francis Russell.

To Lord Colonsay, etc., etc.

REPORT

OF THE

ROYAL COMMISSIONERS

FOR INQUIRING INTO THE

LAWS OF NATURALIZATION AND ALLEGIANCE:

TOGETHER WITH AN APPENDIX

CONTAINING

An Account of British and Foreign Laws, and of the Diplomatic Correspondence which has passed on the subject, Reports from Foreign States, and other Papers.

Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of Her Majesty.

LONDON:
PRINTED BY GEORGE EDWARD EYRE AND WILLIAM SPOTTISWOODE,
PRINTERS TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.
FOR HER MAJESTY'S STATIONERY OFFICE.

1869.

CONTENTS.

	Page
COMMISSION	iii
REPORT	vi
APPENDIX	1
I. Memorandum by Mr. Abbott:
1. British and Colonial Laws	5
2. Laws of the United States	16
3. Laws of other Countries	19
4. Correspondence between Great Britain and the United States	29
5. Correspondence between the United States and other Countries	52
6. Correspondence between Great Britain and other Countries	60
Addenda :—
(A.) Attorney-General Cushing's Opinion on Expatriation	78
(B.) United States Naturalization Act, Oaths, and Certificate	85
(C.) Sir W. Scott's Judgment in the Case of the "Ann"	86
(D.) Judgment of Wissembourg Court in Zeiter's Case (French Conscription)	87
(E.) Attorney-General Bates' Opinion on Citizenship	87
(F.) Chief Baron Piggott's Ruling in Warren's Case (mixed Jury)	90
(G.) Memorandum on Prussian Laws	91
(H.) Report by Counsel to Vienna Embassy on Austrian Laws	92
(I.) British Naturalization Acts, 1844, 1847 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 83). Form of Certificates, Regulations respecting the Issue of Certificates	93
(K.) Foreign Office Circulars respecting the Grant of Passports and Protection to Naturalized British Subjects	96
(L.) Mr. Vernon Harcourt on British Nationality	97
(M.) Report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives	98
(N.) Nationality Statutes: 25 Edward III. stat. 2; 7 Anne, c. 5; 10 Anne, c. 5; 4 Geo. II. c. 21; 13 Geo. III. c. 21	107
Alphabetical Index	109
II. Disabilities of Aliens — Reports from Foreign States.—Austria. Baden. Bavaria. Belgium. Denmark. France. Greece. Hanse Towns. Italy. Netherlands. Portugal. Prussia. Russia. Saxony. Sweden. Switzerland. United States. Wurtemberg	113
III. Right of Aliens to hold Lands. Colonial and Indian Laws. Memorandum by Mr. Abbott	137
IV. Position of Aliens and Naturalized Aliens in England. Case of Mr. Brandauer. Letter from Professor Leone Levi	139
V. Nationality of Children born of Alien Parents. Reports from Foreign States.— Austria. Baden. Bavaria. Belgium. Denmark. France. Greece. Hanse Towns. Hesse Darmstadt. Italy. Netherlands. Portugal. Prussia. Russia. Saxony. Spain. Sweden. Switzerland. United States. Wurtemberg	141
VI. Naturalization Treaties between the United States and other Powers	149
VII. Statistics. British Subjects abroad. Aliens in England. Number and Nationality of Aliens Naturalized, 1845–1868	152
Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages at Embassies, Legations, and Consulates	155

COMMISSION.

Victoria, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith.

To Our right trusty and well-beloved Cousin and Councillor George William Frederick Earl of Clarendon, Knight of our Most Noble Order of the Garter, and Knight Grand Cross of our Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor Edward Cardwell, Our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor Sir Robert Joseph Phillimore, Knight, Doctor of Civil Law, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, Our trusty and well-beloved Sir George William Wilshere Bramwell, Knight, one of the Barons of Our Court of Exchequer, Our trusty and well-beloved Sir John Burgess Karslake, Knight, Our Attorney-General, Our trusty and well-beloved Sir Travers Twiss, Knight, Doctor of Civil Law, Our Advocate-General, Our trusty and well-beloved Sir Roundell Palmer, Knight, Our trusty and well-beloved William Edward Forster, Esquire, Our trusty and well-beloved William George Granville Venables Vernon Harcourt, Esquire, one of Our Council learned in the Law, and Our trusty and well-beloved Mountague Bernard, Esquire, greeting.

Whereas We have deemed it expedient that a Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and consider the Legal Condition of our Natural-born Subjects who may depart from and reside beyond the Realm in Foreign Countries, and to report how, and in what manner, having regard to the Laws and Practice of other States, it may be expedient to alter and amend the Laws relating to such Natural-born Subjects, their Wives, Children, Descendants, or Relatives.

And, also, to inquire into and consider the Legal Condition of Persons, being aliens, entering into or residing within the Realm, and becoming Naturalized as Subjects of the Crown, and to report how far, and in what manner it may be expedient, having regard to the Laws and Practice of this Country, of Foreign States, or otherwise, to alter or amend the Laws relating to such Persons, or Persons claiming rights or privileges through or under them.

Now know ye, that We, reposing great trust and confidence in your knowledge and ability, have authorized and appointed, and do by these presents authorize and appoint you the said George William Frederick Earl of Clarendon, Edward Cardwell, Sir Robert Joseph Phillimore, Sir George William Wilshere Bramwell, Sir John Burgess Karslake, Sir Travers Twiss, Sir Roundell Palmer, William Edward Forster, William George Granville Venables Vernon Harcourt, and Mountague Bernard, to be Our Commissioners for the purposes aforesaid.

And for the better effecting the purposes of this Our Commission, We do by these presents give and grant unto you, or any five or more of you, full power and authority to call before you such persons as you shall judge likely to afford you any information upon the subject of this Our Commission, and also to call for, have access to, and examine all such books, documents, registers, and records, as may afford the fullest information on the subject, and to inquire of and concerning the premises by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever.

And We do by these presents will and ordain that this Our Commission shall continue in full force and virtue, and that you Our said Commissioners, or any five or more of you, may from time to time proceed in the execution thereof, and of every matter and thing therein contained, although the same be not continued from time to time by adjournment.

And We further ordain that you, or any five or more of you, may have liberty to report your proceedings under this Commission from time to time, if you shall judge it expedient so to do.

And Our further will and pleasure is that you do with as little delay as possible, report to Us, under your hands and seals, or under the hands and seals of any five or more of you, your opinion upon the several points herein submitted to your consideration.

And for your assistance in the due execution of this Our Commission, We have made choice of our trusty and well-beloved Charles Stuart Aubrey Abbott, Esquire, to be Secretary to this Our Commission, and to attend you, whose services and assistance We require you to use from time to time as occasion may require.

Given at Our Court at St. James's, the Twenty-first Day of May 1868, in the Thirty-first year of Our Reign.

By Her Majesty's command.

GATHORNE HARDY.

REPORT.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

We, Your Majesty's Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Laws of Naturalization and Allegiance, have to state that, in compliance with the terms of Your Majesty's Commission, we have inquired into the legal condition of natural-born British subjects who may depart from and reside beyond the realm in foreign countries, and have considered how and in what manner, having regard to the laws and practice of other States, it may be expedient to alter and amend the laws relating to such natural-born subjects, their wives, children, descendants, or relatives. We have also inquired into the legal condition of persons, being aliens, entering into or residing within the realm and becoming naturalized as subjects of the Crown, and have considered how far and in what manner it may be expedient, having regard to the laws and practice of this country, of Foreign States, or otherwise, to alter or amend the laws relating to such persons, or persons claiming rights or privileges through or under them.

We have found it necessary, in order to deal satisfactorily with the matters referred to us, to enter into some others bearing closely on them but not embraced within the express terms of Your Majesty's Commission; and on these latter, as well as on the former, we have thought it right to submit to Your Majesty the conclusions to which we have been led.

We now humbly lay before Your Majesty the following Report.

I.

There are two classes of persons who by our law are deemed to be natural-born British subjects:—

1. Those who are such from the fact of their having been born within the dominion of the British Crown;
2. Those who, though born out of the dominion of the British Crown, are by various general Acts of Parliament declared to be natural-born British subjects.

The allegiance of a natural-born British subject is regarded by the Common Law as indelible.

We are of opinion that this doctrine of the Common Law is neither reasonable nor convenient. It is at variance with those principles on which the rights and duties of a subject should be deemed to rest; it conflicts with that freedom of action which is now recognized as most conducive to the general good as well as to individual happiness and prosperity; and it is especially inconsistent with the practice of a State which allows to its subjects absolute freedom of emigration. It is inexpedient that British law should maintain in theory, or should by foreign nations be supposed to maintain in practice, any obligations which it cannot enforce and ought not to enforce if it could; and it is unfit that a country should remain subject to claims for protection on the part of persons who, so far as in them lies, have severed their connexion with it.

We accordingly submit to Your Majesty the following Recommendations for an amendment of the law in this respect.

1. Any British subject, who, being resident in a foreign country, shall be naturalized therein and shall undertake, according to its laws, the duty of allegiance to the Foreign State as a subject or citizen thereof, should, upon such naturalization, cease to be a British subject.

2. The principle of this rule should be applied to a woman who, being a British subject shall become by marriage with an alien the subject or citizen of a Foreign State.

3. The wife of a British subject who shall become naturalized abroad, and his children if under the age of 21 years at the date of his naturalization, should likewise cease to be British subjects from that date; but this rule should not include a wife or child who has not emigrated to the country of naturalization, nor should it operate unless, according to the local law, the naturalization of the husband or father has naturalized also the wife or child.

4. Naturalization in a foreign country, though operating from the time of its completion as an extinguishment of the original citizenship, should not carry with it discharge from responsibility for acts done before the new allegiance was acquired.

Provision should be made for applying the same principles to the case of British subjects who have become so by naturalization.

We have considered the question whether the acquisition of a foreign domicil, or a certain length of residence abroad, should divest a person of British nationality. We have not been able to satisfy ourselves that either continued residence or domicil could be practically adopted as a rule to determine the allegiance of the subject, having regard to the difficulties which attend the definition of domicil and proof of the fact, and also to the great diversity of circumstances under which men reside in foreign countries.

II.

It is expedient that the foregoing Recommendations should be applied to British subjects already naturalized in foreign countries, as well as to those who may hereafter become so. A certain period, however, not less than two years, should be allowed, within which any person already so naturalized (that is, before the proposed alteration of the law is made) might declare his desire to remain a British subject. The mode in which this should be done might be settled reciprocally by Treaty or otherwise with such foreign Governments as were willing to permit it to operate as an extinguishment of the acquired allegiance. In the absence of such an agreement, the naturalized person might make a formal Declaration of such his desire, if resident abroad, before a British Minister or Consul, or, if within Your Majesty's dominions, before a Justice of Peace, such Declaration to be registered or recorded in such manner as might be judged expedient, in the United Kingdom by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in a Colony by the Governor or other chief officer of the Government. Any person thus electing within the prescribed period to remain a British subject should be deemed to retain his British nationality, and the benefit of this election should extend to his wife, and to his children if under age at the time; but the election should not (unless permitted by the State of his naturalization to extinguish his acquired allegiance) entitle him or them to claim any British privileges when within the territories of that State.

These provisions should be deemed to apply to women already naturalized abroad by marriage with an alien or by the foreign naturalization of their husbands, and to children already naturalized abroad by the foreign naturalization of their fathers. Such women, becoming or having become widows, and such children, attaining or having attained the age of 21 years, should be enabled to retain their British nationality by exercising a like option at any time before the expiration of the period to be limited as aforesaid.

Persons already naturalized abroad who might not exercise this option within the prescribed period would be able at any time afterwards to regain British nationality in the mode pointed out in a subsequent part of this Report.

III.

The above Recommendations, if carried into effect, would impose the condition of aliens upon many persons who have hitherto enjoyed the legal rights proper to British subjects. It was necessary, therefore, to consider what effect the deprivation of such rights would have upon those affected by the change. And here it was impossible to overlook the serious question raised by the existence of those disabilities which (subject to certain limitations) attach by law to aliens in respect to the holding and inheritance of real estate in the United Kingdom.

Those disabilities have hitherto only affected persons who had never been regarded by the law as natural-born British subjects, such persons alone coming within the legal definition of aliens. But when it is proposed to bring within the same category a new class of persons who, having been originally British subjects, are for the future to lose that character, different considerations arise. To deprive persons, already naturalized abroad, who now enjoy the right of holding and inheriting lands, of that right, might be thought harsh if not unjust. In the case of those who may become so naturalized hereafter, the same objection would not arise; but even here the penalty of exclusion from possible rights of inheritance appears to be an impolitic restriction on the liberty of emigration.

We have to choose, then, between two courses; one is, to maintain the existing disabilities, making special provision for the new class of cases to which our Recommendations would give rise; the other, to abrogate the disabilities altogether in respect of all classes of aliens.

The first course, viz., that of making special provision for expatriated British subjects who will now become aliens, whilst it would break in upon the general principle, might in practice be productive of embarrassment and litigation. We have accordingly considered the other course. The question whether aliens ought any longer to be prohibited by our law from holding landed property within the realm has not, indeed, been expressly referred to us by the terms of Your Majesty's Commission; but we have found it impossible to deal with the position of those who, under the terms of our previous Recommendations, will cease to be British subjects, without forming an opinion as to the position of aliens generally in this respect.

We think it right to point out that not only can aliens hold real estate in France and many other European countries, but they are also enabled by Colonial enactments to hold real estate in the Dominion of Canada (except New Brunswick), British Columbia, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Queensland, Victoria, South Australia, St. Kitts, and Hong Kong, while the regulations prohibiting aliens from possessing real estate have recently been repealed in Bengal, and are now under revision in Madras and Bombay.

By the Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 66), "every alien now residing in, or who shall "hereafter come to reside in, any part of the United Kingdom, and being the subject "of a friendly State, may, by grant, lease, demise, assignment, bequest, representation, "or otherwise, take and hold any lands, houses, or other tenements, for the purpose "of residence or of occupation by him or her, or his or her servants, or for the purpose "of any business, trade, or manufacture, for any term of years not exceeding twenty-"one years, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, and with the same "rights, remedies, exemptions, and privileges, except the right to vote at elections for "members of Parliament, as if he were a natural-born subject of the United Kingdom."

This term of twenty-one years may, of course, be renewed.

We have arrived at the conclusion that the grounds formerly assigned for the rule are either untenable in themselves or have ceased to be applicable; and we are prepared therefore, instead of making any distinction between the two classes of aliens, to recommend that the present disabilities of alienage in respect of the holding and inheritance of land, should be abolished altogether.

It has been suggested that, in time of war, danger might occasionally arise from the possession of land by aliens. We think it sufficient to say that this is a danger against which, should it be deemed serious enough to demand special legislation, it would not be difficult to guard.

IV.

In considering whether the character of a natural-born British subject should be regarded as indelible, and, if not, how it should be lost, we have found it necessary to consider also whether any changes should be made in the laws which determine what classes of persons should be deemed to possess that character.

There are two classes with respect to whom this question may be raised. They are—

1. Persons of foreign parentage born within the dominions of the Crown;
2. Persons of British parentage born abroad.

All persons, of whatever parentage, born within the dominions and allegiance of the Crown, are by the Common Law natural-born British subjects. All persons, on the other hand, of whatever parentage, born beyond its dominions and out of its allegiance, were by the Common Law regarded as aliens.

By various Statutes it has been enacted as follows:

25 Edw. 3. stat. 2: "All children inheritors, which henceforth shall be born out of "the ligeance of the king, whose fathers and mothers at the time of their birth be and "shall be at the faith and ligeance of the king of England, shall have and enjoy the same "benefit and advantage, to have and bear inheritance within the same ligeance as the "other inheritors aforesaid in time to come: so always that the mothers of such children "passed the sea by the licence and will of their husbands."

7 Anne, c. 5: "The children of all natural-born subjects, born out of the ligeance of "Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be "natural-born subjects of this kingdom, to all intents, constructions, and purposes "whatsoever."

4 Geo. 2, c. 21: "And whereas some doubts have arisen upon the construction of the "said recited clause in the said Act of the seventh year of Her late Majesty's reign: now "for the explaining the said recited clause in the said Act, relating to children of natural-

" born subjects, and to prevent any disputes touching the true intent and meaning thereof, " be it enacted, that all children born out of the ligeance of the Crown of England or of " Great Britain, or which shall hereafter be born out of such ligeance, whose fathers " were or shall be natural-born subjects of the Crown of England, or of Great Britain, at " the time of the birth of such children respectively, shall and may be adjudged and " taken to be natural-born subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, to all intents, con- " structions, and purposes whatsoever."

13 Geo. 3. cap. 21: " All persons born, or who hereafter shall be born, out of the " ligeance of the Crown of England or of Great Britain, whose fathers were or shall be, " by virtue of a statute made in the fourth year of King George the Second, to explain " a clause in an Act made in the seventh year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Anne, " for naturalizing foreign Protestants, which relates to the natural-born subjects of the " Crown of England or of Great Britain, intitled to all the rights and privileges of " natural-born subjects of the Crown of England or of Great Britain, shall and may be " adjudged and taken to be, and are hereby declared and enacted to be, natural-born " subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, to all intents, constructions, and purposes " whatsoever, as if he and they had been and were born in this kingdom."

Without entering into any discussion on the construction of these Statutes, we think it right to state that, so far as we are aware, no attempt has ever been made on the part of the British Government, (unless in Eastern countries where special jurisdiction is conceded by Treaty), to enforce claims upon, or to assert rights in respect of, persons born abroad as against the country of their birth whilst they were resident therein, and when by its law they were invested with its nationality.

A rule corresponding to that of the English Common Law has been retained by the United States. Every person born within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States is an American citizen by American law. But it is also provided by an Act of Congress passed in 1855 that, " Persons heretofore born, or hereafter to be born, out of the limits " of the jurisdiction of the United States, whose fathers were or shall be at the time of " their birth citizens of the United States, shall be deemed and considered, and are hereby " declared to be citizens of the United States: provided, however, that the rights of " citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers never resided in the United States."

By the Code Napoléon (Art. 10), " Tout Français né d'un Français en pays étranger " est Français." As to children born in France, they were under the Code French if their fathers were French, aliens if their fathers were aliens, but with a right in the latter case to claim French citizenship on making a declaration and fixing their domicil in France. An exception has been introduced, however, by a law passed in 1851, by which, if the alien father were also born in France, the child is deemed French, but is at liberty to claim the status of an alien on attaining 21 years of age.

The Prussian law of 1842 declares that " Every legitimate child of a Prussian subject " is by birth a Prussian subject, even though born in a foreign country."

Of these two tests of nationality—the place of birth and the nationality of the father—neither is at present adopted without qualification by British, French, or American law. The laws of these countries exhibit, in fact, different combinations of the two, Great Britain and the United States laying chief stress on the place of birth, whilst in France the father's nationality determines, though not absolutely and in all cases, that of the child; and this latter theory has found acceptance among other European nations.

The rule which impresses on persons born within Your Majesty's dominions the character of British subjects is open to some theoretical and some practical objections, of the force of which we are aware. But it has, on the other hand, solid advantages. It selects as the test a fact readily proveable; and this, in questions of nationality and allegiance, is a point of material consequence. It prevents troublesome questions in cases, (numerous in some parts of the British empire,) where the father's nationality is uncertain; and it has the effect of obliterating speedily and effectually disabilities of race, the existence of which within any community is generally an evil, though to some extent a necessary evil. Lastly, we believe that of the children of foreign parents, born within the dominions of the Crown, a large majority would, if they were called upon to choose, elect British nationality. The balance of convenience, therefore, is in favour of treating them as British subjects unless they disclaim that character, rather than of treating them as aliens unless they claim it. The former course is, of the two, the less likely to inflict needless trouble and disappoint natural expectations.

We do not therefore recommend the abandonment of this rule of the common law, but we are clearly of opinion that it ought not to be, as it now is, absolute and unbending. In the case of children of foreign parentage, it should operate only where a foreign nationality has not been chosen. Where such a choice has been made, it should give way.

As to the second class,—persons of British parentage born abroad,—we think it expedient that the Statutes now in force should be repealed, in order to introduce some limitations and place the law on a clearer and more satisfactory basis. Birth abroad is often merely accidental, while of those British subjects who go to reside in foreign countries a great number certainly prize British nationality for themselves, and wish that it should be enjoyed by their children. The law, as it stands, concedes this benefit to their children born abroad; and we do not recommend that it should be withdrawn; but we think that the transmission of British nationality in families settled abroad should be limited to the first generation.

The following Recommendations embody the conclusions which we have formed on this branch of the subject:

1. As to persons born within the dominions of the Crown:

(a.) All persons born within the dominions of the Crown should be regarded by British law as British subjects by birth, except children born of alien fathers and registered as aliens.

(b.) Provision should be made for enabling children, born within the dominions of the Crown, of alien fathers, to be registered as aliens; and children so registered should be thenceforth regarded as aliens. The child, if not so registered on his birth or during his minority by his father or guardian, should be permitted to register himself as an alien at any time before he has exercised or claimed any right or privilege as a British subject.

(c.) If the father, being an alien when the child was born, becomes during the child's minority naturalized as a British subject, the child, though registered as an alien, should follow the condition of the father.

2. As to persons born out of the dominions of the Crown:

(a.) Every child born out of the dominions of the Crown whose father at the time of the birth was a British subject, should be regarded by British law as by birth a British subject, provided the father were born within the dominions of the Crown, but not otherwise.

(b.) Provided that any such person as aforesaid who according to the law of a foreign country is a subject or citizen of that country, and who has never exercised or claimed any right or privilege as a British subject, should in the administration of British criminal law be treated as a subject of the country in which he was born.

(c.) And if any such person, charged with a criminal offence for which an alien would not be liable to be tried, should successfully defend himself on the ground that he was not, in respect of the act alleged, amenable as a British subject to the criminal law of this country, he should be thenceforth to all intents and purposes an alien.

(d.) If before the child's birth the father had become naturalized in the foreign country he would, under our previous Recommendations, have ceased to be a British subject. If he should become so naturalized during the child's minority, the child born abroad should follow the condition of the father.

(e.) By the Statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 68, provision is now made for the registration at British consulates abroad of marriages of British subjects celebrated abroad; and official copies of such registers are made evidence in the courts of this country. We think that a similar system of registry, with the like legal effect, should be adopted for the purpose of procuring evidence (as far as practicable) of births and deaths of British subjects abroad, due provision being made for securing the accuracy of such registration; and we further recommend that such registries should be established in all British legations as well as consulates.

The above Recommendations, in so far as they may be inconsistent with the present law or practice of this country, are not intended to apply to children born of British fathers within the dominions of the Ottoman Porte, China, Japan, or other countries with which Great Britain may have special Treaties for exclusive jurisdiction, nor any part of Asia or Africa not the possession of some civilized State. As to such children we contemplate no alteration in the existing law.

V.

We have considered the present practice of naturalization under the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66. In dealing with this question we have desired to give effect to our opinion, that to be a British subject is a valuable privilege to be considerately imparted to those who desire its advantages, and are willing to undertake its duties. If aliens are, as we recommend, made capable of holding real estate, the considerations applicable to the question will be simplified; the inducement which now most commonly leads foreigners to apply for naturalization will be removed; the rights conferred by it will be political rights; and we think, on the one hand, that these rights should in no case be granted without the security which previous residence affords, and on the other, than when granted they should be full and complete. We recommend, therefore, that the Act should be amended so as to make a certain length of residence in the United Kingdom, or of service under the British Crown, to be proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State, a necessary condition of obtaining the privilege of naturalization; that, subject to this condition, the privilege should continue to be granted at the discretion of the Secretary of State; and that a person so naturalized should be thereupon entitled to all the rights and privileges of a natural-born British subject within the United Kingdom.

This alteration of the law, if made, will be incompatible with the continuance of the practice of issuing certificates of naturalization revocable or determinable if the naturalized person resides abroad for six months without the permission of the Secretary of State, a practice which in other respects appears to us to be open to serious objections.

VI.

We have previously stated our opinion that British-born subjects, who have already been naturalized in foreign countries, should be allowed a period of not less than two years within which to resume their original nationality.

We further recommend that provision should be made to enable British-born subjects, who may at any time have lost their British nationality, to be readmitted to the privileges of British subjects by a system similar to that by which aliens are naturalized in this country, and on the same condition of a previous term of residence. Such persons should only be readmitted to British nationality at the discretion of one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, on addressing a memorial to the Secretary of State, setting forth the grounds on which they seek readmission, and their intention thenceforth to reside and settle within the British dominions. The Secretary of State, might then, if he saw fit, and on being satisfied that the prescribed conditions were complied with, grant certificates readmitting the applicants to the rights and capacities of natural-born British subjects on their taking an oath of allegiance; but such certificates should not entitle the holders to British privileges within the country of their foreign naturalization, should they return thereto, unless according to its law they had ceased to be subjects or citizens of that country.

The wives, or children under 21 years of age, of persons so readmitted to British nationality, should also, if resident within the British dominions, be considered and taken to be British subjects from the date of that readmission, subject to the above reservation.

The same rule as to readmission should apply to women of British birth whose British nationality had been lost by marriage with an alien, on their becoming widows; but the children of such women born of an alien father should not by the readmission of the mother become naturalized as British subjects.

The foregoing provision will apply to the case of persons who shall desire to be readmitted within the United Kingdom to the privileges of British subjects.

It seems also desirable to make provision for the case of persons who, having lost their British character, may desire to be readmitted within the Colonial dominions of the Crown to the advantages of British nationality.

In the case of an alien born, naturalization in the United Kingdom under the Act of 1844 does not confer any rights of nationality within the Colonies (10 & 11 Vict. c. 83). On the other hand, Colonial naturalization confers no rights of nationality beyond the limits of the Colony granting naturalization.

The case of persons, however, who have lost their British nationality by force of such enactments as those which we recommend will stand upon a different footing. When they are readmitted to British nationality within the United Kingdom they will also recover it in the Colonies, since no Colonial law has deprived them of their nationality.

We think it advisable that the Governors or chief officers in the Colonies should have a similar power to readmit such persons to British nationality upon the same conditions as to residence and otherwise as those prescribed for readmission in the United Kingdom. Persons so readmitted will thereupon revert to their former rights, as in the case of readmission within the United Kingdom.

VII.

In the foregoing Recommendations we have endeavoured to diminish the number of cases in which one who by British law is a British subject is regarded by foreign law as a foreign subject or citizen, and to obviate, as far as possible, the difficulties and inconveniences arising from such a double allegiance. But this, we are aware, cannot be done, otherwise than imperfectly, by British legislation alone; it requires the co-operation of foreign Governments and Legislatures.

If Great Britain renounces the doctrine of indelible allegiance, and acknowledges that British subjects can divest themselves of their nationality by foreign naturalization, it may be hoped that the same principles will be recognized by other countries with respect to aliens naturalized within the British dominions; and we accordingly recommend that efforts should be made to procure that reciprocity, as well as to secure to the children of British subjects born abroad, the same power of choosing their nationality, which it is proposed to confer on the children born of alien parents within British territory.

This might be effected by agreements or conventions concluded with different States separately; or better, perhaps, by means of a general understanding arrived at, in conference or otherwise, by the Powers most interested in the subject.

VIII.

Among other matters which have been brought under our notice, we have had occasion to remark the unsatisfactory results of the operation of the law enabling aliens to claim a jury de medietate linguæ.

The mixed jury was instituted by Edward III. as an encouragement to foreign woollen merchants to resort to the English market (27 Edw. III. stat. 2. c. 3, and 28 Edw. III. c. 13).

The clauses of the Statutes enacting it were confirmed by the Act 8 Hen. VI. c. 29, and by the last Act for consolidating and amending the laws relating to jurors and juries (6 Geo. IV. c. 50).

It is settled law that those members of a mixed jury who are foreigners, need not be of the same nationality as the alien; they need not even speak the same language, but may each of them belong to a different nation and speak a different tongue.

We see no advantage in the maintenance of such a system, whilst the inconveniences which may arise from it are obvious; and we accordingly recommend that the statutes authorizing trials by mixed juries should be repealed.

We have not thought it necessary, in making these Recommendations, to enter into any general review of the subjects referred to us; as a full account of British and foreign laws, and of the diplomatic correspondence which has passed between Your Majesty's Government, the Government of the United States, and other Governments is contained in the Memorandum by our Secretary, Mr. Abbott, and other papers annexed to our Report.

CLARENDON. (L.S.)
EDWARD CARDWELL. (L.S.)
ROBERT PHILLIMORE. (L.S.)
W. E. FORSTER. (L.S.)
*G. BRAMWELL. (L.S.)
TRAVERS TWISS. (L.S.)
J. B. KARSLAKE. (L.S.)
ROUNDELL PALMER. (L.S.)
†W. VERNON HARCOURT. (L.S.)
*M. BERNARD. (L.S.)

CHARLES S. A. ABBOTT, Secretary.
February 20, 1869.

---

* We concur, except on one point, with the Recommendations of the Report. As that point is important, we think it right to express our dissent, and to state, very briefly, the reasons on which it is founded.

The Report recommends, (Section IV., Recommendations 1, a. b.) that the child born within the dominions of the British Crown of an alien father, should be regarded by British law as a British subject. This is the subsisting rule of the Common Law. A majority of the Commissioners think that it should be retained, but that provisions should be engrafted on it, which would enable such persons during minority or at any time afterwards, to assume, by simple registration, the condition of aliens. We think otherwise, for the following reasons. Such a law tends to produce, and must produce in many cases, that double allegiance which we all hold it desirable, as far as possible, to extinguish. (Report, Section VII.) It is inconsistent in principle with the recommendation that the child born abroad of a British father, should be regarded by British law as a British subject. It is at variance with the law and practice of other European states. It agrees indeed with those of the United States of America; but this very agreement, if examined, will be found to be such as to make a conflict of claims between the two countries more probable. None of the duties of a British subject could practically be enforced against a person who, though born here, had always resided in the foreign country to which his father belonged. He could not, if he happened to be here, be justly made amenable to any duties other than such as the law imposes on all commorant foreigners. But he would, nevertheless, possess the rights of a subject, without having any real title to them. He might renounce indeed, if he pleased, his British allegiance. But why should he renounce that which might be a benefit to him and could not be a burthen? If, on the other hand, he were regarded as an alien by birth, he could (provided he were resident here) obtain the advantages of British nationality by undertaking its obligations.

We do not dispute that the Common Law rule, which impresses British nationality at the moment of birth on all persons born on British soil, has arguments of some weight in its favour, nor that the substitution of a different rule would be attended by some inconveniences. But these inconveniences, which would rapidly diminish as the new rule became known and understood, do not in our judgment constitute a sufficient reason why, in deliberately revising our law on a matter which concerns foreigners as well as Englishmen, we should forego the great advantage of legislating on a consistent and generally accepted principle, and that principle one which is intrinsically reasonable and sound.

The qualification that, where the father, though an alien, was born here, the child, likewise born here, should be deemed a British subject, appears to us to limit conveniently the application of the principle, without substantially breaking in upon it. An analogous provision has been adopted in French law.

GEORGE W. W. BRAMWELL.
MOUNTAGUE BERNARD.

---

† Concurring as I do in the fundamental recommendation of the Report contained in its first section, I have thought it right to sign the Report.

I feel compelled, however, after the best consideration I have been able to give to the subject, to dissent from the scheme contained in Section IV. of the Report, for determining the nationality of children of foreign parents born within the realm.

Most persons will probably agree that the true rule for determining nationality, if it were practicable, would be found in the principle of domicil, i.e. that the home of a man's choice should also be the country of his allegiance; and indeed the Report asserts the soundness of this principle. The difficulty, however, of ascertaining the true domicil of a person resident in a foreign country, in the legal acceptation of that term, is a bar to its adoption in a case where it is requisite that the rule should be simple and obvious. Of all questions of law those which concern domicil are the most complicated and obscure, because they ultimately depend upon intention, which is necessarily of all things the most difficult to determine. We are driven, therefore, to adopt some less accurate but more practical rule, which shall approximate to though it may not reach the same result.

In the case of persons born within British territory, of British parents, the presumption of British nationality and British domicil is of course conclusive. In the case of persons of British origin who have formally accepted a foreign naturalization, the presumption of change of domicil and therefore of nationality, is sufficiently evidenced by the overt act of naturalization; and to such a condition of things the provisions of Section I. of the Report apply themselves. Here the nationality follows distinctly the domicil which is clearly ascertained.

But there exist further two classes of cases with which Section IV. of the Report deals, viz. (1) that of the children born of British parents abroad, and (2) that of children of foreigners born in the dominions of the Crown. In these cases the real domicil may be said to be indeterminate, or at least ambiguous. For the British subject resident abroad or the foreigner resident in England may in either case desire to adhere to the domicil of his origin.

Hitherto, as is well known, by the common law of England, inherited rather than adopted by the United States, the nationality of such children has been determined solely by the locality of their birth. The inconveniences of this principle, where rigorously applied, have been universally recognized. The statute law of England and America has made provision to remedy its operation in the case of the children of their own subjects born abroad. Indeed the rule is wholly indefensible in principle. By the law of all modern nations the condition of the child primarily depends on that of the father. But the doctrine of deriving nationality from the locality of birth makes it depend on the accidental situation of the mother; and by this rule a child may become a subject of a country in which his father not only never made his home, but which he never even entered.

The rule of determining nationality by locality of birth was of purely feudal origin, and accordingly in the legislation of modern Europe since the French Revolution it has been discarded as the governing principle amongst continental nations. The Code Napoléon has adopted another principle; viz. that the nationality of the child should follow the nationality of the father, in the absence of any proof of an election on the part of the child to adopt the nationality of the country of his birth. This doctrine seems sound in principle. In the absence of naturalization by the father in the country of the birth of the child, there is no ostensible evidence of the desire of the father to change his domicil or his country. The nationality of the child ought not therefore to be altered whilst that of the father remains unchanged, except by some deliberate act of the child. That this principle is also convenient in its operation is proved by the fact that almost all continental states have in practice adopted the doctrine of the Code Napoléon; and, as has been mentioned above, it has been incorporated into the statute law of England and America in the case of their own subjects born abroad. That the Commissioners do not dissent from this rule is shown by the fact that in Section IV. (§ 2) as to persons born of British fathers out of the dominions of the Crown, they recommend that the nationality of the child shall in the first instance be determined by that of the father.

But in the same section (Section IV., § 1), in the case of children of foreign parents born within the realm, the Report proposes that the old rule of the locality of birth should primâ facie prevail.

From this latter recommendation I dissent, and that for several reasons:

(1.) If it is desirable to recast the doctrine of nationality by such extensive changes as those proposed in the Report, it seems expedient to found the whole system on some intelligible and self-consistent principle. It would be difficult to suggest any reason for adopting the rule by which the nationality of the father determines that of the child in the case of the children born of British fathers abroad, which does not equally apply to the case of the children born of foreign fathers in England; and to lay down an opposite rule in the two cases seems not only indefensible in principle, but to be a course which, in respect of policy, is very likely to be misunderstood by foreign governments. If, whilst we assert that the child born of an Englishman abroad is a British subject, we also claim that the child born of a foreigner in England is likewise a British subject, it will be thought that acting for our own advantage on inconsistent principles we are grasping at the combined chances of a double event.

(2.) It seems very desirable, as is stated in Section VII. of the Report, to lay down some rule in which all or most states are likely to agree. Now the rule of determining the nationality of the child primâ facie by that of the father is adopted by all States as regards the children born of their own subjects abroad. As regards the children of foreigners born in the realm, it is adopted by all States except England and America. It is obvious, therefore, that this is the rule by the adoption of which will be most readily obtained that consent of nations which on such a subject is of capital importance. It is stated in Section VII. of the Report that "we have endeavoured to diminish the "number of cases in which one who by British law is a British subject is regarded by "foreign law as a foreign subject, and to obviate as far as possible the difficulties and "inconveniences arising from a double allegiance." In that object I entirely concur; but it seems to me that it is not accomplished but rather defeated by laying down the rule that the child born of a foreigner in England is primâ facie a British subject. In the view of every State (including the United States, so far as regards the children of born Americans in England) such person is a subject of the State of his father's origin; and therefore the proposed rule necessarily creates all the difficulties and inconveniences of a double allegiance. Assume, on the other hand, the rule, adopted by the Report in the case of the children born of British parents abroad, to be applied consistently to the case of the children born of foreign parents in England, it will be seen that the desired object will be completely accomplished. If the child B, of a foreigner A, is born in England, he would then be regarded by the English law as a foreigner; and so he would be regarded by all the world; and thus there would be no conflict of allegiance. Suppose A, the father, to become naturalized in England, then B, the child, would be by English law a British subject, and cease to be the subject of the country of his father's origin; and so he would be regarded by all the world; assuming the United States to adopt (as we have reason to believe they would adopt) the principle laid down in Section I. of the Report, viz., that foreign naturalization extinguishes the native allegiance. The same thing would occur if B were himself naturalized. And thus, by the adoption of a simple and consistent rule, we should lay the foundation of a general harmony in the doctrine and practice of nations which is not only of theoretical value, but of great practical consequence. For nothing would more solidly conduce to the peace of the world than that the same allegiance should be predicated of the same person by all governments.

(3.) I am by no means insensible of the practical conveniences which may result in some cases from the adoption of the rule of the locality of birth, which are set forth in Section IV. of the Report, but there appear to be grave disadvantages attendant on the rule which more than counteract them. Such a rule, as has been shown above, will have the effect of imposing the quality of British subjects, on a number of persons who neither seek nor desire it. It is true that the Report makes provision in the case of such persons for a machinery by which they may divest themselves of that character. Upon this it may be observed that a foreigner in transitu may, through ignorance or carelessness, omit to take measures which shall have the intended effect. But it is not necessary to urge this point, because in fact it would be as impossible in the future, as it has proved in the past, to insist against the will of the individual on his British character thus imposed by the mere accident of birth. The real evil to this country is of an exactly opposite character, viz. that by this rule persons are clothed with the character of British subjects, and become entitled to all its benefits, who have no real connexion with the community, and who ought to have no claims upon it. It is not probable that any foreigner accidentally resident in this country would disclaim the citizenship for his child which the law would confer, for the simple reason that the child would be enabled to take all the benefits, but could in no case be really made to fulfil the obligations of a British subject. Under this rule the child of a foreigner born here might return to his own country in his infancy, and he would thereafter possess whenever he chose to claim them, not only for himself, but (since he is a natural-born British subject) for his children also, all the benefits of the character of a British subject, whilst it is abundantly clear that neither he nor his children could ever be called upon to perform any of its duties. This is the practical mischief of the present rule, and to re-enact it would be to give fresh authority to a principle the inconvenience of which is sufficiently apparent. Nothing can be more politically inexpedient than that this country should be exposed to the claims of a class of persons who have no interest in its welfare, and who, neither by origin or domicil, have any community with its affairs.

On the other hand, in the case of foreigners and their children who really desire to incorporate themselves and their interests in the common stock of this country, and to embark their fortunes with ours, there seems neither hardship or inconvenience in requiring that they should evidence their intention to change their nationality and adopt a new domicil by some formal act which, whilst it would establish their British nationality, would at the same time terminate their foreign allegiance. They would then no longer be able to blow hot and cold, and adopt in turn such nationality as happened for the moment to suit their interests. If the alien father is domiciled in England, and intends to cast in his lot and that of his family with this country, why should he object to naturalize himself or his child? But if he is unwilling by such an act to sever his connexion or that of his family with the country of his origin, why should we embarrass our relations with foreign states by conferring our nationality on such a person—to his advantage it may be, but certainly not in any respect to our own?

If the father and the child are really domiciled in this country, the process of naturalization would be simple and easy, and having regard to the recommendation in Section V. of the Report it will be seen that a person so naturalized will enjoy all the advantages which belong to a natural-born subject; if they are not so domiciled I venture to think the child ought not to acquire the privilege of British nationality by the simple accident of birth. The great importance of insisting on naturalization in such cases is, that it is by this means alone that the double allegiance can be avoided. For this purpose it is essential that the act which confers the new nationality should in itself openly and unambiguously terminate the old allegiance. This, the rule which requires naturalization of a foreigner born in England as a condition of British nationality would do; whilst the rule conferring nationality by the mere fact of birth would give the new nationality without dissolving the old allegiance.

I should therefore propose that in the case of the children of foreigners born within the realm, the following rule should be adopted:

"Children born within the realm of alien fathers who have been themselves born abroad, shall be deemed aliens. But such children shall become British subjects (1) upon the naturalization of their fathers, or (2) upon their being themselves naturalized either by their fathers during their minority or by themselves at full age."

This rule would make the child born in this country, of an alien father also born in this country, a British subject by birth, and in this respect it accords with the French law. Though apparently somewhat in conflict with the general principle, it is in fact in strict conformity with the principle which makes domicil the governing rule of nationality; for though the presumption of domicil is very small from the mere fact of the place of birth of a single individual in one generation, it becomes very strong when the birth both of the father and the child takes place in the same country. Such a condition of things may be safely taken as a sufficient proof of permanent change of domicil and of the election of a new nationality, which could not be inferred from a solitary and isolated instance.

There is another point affecting the latter part of Section IV. of the Report on which I feel great difficulty. Though I concur in the principle laid down in Section IV. (§ 2 a) of the Report, by which it is declared that the children born of British fathers abroad "should be regarded by British law as British subjects," I greatly doubt the expediency of the declaration in the same section (§ 2 b), that "in the administration of British criminal law" such children are under certain conditions not to be treated as British subjects. The word "subject" in my understanding of the term involves of necessity subjection to the laws of the State of which such person is a subject, and above all subjection to its criminal law. If it is necessary (though I think that is more than doubtful) to create a class of persons who shall be capable of all the privileges whilst they are liable to none of the obligations of citizens, it would be desirable to discover for such a class some more appropriate title than that of "subjects." What is no doubt intended is that such persons should have the capacity of becoming at their election British subjects, and that till they have exercised the option to enjoy the benefits, they shall not be called upon to bear the burthens of that character, but that after they have claimed the advantages they shall not be able to decline the obligations of subjects. But surely if this be the view which it is intended to present, it should be distinctly asserted that whilst the person is not amenable to the law of England he is not yet a British subject, and that as soon as he becomes a British subject he is at once amenable to that law. I cannot therefore assent to a definition which speaks of a person as "regarded by British law as by birth a British subject" (Section IV. § 2 a), and of the same person, at the same time, under certain conditions, as a person "who in the administration of British criminal law should be treated as a subject of the country in which he was born" (Section IV. § 2 b). The question of whether a particular individual who is thus declared a British subject is or is not amenable to our criminal law is made to turn upon the point of whether he has or not "ever exercised or claimed any right or privilege as a British subject." I confess that in terms so general and vague there seems to me to lurk a dangerous ambiguity very intractable in the administration of criminal law. What are these "rights and privileges;" what is to be the extent of the "exercise" or the nature of the "claim" which by their absence or their presence are to sustain or to defeat the jurisdiction of the Crown over persons who are nominally British subjects? This distinction seems to constitute the same person a British subject by birth in the view of the English civil law, and to leave him an alien in the eye of the English criminal law. There may be persons against whom it is inexpedient that the rights of the Crown should be actually enforced in particular cases. But this is a very different thing from a formal declaration that there exist persons legally called "British subjects" who are not justiciable in the courts of the Queen.

W. VERNON HARCOURT.

APPENDIX.

No. I.—NATURALIZATION AND ALLEGIANCE.

MEMORANDUM BY MR. ABBOTT.

CONTENTS.

Part		Page
I.	British and Colonial Laws	5
II.	Laws of the United States	16
III.	Laws of other Countries	19
IV.	Correspondence between the United States and Great Britain	29
V.	Correspondence between the United States and other Countries	52
VI.	Correspondence between Great Britain and other Countries	60

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

PART I.—BRITISH AND COLONIAL LAWS.

No.			Page
1.	Definition of Allegiance. British Legislation from Edward III. to George III.		5
2.	Irish Statutes		7
3.	Naturalization by special Act of Parliament		7
4.	Denization		8
5.	Aliens Committee, 1843		8
6.	Act now in force (7 & 8 Vict. c. 66., 1844)		8
7.	Present practice respecting Denization and special Acts—Case of Mr. Bischoffsheim		8
8.	British Legislation does not require any Renunciation of Allegiance		9
9.	Restrictions placed by Home Office on Certificates of Naturalization. Certificates not granted to persons not intending to reside in the United Kingdom; case of M. Santilana. Minor children not naturalized by the father's naturalization; case of Mr. Rysell		9
10.	Colonial Naturalization—Antigua, Grenada, St. Vincent		10
	Ditto	Bahamas	10
	Ditto	Barbados, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, Grenada	10
	Ditto	Bermuda	10
	Ditto	British Columbia	10
	Ditto	British Guiana	10
	Ditto	Canada	10
	Ditto	Cape of Good Hope	11
	Ditto	Honduras	11
	Ditto	Hong Kong	11
	Ditto	Jamaica	11
	Ditto	Natal	11
	Ditto	New Brunswick	11
	Ditto	Newfoundland	12
	Ditto	New South Wales	12
	Ditto	New Zealand	12
	Ditto	Nova Scotia	12
	Ditto	Prince Edward's Island	12
	Ditto	Queensland	12
	Ditto	St. Kitt's and Anguila	12
	Ditto	Sierra Leone	12
	Ditto	South Australia	13
	Ditto	Tasmania	13
	Ditto	Trinidad	13
	Ditto	Turk's Island and Caicos Island	13
	Ditto	Victoria	13
	Ditto	Western Australia	13
11.	Regulations respecting the Issue of Passports to Aliens naturalized in the Colonies		13
12.	Naturalization in India		14
13.	Expatriation not recognized by English Law		14
14.	Blackstone on "Allegiance"		14
15.	Forfeiture of British Privileges		15
16.	Ownership of British Vessels		15
17.	Merchant Shipping Act of 1854		15
18.	Case of Æneas Macdonald-		16
19.	Case of Elijah Clark		16

PART II.—LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

20.	Naturalization provided for by the Constitution	16
21.	Acts of Congress	16
22.	Naturalization Laws now in force	16
23.	Nationality Act, 1855: Expatriation not provided for in United States' Statutes	17
24.	State Citizenship	18
25.	Statistics of Birthplaces of Aliens Resident in the United States, 1860	18

PART III. LAWS OF OTHER COUNTRIES.

26.	France—Nationality	19
27.	Ditto Loss of Civil Rights	19
28.	France—Decree of 1811—Naturalization of Frenchmen abroad	19
29.	Ditto Law of 1851—Nationality of the Sons born in Africa of Aliens themselves born in France	20
30.	Ditto Conscription of Frenchmen naturalized abroad—Count Walewski's Note to the United States Chargé d'Affaires in 1859	20
31.	Ditto Conscription—Zeiter's Case—Report by M. Treitt	21
32.	Ditto Naturalization of Aliens in France	23
33.	Ditto Ditto —Laws of 1849, 1867	23
34.	Ditto Debate on Army Bill, 1867	24
35.	Ditto Statistics—Naturalization in France, 1851–61	24
36.	Prussia—Naturalization of Aliens	25
37.	Ditto Expatriation	25
38.	Austria—Naturalization and Expatriation	25
39.	Bavaria—Wurtemburg—Netherlands	26
40.	Russia—Naturalization Law, 1864	26
41.	Hamburg—Belgium—Switzerland	27
42.	Italy—Codes of Sardinia and Two Sicilies	27
43.	Ditto Conscription Law, 1855	27
44.	Ditto Revised Italian Code, 1866	27
45.	Spain. Constitution of 1845. Decree of 1852	28

PART IV. CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

From the Declaration of Independence to the War of 1814–15.

46.	Complaint of Obstructions to Naturalization in American Provinces, 1776. Questions as to Allegiance after the Peace, 1783	29
47.	Treaty of 1794	30
48.	Impressment of Seamen—United States' Proposal, 1792	30
49.	Mr. King's Negotiations, 1796–1803	30
50.	Mr. Monroe's Negotiations, 1804–1806	31
51.	Ditto Sir W. Scott's Opinion	32
52.	Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney—Special Mission, 1806–7	32
53.	Ditto Sir J. Nicholl's Report	32
54.	Ditto "Chesapeake" Affair. Non-intercourse. Proclamation. Berlin Decree. British Orders in Council	33
55.	Ditto King's Proclamation recalling British Seamen, 1807	33
56.	Mr Jackson's Mission to the United States	34
57.	Correspondence respecting Orders in Council and "Chesapeake" case	34

War of 1812–14.

58.	War declared by the United States	34
59.	Mr. Russell's Negotiation for an Arrangement	34
60.	Prince Regent's Declaration, 1813	35
61.	Refusal to exchange British Subjects taken Prisoners in United States Service—Retaliation	35
62.	Debate in Congress, 1814	36
63.	Negotiations for the Treaty of Ghent, 1813-14	36
64.	Restoration of Hostages	38

Miscellaneous.

65.	Case of the "Ann." A British Subject can by domicil in a foreign country acquire another national character for Commercial Purposes	38
66.	Mr. Rush's Negotiations, 1818	38
67.	Lord Ashburton's Mission, 1842	39
68.	Cases in Ireland, 1848	40
69.	Ditto Lord Palmerston's Note to Mr. Bancroft	41

Civil War in the United States, 1861–65.

70.	Conscription	41
71.	Refusall of American Passports to intended Citizens	42
72.	Suspension of Habeas Corpus Act in Northern States	42

No. Page

73. Claim to British Protection of Minor Children of Naturalized Americans - - - - 42
74. Status in Confederate States of Persons naturalized in the United States - - - - 42
75. Oath of Allegiance at New Orleans - - 43
76. Conscription in Northern States—Liability of intended Citizens, Voters, and Sons of Naturalized Citizens - - - - - - 43
77. Southern Conscription—Domicil—Instructions to Her Majesty's Consuls, 1862 - - 43
78. Mr. Shaver's Case—(Domicil)—Mr. Seller's Case
79. Forced Military Labour - - - - 44
80. Status of Widows - - - - 44
81. Southern Conscription - - - - 44
82. Liability of Voters to Conscription - - 44
83. Opinion of Mr. Att.-Gen. Bates on Citizenship - 45
84. Intended Citizens included in Northern Conscription, 1863 - - - - - - 45
85. Time allowed for Intended Citizens to leave the Country - - - - - - - 45
86. Mr. Scott's Case—Ownership of Land - - 45
87. Status of Sons of Naturalized Citizens - - 46
88. Cases of Cap. Sherwin, Messrs. Matchett and Hamilton 46
89. Confederate Conscription—Expulsion of British Consuls - - - - - - - 46
90. Forced Confederate Conscripts taken Prisoners by United States - - - - - - 46
91. Cases of Hansard, Crutchett, and Gray - - 46
92. Conscription Act, 1864 - - - - 46
93. Status of Sons of Americans born in British Territory - - - - - - - 47
94. Prisoners captured in Blockade Runners - - 47
95. Residents in Places under Martial Law - - 47
96. Enrolment in New Orleans Police - - - 47
97. Proclamation of Penalties on Aliens concerned in Blockade Running - - - - 47
98. Mr. Foden's Case - - - - - 47
99. End of the War - - - - - - 47

Fenian Arrests.

100. Suspension of Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, February 1866 - - - - 47
101. Mr. Adams' Reports to his Government - - 48
102. Interview with Lord Clarendon—Consul West not allowed to visit Naturalized Americans. This distinction subsequently waived - - - 48
103. Mr. Seward's Instructions to Mr. Adams—Naturalization—Fisheries - - - - - 48
104. Cases of Colonel Burke, Cavesford, and others Mr. Adams reports that the persons arrested were all guilty of Fenianism - - - 48
105. All proved American Citizens released - - 48

Imprisonment of Fenians in Canada.

106. Fenian Raid, June 1866—Mr. Seward deprecates severity in dealing with the Prisoners - - - 48
107. Resolutions in House of Representatives—Cases of McMahon and Lynch - - - - 49

Cases of Burke and McCafferty.

108. Tallaght Affair—Sentences of death commuted - 49

Refusal of Mixed Jury.

109. Cases of Warren and Costello—Chief Baron Piggott's Ruling - - - - - 49

Proceedings in Congress.

110. Mr. Robinson's Motion censuring Mr. Adams, November 25, 1867 - - - - - 49
111. Ditto Mr. West, December 2—Nagle's Petition—Foreign Committee to Report - 50
112. Resolutions in favour of McMahon, Lynch, Warren, and Nagle—Report of Foreign Affairs Committee - - - - - - 50
113. Bill proposed by the Committee - - - 50
114. Debates on the Bill. Bill as amended - - 51
115. Bill referred to the Senate and passed with the reprisal clause omitted - - - - 52

PART V. CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND OTHER COUNTRIES.

116. Prussia—Mr. Wheaton's Doctrine, 1840 - - 52
117. Ditto Mr. Barnard's Doctrine, 1851 - - - 53
118. Mr. Everett's Doctrine, 1853 - - - 53
119. Ditto Baron Manteuffel's explanation of Prussian Practice and Law of 1843 - - - 53
120. Ditto Mr. Cass Doctrine 1858 - - 54
121. Ditto Correspondence interrupted by Civil War 54
122. Ditto Ditto resumed 1865—Count Bismarck's suggestions for an arrangement by a Convention - - - - - - 54
123. Ditto Further Proposals of Prussian Government - - - - - - - - 55
124. Ditto Austro-Prussian War—Renewed Negotiations - - - - - - 55

No. Page

125. Prussia—Substance of Treaty of February 22, 1868 - - - - - - - 55
126. German States—Hamburg Expatriation Law—Correspondence with Bremen, &c. - - 55
127. Austria—Case of Martin Kozta - - 56
128. Ditto Ditto —Mr. Marcy's assertion of claim to protection acquired by domicil - - - - - 56
129. Austria—Case of Simon Tousig—Such claim forfeited by return to native country - - 57
130. Bavaria — Case of Amthor — Renunciation of Naturalization - - - - - 57
131. France—Mr. Webster's Doctrine, 1852 - - 57
132. Ditto—Alibert's Case—French Conscription - 57
133. Ditto Zeiter's Case ditto - - 58
134. Ditto Recent Conscription Cases, 1866 - 58
135. Spain—Thrasher's Case—Domicil—Exercise of Foreign Jurisdiction over Americans in cases of Treason - - - - - - 58
136—Ditto Case of Liaño—Mr. Webster's Doctrine, 1852 - - - - - - 59
137. Denmark—Boie Smidt—Conscription Case - 59
138. Russian—Law as to renouncing Naturalization—Russians naturalized abroad expelled from Russia 59
139. Costa Rica—Protection refused to Persons fraudulently naturalized in United States without intention of residing - - - - 60

PART VI. CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND OTHER COUNTRIES.

140. Observations—Conflict between British Statute Law and Common Law of Native Allegiance in regard to Children of British Subjects born abroad 60
141. Instructions given as to their Protection to Vice-Consul Dale, December 20, 1842 - - 60
142. Argentine Republic — Buenos Ayres — Sir R. Peel's Statement in the House of Commons, 1845 61
143. Ditto As to British Subjects wearing the Badges of Foreign Citizenship - 61
144. Ditto Conscription—Substitutes allowed to the Sons of Aliens - - - 61
145. Ditto Correspondence between English and French Governments as to Protection to be accorded to the Sons of their Subjects born in Buenos Ayres — Anomaly of French Law of Nationality - - - - - - 61
146. Argentine Republic—Further as to Conscription Law of 1863 declaring all Persons born in the Confederation to be Argentines - - 62
147. Austria—Venetian Cases in 1848 — Citizenship acquired by Domicil - - - - 62
148. Belgium—Rules as to Protection to be afforded by Her Majesty's Ministers abroad to Naturalized Englishmen - - - - 62
149. Brazil—Nationality and Conscription Cases - 63
150. Ditto Mr. Spence—Brazilian Law of Nationality 63
151. China—Notification of 1868. Distinctive dress to be worn by British Chinese within the Chinese Empire - - - - - 64
152. Columbia—New Granada—British Protection not forfeited by entering Foreign Civil Service Panama Riot Claims—United States' Doctrine of Domicil—Laws respecting Foreigners - - 64
153. Ditto Señor Montoya—As to Status of Sons of a Columbian born in England - - 65
154. Denmark—Mr. Rainal's Case—Effect of taking a "borgerbrev" - - - - - 65
155. France—Señor Braza's Children—Status of Minor Children of Aliens born in France - - 66
156. Ditto Militia in British Guiana—French residents refused Exemption - - - 66
157. Ditto Julien Colonna Walewski, born in England of Polish Parents - - - - 67
158. Ditto Answer returned to French Government as to British Law of Native Allegiance - 67
159. Ditto British Naturalization does not protect in Native Country—Mr. Casaubon—Conscription Case—Domicils - - - - - 68
160. Ditto Mr. Zwinger — Marriage of a Naturalized Swiss at British Embassy - - 68
161. Germany—Frankfort — Mr. Grimm — Claim to British Protection from English or Colonial Naturalization - - - - - 68
162. Ditto Hans Towns—James Terry — Liability to Conscription of Sons of British Subjects who have taken up Hamburgh Citizenship—Messrs. C. and A. Bosdet - - - - 68
163. Ditto Saxony—Children born on board British Vessels, or born without the Queen's Dominions Naturalized Parents - - - - - 69
164. Greece—Conscription of British Subjects domiciled in Ionian Islands - - - - 69
165. Ditto, Don Pacifico, a native of Gibraltar -
166. Guatemala—Conscription—Sons of British Subjects exempted up to Twenty-one Years of Age and can then provide Substitutes - - - 69

No.		Page
167.	Italy—Sicilian Nationality Cases, 1837	69
168.	Ditto Mr. Vertu; born in England of Sardinian parents	70
169.	Ditto Messrs. Salteri and Sofio—Sicilian and Tuscan Nationality	70
170.	Ditto Phillip Smith, 1866—Provisions of New Code as to the Sons of Domiciled Aliens render them liable to Conscription until they are 21	70
171.	Ditto Liability of British Subjects to Forced Loans on Mines, &c. in which they are associated with Italians	70
172.	Mexico—Protection to be given to Naturalized British Subjects	70
173.	Ditto Law as to Aliens holding Land, and Illegitimate Children of Aliens	70
174.	Ditto Mr. Crowther not debarred from British Protection by Service in American Army	71
175.	Monte Video—Instructions to Mr. Vice-Consul Dale	71
176.	Netherlands—Liability to Conscription of Domiciled Aliens, British Subjects exempted—Question as to the Enrolment of Aliens in British Militia	71
177.	Norway—Conscription of Domiciled Aliens	71
178.	Persia—Protection to Children born in British India of Persian Parents—Such Cases must be treated exceptionally in Countries like Persia	71
179.	Ditto. As to the Protection to the Grandson of a British-born subject	71
180.	Peru—Registration of Children of British Subjects	72
181.	Portugal—Children born in Portugal of British Parents cannot be protected against Portuguese Laws	72
182.	Prussia—Status of British Widows of Foreigners	73
183.	Ditto Mr. Consul Crossthwaite—Liability to Conscription of Sons of Aliens naturalized in Prussia	73
184.	Ditto Answer returned to Prussian Government as to British Practice of Enlistment on Return to England of British Subjects naturalized abroad	73
185.	Russia—Madame Von Essen—Claim to a British Passport of the Widow of a Naturalized Russian	73
186.	Ditto Status of British Jews in Russia	73
187.	Ditto As to Children of British Subjects who have been naturalized in order to carry on Trade in Russia—Case of Mr. Woolff born in England of Hanoverian Parents	74
188.	Spain—Conscription—Sons of Domiciled Aliens exempted—Claims of Grandsons of British Subjects	74
189.	Switzerland—Answer to Swiss Government as to loss of English Nationality	75
190.	Ditto Conscription of British-born Sons of naturalized Swiss	75
191.	Ditto European Central Railway Company, as to British Protection to Companies whose Direction is domiciled Abroad—Mr. Roch—Conscription Case	75
192.	Tunis—Grazia Abela, Maltese turned Mahometan	75
193.	Turkey—Protection to Naturalized British Subjects and their Agents	76
194.	Ditto Cases of Messrs. Casavetti, Calimachi, Theologo and Giro—Protection of naturalized Turkish Rayahs in Egypt	76
195.	Ditto Mr. J. Aslan—Ionian Nationality—Mr. S. Theologo's Agent at Galatz—Mr. Rodocanachi, Scian bankrupt—Claim of a naturalized British Subject resident abroad to be registered as part Owner of a British Ship—Mr. T. G. Aslan	76
196.	Ditto Messrs. Cuppa's Claim to British Nationality as Sons of a British Naval Officer—M. Mavrogodato's Case	76
197.	Venezuela—Status of Illegitimate Children of British Parents	77
198.	Ditto Objection of Venezuelan Government to Persons born in Venezuela being regarded as British Claimants	77
199.	Ditto Venezuelan Nationality Law of 1863	78

ADDENDA.

		Page
(A.)	Attorney-General Cushing's Opinion on Expatriation	78
(B.)	United States' Naturalization Act, 1802, Oaths, and Certificate	85
(C.)	Sir W. Scott's Judgment in the Case of the "Ann"	86
(D.)	Judgment of Wissembourg Court in Zeiter's Case (French Conscription)	87
(E.)	Attorney-General Bates' Opinion on Citizenship	87
(F.)	Chief Baron Piggott's Ruling in Warren's Case (Mixed Jury)	90
(G.)	Memorandum on Prussian Laws	91
(H.)	Report by Counsel to Vienna Embassy on Austrian Laws	92
(I.)	British Naturalization Acts, 1844, 1847 (7 & 8 Vict. cap. 66, 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 83)—Form of Certificates—Regulations respecting Issue of Certificates of Naturalization	93
(K.)	Foreign Office Circulars respecting the Grant of Passports and Protection to Naturalized British Subjects	96
(L.)	Mr. Vernon Harcourt on British Nationality	97
(M.)	Report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs of House of Representives	98
(N.)	Nationality Statutes. 25 Edw. III. stat. 2; 7 Anne, c. 5; 10 Anne, c. 5; 4 Geo. II. c. 21; 13 Geo. III. c. 21	107

Observations to accompany Memorandum on Naturalization and Allegiance.

The practical question at the present time is whether Great Britain shall adopt the principle of expatriation, advocated by the Government of the United States and incorporated in the recent treaty between that country and Prussia?

In order fully to understand the position occupied by the United States and Great Britain on this matter, it is necessary to consider the principles on which naturalization and expatriation are carried out by different countries.

There are five main systems of naturalization:

1. By taking an oath of allegiance and obtaining a certificate, granted at the discretion of the Government, as in England.

2. By certificate from a court of law, granted on proving residence for a stated period and taking oath of allegiance, as in Canada.

3. By residence for a stated period, and certificate from the Government, without oath, as in France.

4. By employment in the public service, or certificate from the Government, as in Prussia.

5. By residence for a stated period, renunciation of native allegiance, and by taking an oath of allegiance to adopted country, as in the United States.

Provision is also made by many countries for the exceptional naturalization of aliens, as in England by two years' naval service during war, and in the United States, by service in the army with one year's residence.

There are three distinct doctrines of expatriation:

1. The Continental, as embodied in the Code Napoléon, by which an emigrant incurs the loss of civil rights in his native country ("privation des droits civils par la perte de la qualité de Français;" "perdita della cittadinanza"). Should the emigrant return to his native country, this loss of civil rights may be accompanied by penal consequences, as in Austria, when the emigration has taken place without the permission of the Government.

Looking to the circumstances under which the Code Napoléon was framed, and to the continental practice of conscription, it is obvious that expatriation, as provided for in that Code, and in the laws subsequently founded on it, was intended to punish, and not to encourage, emigration.

2. The American, or theoretical. The American doctrine has varied from Mr. Wheaton's axiom, when Minister at Berlin in 1840, that native nationality reverted on return to the native land, to Mr. Cass's in 1858, that, should a naturalized foreigner "return to his native country, he returns as an American citizen, and in no other character."

While American politicians argue that "perpetual allegiance is a doctrine of barbarism," no provision is made in the statutes of that country for the expatriation of Americans. This anomaly has been frequently pointed out, and was remarked upon in the recent debates in the House of Representatives, when one of the speakers urged that, before asking other countries to alter their laws, the United States should set the example by altering their own.

3. The English. Originating in the feudal idea of native and indelible allegiance to the Prince of the country in which the subject was born, the English doctrine has been gradually modernized into a system of native nationality adapted to a commercial people.

It is in this latter spirit, with a view to retaining the connexion between British subjects residing for mercantile purposes in foreign countries and their native land, that the statutes declaring the sons and grandsons of British subjects born abroad to be British subjects, must now be regarded.

There are, therefore, two conflicting principles of expatriation; the Continental, which punishes emigration by loss of civil rights, but does not necessarily admit that such emigration can free the emigrant from the obligations of his native nationality; and the American doctrine, which claims for the subjects of other countries (but does not grant by law to Americans) the right of free expatriation.

That this right is denied by most continental countries is shown by the fact that a Frenchman, whose certificate of foreign naturalization is not of three years' date, is liable to the French conscription; a Russian, naturalized abroad, may be expelled from Russia; even a Prussian, under the new treaty with the United States, must reside uninterruptedly in America for five years, as well as be naturalized, before he can change his nationality. Each country hampers expatriation with such restrictions as it thinks fit, and this must probably continue to be the case so long as the present conscription laws are retained.

There does not seem any evident reason why such restrictions should be imposed by Great Britain if the principle of expatriation were adopted.

In the Prince Regent's Declaration of 1813, the necessity for maintaining the doctrine of indissoluble allegiance is based upon the right of the Crown to the services of its subjects, especially seamen, in time of war.

A similar argument was urged by Lord Stowell, and at the negotiations for the treaty of Ghent.

In fact, in those days, Great Britain stood towards the United States, as regards maritime conscription, much in the same position as the Continental countries now stand with regard to their military conscription.

But the practice of impressment has now fallen into desuetude, and is not likely ever to be revived.

The further claim to punish as traitors British subjects found in arms against their native country, was practically abandoned when the prisoners taken in the United States service were unconditionally exchanged in 1814 without having been brought to trial as threatened.

It must be remembered that the theory of treason is the same in England and in the United States. The law of France punishes with death a Frenchman (whether naturalized abroad or not) who is taken in arms against France.

The right of impressment having been given up, and the doctrine of treason thus modified by practice, there does not now remain any claim which Great Britain need seek to maintain upon the allegiance of British subjects emigrating to foreign countries.

Moreover, the interest of the British Colonies in urging the right of free expatriation is only second to that of the United States. Indeed any privileges or rights which may be accorded to Germans, or others, becoming naturalized in the United States, and which may not be secured equally for emigrants to the Colonies, more especially Canada, would offer a direct premium on emigration to the former, to the manifest disadvantage, and probably discontent, of the latter.

The importance of this view of the subject will be seen from the following statistics, taken from the census of 1861 :—

Upper Canada.

Total population - - -	1,396,091
Born in the United States - -	50,758
Born in Prussia, German States, and Holland - - - -	22,906

Lower Canada.

Total population - - -	1,110,664
Born in the United States - -	13,641
Born in Germany, &c. - - -	949

New South Wales.

Total population - - -	350,860
Born in Germany - - -	5,467

Queensland.

Total population (exclusive of Aborigines)	30,059
Born in Germany - - -	2,124

Victoria.

Total population - - -	540,322
Born in Germany - - -	10,418

South Australia.

Total population - - -	126,830
Born in Germany - - -	8,863

It is stated that Germany affords 7 per cent. of the immigrants to this Colony.

On the other hand, it must be remembered that, with the exception of the Fenians, who wish to take advantage of the liberality of British laws, to enable them to carry on filibustering expeditions against Ireland and Canada, and to contrive Irish treason under cover of American nationalty, there are few British-born subjects who really want, or who could in any way be benefited by, the privilege of expatriation. In the voluminous correspondence which has been consulted in compiling the accompanying Memorandum, there are hundreds of cases of persons claiming British nationality and protection, but not one, with the exception of sailors anxious to evade the press and Fenians, in which British allegiance has been repudiated.

This is not, of course, any reason why the principle of expatriation, if it is a good one, should not be adopted; but it suggests the necessity for caution in dealing with a matter in which so many and various interests may be involved.

Even the Fenians would derive very little benefit from a change in the law, or from a Treaty stipulating that they should be considered American citizens, for they do now claim and receive the protection of the American Minister. According to Judge Fitzgerald's ruling in Nagle's case, an overt act of treason within the realm must be proved before a true bill can be brought in against them for that offence; and it is difficult to see what advantage an Irish American can secure for himself by being tried before a jury composed of six Irishmen, two Germans, three Portuguese, and an Italian.

It is to be presumed that, if Treaties could be agreed upon which would be practicable in operation and acceptable to foreign nations, a corresponding alteration in the law, at all events of this country, would have to be made; and it must be a matter of consideration how such an alteration can be carried out, affecting as it will do, the rights of property in the Colonies as well as in England, and altering the whole system on which the hitherto received doctrine of British protection to British subjects resident abroad rests.

While it seems perfectly fair to expatriate a person who wilfully severs his connexion with his native country, care should be taken to make a distinction between persons residing temporarily abroad for commercial purposes, and compelled by local laws to take an oath of allegiance, in order to carry on their trade or profession as was formerly the case in Russia and Denmark, and persons permanently incorporating themselves and their interests in a foreign country.

Thus it would be a hardship on British merchants that a person who had taken out a burgher licence to enable him to carry on a broker's agency in Denmark, should be thereby absolutely expatriated and disabled from inheriting real property in England.

Nor should a British subject be expatriated for having worn a red waistcoat at Buenos Ayres (see Memorandum), or resided two years in Columbia.

The Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 provides that no person who has taken an oath of allegiance to a foreign Sovereign shall be entitled to be registered as owner of a British merchant vessel unless he shall have subsequently taken another oath of allegiance to the British Crown.

The principle of expatriation here recognized, could not be carried out without some further provisions, as it will have been already seen that an oath of allegiance is not required for naturalization in France and other countries.

The simplest plan would be to provide that a British subject naturalizing himself in a foreign country should be deemed, from the time of his being so naturalized, to be a subject or citizen of that country. The advantage of making the Act of Expatriation depend upon the Act of Naturalization would be that a record of the fact would be preserved; whereas if the expatriation is made to depend also upon domicil (as in the Prussian Treaty) the difficulties of subsequently proving such uninterrupted domicil would probably be almost insuperable.

The Prussian Treaty likewise contains a provision for repatriation by domicil. In Prussia this may be of importance, as it would no doubt be inconvenient to allow naturalized Prussian-Americans to return to Prussia and to claim continued exemption from the military service to which all their neighbours would be exposed.

The new Italian Code enables an expatriated citizen to recover his civil rights: 1. By returning to the realm with the special permission of the Government. 2. By relinquishing foreign employment. 3. By declaring before the proper civil authority of the State an intention to re-establish his domicil within the realm, and by so bonâ fide establishing it within a year. The son of an expatriated Italian can also recover his nationality by making a similar declaration on coming of age, either before the authorities in Italy, or before any Italian Diplomatic or Consular Agent abroad.

Having regard to the British law of alienship, particularly as respects the right to inherit real property, there might be great difficulty in making similar provisions for the repatriation of British expatriates, especially as there is no machinery in England or the colonies for local registration for police and conscription purposes, as in Italy, Prussia, and France.

A careful consideration, therefore, of this intricate subject leads to the following conclusions:—

1. That the time has arrived when the principle of free expatriation may be adopted, and even (in the interests of the colonies) advocated by Great Britain.

2. That such expatriation should depend on the expatriate being naturalized by some legal process in a foreign country, and not on domicil; care being taken that the interests of persons resident abroad and assuming local and temporary allegiance for mercantile purposes are not injuriously affected.

3. That an expatriate should become from the time of his alien naturalization absolutely an alien, subject both as regards himself and his children (whether minors at the time of his naturalization or born subsequent to it) to all the disabilities of alienship.

4. That repatriation should be effected in the same manner as naturalization, i.e., the expatriate having become an alien should only recover the rights and privileges of a British subject by the same process as aliens are admitted to them.

(Signed) CHAS. S. A. ABBOTT.

Foreign Office,
March 19, 1868.

PART I.—BRITISH AND COLONIAL LAWS.

The following is the definition of allegiance given by Spelman:—"Vinculum arctius inter subditum "et Regem utrosque invicem connectens; hunc ad "protectionem et justum regimen, illos ad tributa "et debitam subjectionem. . . . Custu- "mar. vet. Norman. Cap. 43. Legiantiam autem "sive legalitatem de omnibus hominibus suis totius "provinciæ debet [Princeps] habere: ex quo ei "tenentur contra omnes homines qui mori possunt "aut vivere proprii corporis præbere consilii et "auxilii adjuvamentum; et ei se in omnibus "innocuos exhibere; nec ei adversantiam partem "in aliquo confovere. Ipse etiam eosdem tenetur "regere, protegere ac defensare eosque secundum "jura et consuetudines et leges patriæ pertractare." —(Spelman's Glossary "Ligantia et inde Ligiantia "et Allegiantia.")

By the common law all persons above the age of twelve years were required to take the oath of allegiance in courts leet.

There were several statutes requiring the oath of allegiance and supremacy to be taken under penalties; justices of the peace might summon persons above the age of eighteen years to take these oaths. 1 Eliz. c. 1. 1 W. & M. c. 18. 1. A. st. 1. c. 22. (Tomlins' Law Dictionary, 1835).

By the English common law, founded on the principle of feudal ligeance and homage, none were admissible as natural born subjects, if they were not born in a place actually possessed at the time of their birth, either by the king himself or by some prince doing homage to him for it: except, first, the children of any subjects born beyond sea, who at the birth of those children should be in the service of the Crown; secondly, the sovereign's children born during the royalty of their parents; and thirdly, the heir of the Crown wherever born.

"Chitty's Commercial Law," Vol. i, c. 5. Report of the House of Commons' Select Committee on the Laws affecting Aliens, 1843.

"There be regularly (unless it be in special "cases) three incidents to a subject born—1. "That the parents be under the actual obedience "of the King; 2. That the place of his birth be "within the King's dominion; and 3. The time of "his birth is chiefly to be considered, for he can- "not be a subject born of one kingdom that was "born under the ligeance of a King of another "kingdom, albeit afterwards one kingdom descend "to the king of the other. 1. For the first, it is "termed actual obedience, because the King of "England hath absolute right to other kingdoms or "dominions, as France, Aquitain, Normandy, &c., "yet seeing the King is not in actual possession

" thereof, none born there since the crown of " England was out of actual possession thereof are " subjects to the King of England. 2. The place " is observable, but so as many times ligeance or " obedience, without any place within the King's " dominions may make a subject born ; but any " place within the King's dominions without " obedience can never produce a natural subject, " and therefore, if any of the King's ambassadors " in foreign nations have children there of their " wives, being English women, by the common " laws of England they are natural-born subjects, " and yet they are born out of the King's domi- " nions. (Cr. Car. 601, 602. March 91. Jenk. " Cent. 3.) But if enemies should come into any " of the King's dominions, and surprise any castle " or fort, and possess the same by hostility, and " have issue there, that issue is no subject to " the King, though he be born within his domi- " nions ; for that he was not born under the King's " ligeance or obedience. But, 3, the time of his " birth is of the essence of a subject born ; for he " cannot be a subject to the King of England, " unless at the time of his birth he was under the " ligeance and obedience of the King."—(Lord Coke's report of Calvin's case — State Trials, Vol. 2. p. 639.)

In the 17th year of the reign of Edward III. (A.D. 1343) doubts having arisen whether the King's sons born without the realm could inherit ("grante donte et difficultee ont este entre les " Grantz de cest Roialme et les Communes, aussi " bien Gentz de lei come autres") the Archbishop of Canterbury laid the question before the Lords. The Lords replied unanimously that there was no doubt that the King's sons could inherit, wherever born, but that with regard to children of other persons there were great difficulties in deciding the question.

The matter was again brought jointly before the Lords and Commons, who concurred in the opinion previously given by the Lords, and recommended that a law should be passed on the subject, but, as Parliament was about to be prorogued "et ceste " busoigne demand grant avisement et bone deli- " beration coment ele se purra mieltz faire et plus " surement," the further consideration of it was deferred. (Rotuli Parliamentorum, Vol. II., p. 139.)

Owing to the Plague, legislation on this and other subjects was deferred and not resumed until A.D. 1350, when the Act 25 Edward III. stat. 2. was passed.

Addenda M, p. 98. This Statute is intituled, "A Statute for those " that be born beyond sea," and provided "that " all children inheritors which from henceforth " shall be born without the legiance of the King, " whose fathers and mothers at the time of the birth " be and shall be at the faith and legiance of the " King of England, shall have and enjoy the same " benefits and advantages, to have and bear the " inheritance within the same legiance, as the " other inheritors aforesaid in time to come ; so " always the mothers of such children do pass the " sea by the licence and wills of their husbands."

Lord Bacon, in his speech as Calvin's counsel in the case of the Postnati, thus refers to this Act:—

" By the Statute of 25 Edward III., which, if " you will believe Hussey, is but a declaration of " the common law, all children born in any parts " of the world, if they be of English parents con- " tinuing at that time as liege subjects to the King, " and having done no act to forfeit the benefit of " their allegiance, are ipso facto naturalized. " Nay, if a man look narrowly into the law on this " point, he shall find a consequence that may seem " at the first strange, but yet cannot well be " avoided ; which is, that if divers families of " English men and women plant themselves at " Middleborough or at Roan, or at Lisbon, and " have issue, and their descendants do intermarry " amongst themselves, without any admixture of " foreign blood, such descendants are naturalized to " all generations ; for every generation is still of " liege parents, and therefore naturalized: so as " you may have whole tribes and lineages of " English in foreign countries.

" And therefore it is utterly untrue that the " law of England cannot operate or confer natural- " ization, but only within the bounds of the " dominion of England."—State Trials, Vol. 2, p. 586).

It is to be observed that Lord Bacon was speaking of persons of pure English descent by their fathers and mothers having done no act to forfeit their allegiance ; such persons, he declared, were naturalized by the statute to all generations. He did not say that they did not also owe allegiance to, and were entitled to protection from, the country of their birth.

The Statute 15 Charles II., c. 15, after making several provisions for enabling aliens to exercise certain trades (linen spinning, net weaving, tapestry making), enacts that all foreigners who shall really and bonâ fide set up and use any of the trades and manufactures aforesaid by the space of three years in England, Wales, or Berwick-upon-Tweed, shall from thenceforth, on taking the usual oaths, enjoy all privileges whatsoever as the natural-born subjects of this kingdom.

An attempt was made by the 7th Anne, c. 5, to naturalize all Protestants within the realm.

This Act contains the following clause: "That " the children of all natural-born subjects born out " of the legiance of Her Majesty, her heirs and " successors, shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken " to be natural born subjects of this kingdom, " to all intents, constructions, and purposes what- " soever." Addenda M, p. 98.

With the exception of this clause, the statute of 7 Anne, c. 5, was repealed by 10 Anne, c. 5.

4 Geo. II., c. 21, explains the above-mentioned clause by enacting that "all children born out of " the legiance, that is, out of the domain of the " Crown of England, or which shall hereafter be " born out of such legiance, or whose fathers were " or shall be natural-born subjects of the Crown " of England or of Great Britain at the time of " the birth of such children respectively, shall and " may, by virtue of the said recited clause in the " said Act of the seventh year of the reign of " Her said late Majesty and of this present Act, " be adjudged and taken to be, and all such chil- " dren are hereby declared to be natural-born " subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, to all " intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever." Addenda M, p. 98.

By 13 Geo. II., c. 3, foreign seamen serving for two years during war on board English men-of-war or merchant ships are naturalized ipso facto. But it is provided that such naturalization shall not enable the party naturalized to be of the Privy Council, or a member of either House of Parliament, or to have any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, from the Crown to himself, or to any person in trust for him.

By 13 Geo. II., c. 7, all foreigners who have resided seven years in any of His Majesty's colonies in America, without having been absent longer than two months at any one time are naturalized on taking the oaths, making the declaration, and receiving the sacrament as therein prescribed ; subject, nevertheless, to the same proviso as the last-mentioned statute.

20 Geo. II., c. 44, extended the benefits of this Act to the Moravian Brethren and to all foreign Protestants conscientiously scrupulous of taking an oath.

By 22 Geo. II., c. 45, foreign Protestants are naturalized upon serving three years on board any ship fitted out as therein mentioned and employed in the whale fishery; but they lose this benefit if they go out of the king's dominions in England, Ireland, or the American plantations, for more than twelve months at a time.

The statute of 13 Geo. III., c. 21, enacts that all persons whose fathers by the statute of 4 Geo. II., c. 21, are entitled to the rights of natural born subjects shall be adjudged natural-born subjects also; thus the provisions which by the Act 4 Geo. II. extended only to the children of natural born subjects are by this Act extended to the grandchildren also.

It will be seen therefore that Lord Bacon's doctrine as to the transmission of British nationality was not undisputed, as the statutes of Anne and George II. having naturalized the children of British subjects, another statute was considered requisite to naturalize the grandchildren.

Inconvenience having been experienced from persons becoming naturalized merely to enable them to claim the privileges of British subjects under treaties with foreign powers, without any intention of taking up their residence in Great Britain, an Act was passed (14 Geo. III., c. 84) declaring that no bill of naturalization should be received which did not contain a proviso that the person so naturalized should not be entitled to any such privileges or immunities unless he had resided within British territory for seven years subsequent to the passing of the Act without having been absent for longer than two months.

The 26 Geo. III., and 28 Geo. III. provide that every foreigner who has established himself and his family in Great Britain, and carried on the southern whale fishery, and imported the produce thereof for the space of five years successively shall be entitled to all the privileges of a natural-born subject.

2 Geo. III., c. 25, naturalized foreign Protestants serving two years in the Royal American Regiment or as engineers in America.

The persons naturalized by these statutes were not placed on the same footing with English subjects to all intents and purposes. They were all, by the statutes that conferred the privilege, as well as by the Statute of 12 and 13 Wm. III., c. 2, prohibited from being members of the Privy Council or of either House of Parliament, and from enjoying any office or place civil or military, or any grant from the king of lands within the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

In general, therefore, a person naturalized was not even eligible to the office of constable.

These stringent restrictions were owing to the jealousy of foreigners, arising from the prejudices of the English against the Dutch favourites of William III. and the Hanoverian courtiers of the two first Georges.

Irish Statutes.

Stock's Evidence, Aliens Committee, 1843.

The Irish common law with regard to aliens was the same as the English, but, from motives of policy and a desire to encourage Irish manufactures the legislation (for before the Union the Irish Parliament had the power of conferring rights of naturalization) was much more liberal.

The first Irish Parliament held in the reign of Charles II. (14 & 15 Car. II., c. 13.) passed an Act reciting the advantages which would be derived from the resort of foreign traders, artificers, and seamen, and providing that any aliens who should transport their stocks and families with intent to reside therein should be admitted to the privileges of a natural-born subject on taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy before the Lord Chancellor or Judges on circuit, and further that any such person should be admitted a freeman of any town, corporate, or borough on taking those oaths and tendering a fine of 20*s.* to the magistrates of such town or borough.

The operation of this Act was limited to seven years from the end of Parliament then sitting, and it was continued by the 2d of Anne, c. 14, for five years on the express ground that it had been proved to be highly beneficial.

It was made perpetual by the 4th Geo. I., c. 9, containing a similar preamble.

The 19th & 20th Geo. III., c. 29, extended the benefits of the previous Acts to persons of all religious persuasions; the oaths to be taken being the oath of allegiance and abjuration, with the usual clause that the Pope has no temporal power in this country.

This Act, however, contains a new restrictive clause: "That no person naturalized by this Act "shall be enabled to served in Parliament, nor to "be of the Privy Council, nor to hold any office of "trust, civil or military"

The 23d & 24th Geo. III., c. 38, enacted that any aliens of any sect, religion, or persuasion (except Jews), who should at any time come to Ireland with intent to settle and reside there should, from and after taking the oath (or affirmation) specified, be deemed and adjudged a liege, free, and natural subject, as fully and effectually as if born within the kingdom.

The 2d section of this Act provided "That no "person naturalized under this Act should have "power to be or be entitled to serve in Parliament, "nor be of His Majesty's Privy Council, nor be a "Peer of the realm, nor should be entitled to hold "any office of trust or profit, civil or military, "unless he should have resided in the kingdom "three years, at one or different periods from the "day of passing the Act."

The 36th Geo. III., c. 48, added a fresh provision that no person should have the benefit of that Act or of the previous Acts who should not have previously obtained a licence from the Lord Lieutenant of his being a fit and proper person to be naturalized, which licence shall be produced to the magistrate administering the oath and subsequently filed with the magistrate's certificate in the Court of Chancery.

Mr. Serjeant Stock gave it as his opinion, at the Aliens Committee in 1843, that that Act was still in force, and that "a residence of three years in "Ireland and a licence from the Lord Lieutenant "would qualify any person taking the oaths as a "British subject in the fullest sense of the word, "to be admitted to all the privileges belonging to "a British-born subject."

Naturalization by Special Act of Parliament.

Besides the persons naturalized by the above-mentioned English and Irish Statutes, any person could be naturalized by Act of Parliament passed in his favour.

1st Geo. I. c. 4, provided that no bill of naturalization should be received without a clause disabling the alien applying for it from being a member of the Privy Council or of Parliament, or holding a public office, or receiving grant of crown lands, as specified by the 12th & 13th William III. c. 2.

To these disabilities was added the restriction contained in 14th Geo. III. c. 84, (vide ante,) requiring seven years residence to entitle the naturalized alien to the privileges of British Commercial Treaties, &c.

An order of the House of Lords of 1807 required a certificate from the Home Secretary respecting the applicant's conduct.

This certificate was always granted on the recommendation of any person known to the Secretary of State.

The bill then passed as a matter of course on the applicants taking the usual oaths of allegiance and supremacy if Protestants, and, if Roman Catholics, the oaths settled by the Act for the removal of Catholic Disabilities. Before the passing of that Act it appears that it was not customary for Roman Catholics to be naturalized.

The only practical benefits to be formerly derived from a Naturalization Act were the rights of inheriting and holding real property and voting at elections.

Denization.

State Trials, vol. ii. p. 607.

"A denizen," said Lord Bacon in his speech as counsel in Calvin's case, "is one that is but subditus insitivus or adoptivus, a subject engrafted or adopted, and is never by birth, but only by the King's charter, and by no other mean, come he never so young into the realm, or stay he never so long. Mansion or habitation will not indenize him; no, nor swearing obedience to the King in a leet, which doth in law the subject; but only, as I said, by the King's grace and gift. To this person the law giveth an ability and capacity abridged not in matter but in time. And as there was a time when he was not subject, so the law doth not acknowledge him before that time. For if he purchase freehold after his denization, he may take it; but if he have purchased any before, he shall not hold it: so if he have children after, they shall inherit it; but if he have any before, they shall not inherit."

A denizen therefore was a person on whom the King by his own authority was empowered to bestow certain of the privileges of a British subject.

The status of denization has been recognized by English Statute Law from a very early period. By 22 Henry VIII. c. 8, and some other Acts of that reign, denizens were subjected to certain pecuniary burdens and to the alien duty; and 32 Henry VIII. c. 16, enacts that all aliens made denizens shall be obedient to the laws of the realm, and that a proviso to that effect should be inserted in their letters of denization.

12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2, subjects them to the usual disabilities of naturalized aliens.

In modern times it became the practice for the Home Secretary to issue letters patent under the Great Seal, conferring the privileges of denization on aliens who petitioned the Crown for them, through him.

The expense of the fees was about 120*l.*, and to save expense several names used to be inserted in the same letters patent.

The process of denization was the same in Ireland as in England.

See Mr. Mallet's Evidence, Aliens Committee.

It is not very clear what was the exact difference between the privileges conferred by Letters of Denization and Acts of Naturalization.

The principal differences seem to have been that denization did not confer the privileges of foreign factories, the sons of denizens born before denization could not inherit real property; and it had been held that denizens themselves were incapable of inheriting lands, as that privilege could only be conferred by Parliament.

Chitty's "Commercial Law," vol. i. c. 5. p. 151.

On the other hand, the alien could be made a denizen without being called upon to take any oaths.

A Naturalization Act cost the petitioner about 100*l.* in fees; and both systems were condemned as costly and cumbersome by the Committee appointed to consider the state of the Law relating to Aliens, in 1843.

The result of their recommendations was that an Act was passed considerably modifying the laws affecting aliens, and affording greater facilities for their naturalization.

Present Law.

This Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, August 6, 1844), is at present in force, and is as follows:—

Addenda I, p. 93.

Clause 1, repeals certain former Acts.

2. Repeals the disabling provision of 1 George I. c. 4., as to aliens naturalized under Act of Parliament, being Members of Parliament or of the Privy Council, or receiving grant of Crown lands.

3. Every person born of a British mother is rendered capable of inheriting or holding real or personal estate.

4. Alien friends may hold every species of personal property except chattels real.

5. Alien friends may hold lands, houses, &c., for twenty-one years with the same rights, &c., as a British subject, except the right of voting at Elections.

6. Persons naturalized under the Act to have all the privileges of British subjects with the exception of becoming a member of the Privy Council, or of either House of Parliament, and subject to such further restrictions as may be imposed by the Certificate of Naturalization.

7. Authorizes an alien to present a Memorial to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, stating the grounds on which he wishes to be naturalized.

8. The Secretary of State to inquire into the circumstances of each case, and, if he thinks fit, to issue a Certificate granting the Memorialist the rights and privileges of a British subject, except those mentioned in clause 6, and with any further disabilities he may consider it necessary to impose, subject to his taking an oath as prescribed.

9. Certificate to be enrolled in Court of Chancery.

10. Prescribes the oath to be taken as follows:—

"I, A.B., do sincerely promise and swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and will defend her to the utmost of my power against all conspiracies and attempts whatsoever which may be made against her person, crown or dignity; and I will do my utmost endeavour to disclose and make known to Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies which may be formed against her or them; and I do faithfully promise to maintain, support, and defend to the utmost of my power, the succession of the Crown, which succession, by an Act intituled 'An Act for the further 'Limitation of the Crown, and better securing the 'Rights and Liberties of the Subject,' is, and stands limited to the Princess Sophia, Electress of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, hereby utterly renouncing and abjuring any obedience or allegiance unto any other person claiming or pretending a right to the Crown of this realm.

"So help me God."

This oath to be taken before one of the Judges or a Master in Chancery.

11. The Secretary of State to make such regulations for obtaining certificates as he considers proper.

12. Fees to be fixed by the Treasury.

13. Persons naturalized before this Act, and who shall have resided five years successively in England, to be entitled to its privileges.

14, 15, Save existing rights.

16. Women married to natural-born subjects to be deemed naturalized.

The passing of this Act put a stop to the practice of granting Letters of Denization or special Acts of Parliament save in exceptional cases.

It appears from inquiry at the Home Office that Letters of Denization are still applied for in some instances. A case occurred recently in which letters of denization were made use of to enable an alien to be trustee for freehold land, &c., occupied by a Dutch chapel, without being naturalized.

Nationality Statistics, Appendix, p. 154.

The Act of 1844, having repealed the provision of 1st Geo. I. c. 4, special Acts have been on one or two occasions since passed (as the Act of 1867, in the case of Henri Louis Bischoffsheim), to confer on the alien "all the rights, privileges, and capacities whatsoever" of a natural-born subject of the Queen, including, of course, the right to sit in Parliament.

But unless an alien has some particular reason, such as the disposal of real property, or desires to sit in Parliament, he does not go to the expense of procuring a Naturalization Act or Letter of Denization, but contents himself with the certificate under the Act of 1844, which is given gratuitously by the Home Office, and the whole expense for which, including enrolment and taking the oath, is only 17*s.* 6*d.*

It must be remembered that under 13 Geo. III., c. 21, the grandchildren of British subjects are British subjects; no naturalization is therefore required in the case of persons born abroad who are descended in the third generation from British subjects.

Such a case occurred recently when Mr. Bernhard Samuelson was returned for Banbury in 1859 and 1865. Mr. Samuelson was born in Hamburgh, and maintained his right to sit in Parliament in virtue of his grandfather having been born in the City of London.

The intention of the legislation for granting naturalization to aliens in Great Britain has always been to confer upon those who are bonâ fide resident in this country such rights and privileges (with certain exceptions) as they would otherwise be debarred by their alienship from enjoying; but it was never meant to encourage aliens to become naturalized with a view to their being able to claim British protection in foreign countries, and certainly not to entitle them to such protection as against the sovereign of their native land, which would be entirely contrary to the spirit of the English law.

The oath which they are called upon to take, is accordingly one of allegiance to the Sovereign within this realm, and not of renunciation of allegiance (as in the American law) to their native sovereign.

By the 6th clause of the Act of 1844, the Secretary of State is empowered to make such exceptions as he may think fit in the Certificate

It seems that at first the certificates were granted unconditionally, but much inconvenience being experienced from persons applying for naturalization in order to secure British protection abroad for political and other purposes, in 1850 a clause was inserted in the certificates of naturalization excepting "any rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject, out of and beyond the dominions of the British Crown and the limits thereof."

Addenda K. p. 96. Circular, Jan. 8, 1851.

This exception was enforced from the 24th of August 1850, to the 12th of March 1854, when it was modified by the addition of the words "other than such as may be conferred upon him by the grant of a passport from the Secretary of State to enable him to travel in foreign parts."

Home Office, July 13, 1858. To ditto, July 1, 1858. Home Office, August 23, 1858.

In July 1858, the Home Office proposed to place a further restriction on the issue of certificates of naturalization, by limiting the grant of such certificates to bonâ fide residents in the United Kingdom. This was done by adding to the clause previously quoted the following stipulation:—"Provided always, and I do hereby declare, that all the before-mentioned rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject are granted to the aforesaid . . . upon the condition that he shall continue to reside permanently within the United Kingdom, and that if at any time hereafter he shall voluntarily be absent from the United Kingdom for a period of six months at any one time without licence in writing under the hand of one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of States, he shall be deemed to have ceased to reside permanently within the United Kingdom, and then and in such case this certificate and all the rights and capacities thereby granted shall absolutely cease and determine."

In accordance with this condition, naturalized British subjects whose certificates date from 1858 are only entitled to passports "good for six months."

It has been ruled by the Home Office that the Act of 1844 does not empower the Home Secretary to grant a certificate of naturalization to an alien about to proceed to India, as such certificates can only be granted to aliens "residing in any part of Great Britain and Ireland, or who shall 'come to 'reside in' any part of Great Britain or Ireland with intent to settle therein."

It has also been decided by the Foreign Office, on the advice of the law officers, that an alien could not be naturalized under the Act in order to become British Consul exercising consular jurisdiction in Japan, as he could not under such circumstances make the requisite declaration of an intent "to settle" in the United Kingdom.

Sir Moses Montefiore, August 28, 1845.

In 1845 Mr. David Diaz Santillana, interpreter to the British Consulate General at Tunis, applied for a certificate of naturalization. Mr. Santillana was the son of Mr. M. Santillana of Leghorn, and was born at Tunis in 1780. The family moved to France, where Mr. M. Santillana died. Mr. Santillana returned to Tunis in 1800, and was appointed to the post of Consular interpreter. His case was strongly recommended by Sir T. Read, but the Home Office could not grant a certificate as he was not resident in England. In 1849, in consideration of his long services as interpreter, he was placed on the list of British protected subjects.

Home Office, October 6, 1845.

Mr. Moses Santillana, January 15, 1857.

Mr. Santillana was succeeded as interpreter in 1851 by his son, Mr. Moses Santillana, likewise born in Tunis, who, being in England in 1857, applied to Lord Clarendon to recommend him to the Home Office for naturalization. The Home Office gave the usual answer that as he held an appointment abroad he could not be supposed to "intend to reside" in England as required by the Act, but suggested that letters of denization might be granted to him at a cost of about 80*l.* Lord Clarendon having forwarded to the Home Office a despatch from the Consul-General in support of Mr. Santillana's application, the letters of denization were issued to him under the Great Seal.

Home Office, January 27, 1857.

To Home Office, February 17, 1857.

By the Act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106. employment in the civil service of India is limited to "natural-born British subjects." As certificates cannot be granted under the Act of 1844 to aliens about to proceed to India, it would seem that a certificate could not be granted to an alien to enable him to compete at an examination for the Indian Civil Service.

Home Office to Mr. M. H. Picciolto, February 15, 1853. Home Office to India Office, April 21, 1856.

The rule excluding aliens from that service has given rise on various occasions to questions whether the naturalization of an alien father naturalized a minor son born abroad, and the opinion of the law officers was taken in the case of Mr. J. E. Ryssel in 1860.

Mr. Ryssell was informed by the Home Office (August 25th, 1860) that the Attorney and Solicitor General had been consulted—

"1. Whether the children of an alien to whom a certificate of naturalization has been granted, under the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66. born out of the Queen's dominions before the granting of the certificate, and under 21 years of age at the time it bears date, are entitled to the rights and capacities of a naturalized born British subject, either without the exceptions set forth in the above-named statute and in the certificate of naturalization or with them.

"2. What is the condition of a child born out of Her Majesty's dominions after its father has obtained a certificate of naturalization under the above-mentioned Act? If a British subject, is it to all intents and purposes, or do the exceptions contained in the Act of Parliament and certificate still adhere to it," and that the Attorney and Solicitor General had reported—

"1. That by the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66. s. 6. it is enacted that on obtaining the certificate and taking the oath prescribed accordingly, an alien residing, &c. in Great Britain shall enjoy all the rights and capacities which a natural-born subject of the United Kingdom can enjoy and transmit—words which are prospective only, and may give to the children of the alien born in the United Kingdom the status of natural-born British subjects, but there is nothing in the statute or in the law which can alter or affect the status of the children of an alien born out of the Queen's dominions and before the naturalization of the parent. Such children, although infants at the date of the naturalization, are still aliens, and must obtain certificates of naturalization to entitle them to the rights and capacities of natural-born British subjects.

"2. That by the terms of the certificate of naturalization, a naturalized alien does not carry with him into foreign countries the rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject (except the benefit of a British passport), and consequently the child of such naturalized alien born in a foreign country, the parent being abroad, would not answer the description of the child of a natural-born British subject; such child, therefore, is, in the opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor General, an alien, and not a natural-born British subject."

Colonial Naturalization.

Addenda I. p. 93.

Doubts having arisen whether the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, of 1844, extended to the colonies, an Act was passed in 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 83) declaring that it did not extend to the colonies, and that all laws, statutes, or ordinances duly passed or to be passed within Her Majesty's colonies or possessions abroad conferring the privileges of naturalization within the limits of such colonies were valid, subject to the usual confirmation by the Crown.

It may be interesting to notice the naturalization Acts at present in force in the principal colonies.

Antigua, Grenada, St. Vincent.

Colonization Circular, No. 27, 1868, published by the Emigration Commissioners.

In Antigua (Act No. 739, October 1861), Grenada (Act No. 230, 1858) and St. Vincent (Act of October 1857, sect 17), alien immigrants of African descent arriving from the United States or from the British North American Colonies who may have entered or may enter into a written contract of service for not less than a year, shall after three years' residence enjoy all the privileges of a natural-born subject upon taking the oath of allegiance before the Governor, in the presence of the Secretary to the Government. This officer is to keep a register of the names, &c. of such naturalized immigrants, and the register or an official extract is, upon proof of the identity of the immigrant, to be evidence of his rights.

Bahamas.

Ditto.

By the Colonial Act, No. 11 Vict. cap. 4, passed 22nd March 1848, aliens become naturalized upon taking the oath of allegiance and obtaining a certificate from the Governor in Council under the great seal of the colony that the oath has been taken. The certificate is obtainable on presentation to the Governor in Council of a memorial setting forth full particulars respecting the memorialist and the grounds on which the privileges of naturalization are sought, and when obtained the certificate must be recorded in the office of the public secretary and registrar of records. The fees are to be regulated by the Governor in Council and to be paid into the public treasury.

Barbados, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, Grenada.

Ditto.

In Barbados, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, Grenada, and generally in the minor West Indian Colonies there is no general naturalization law, but special Acts are required on each occasion.

Bermuda.

Colonization Circular, No. 27, 1868, published by the Emigration Commissioners.

In this colony the rights of aliens and the steps to be taken for obtaining naturalization are prescribed by a Colonial Act, No. 11 of 1857. They are similar in their main features to those in force in New South Wales.

The time, however, within which the oath is to be taken is extended to three calendar months from the date of the certificate of naturalization. The oath is to be taken before the Governor, and a memorandum of the fact endorsed on the certificate, which document is to be registered in the Colonial Secretary's office, and then enrolled in the Court of the Chancery.

British Columbia.

Ditto.

In this colony the privileges of aliens are at present regulated by a proclamation, dated 14th May 1859, and issued by the Governor, under the authority of the Imperial Act, 21 & 22 Vict. cap. 99, and of his commission. By this proclamation aliens have the same capacity to hold and transmit landed and real estate of every description as natural-born British subjects, and after a residence of three years may demand naturalization on producing a declaration of residence and character from some British subject, on making himself a declaration of residence, and on taking the oath of allegiance. The latter declaration must be made and oath taken before a justice of the peace, who is to declare that he knows no reason why the applicant should not be naturalized. These conditions being fulfilled the Court of British Columbia is to record the proceedings, and the alien is then to be deemed a British subject for all purposes whatsoever while within the Colony. The cost of this process is 18*s*. Aliens, wives of British subjects, are to be deemed to be naturalized.

Parliamentary Papers on British Columbia, Part 3. 1860.

The naturalization may be annulled (in addition to the penalties for perjury) if any party to either of the above declarations is convicted of perjury therein.

British Guiana.

Colonization Circular, 1868.

In this colony there is no General Act for Naturalization. A special ordinance is therefore passed on each occasion, authorizing the Governor to issue letters patent, granting to the alien the rights and capacities of naturalization.

The letters patent must be recorded in the Registrar's Office of the counties of Demerara and Essequibo, and within 10 days from their date the alien must take and subscribe the oath of allegiance before a Judge of the Supreme Court, and a certificate thereof is issued by the Registrar of the Court, whose certificate is to be received as sufficient evidence of the fact.

These ordinances are reserved for Her Majesty's pleasure, and do not take effect until the same has been notified in the official gazette of the colony.

Canada.

Naturalization Act, 22 Vict. c. 8, 1859.

Consolidated Statutes of Canada, page 154.

Section 1. "Every alien residing in any part of "this province before or since 18th January 1849, "with intent to settle therein, and who, after a "continued residence of three years or upwards, "has taken the oaths or affirmations of residence "and allegiance, shall thenceforth enjoy and "transmit all the rights and capacities which a "natural-born subject of Her Majesty can enjoy "and transmit."

Oath of Residence.

Section 2. "I, A.B., do swear that I have resided "three years in this province with intent to settle "therein without having been, during that time, a "stated resident in any foreign country. So help "me God."

The oath of allegiance is the same as in the English Act of 1844.

These oaths are to be taken before the Justices of the Peace at Quarter Sessions, or before the Recorder, and a certificate is to be at the same time produced, signed, if practicable, by a magistrate, testifying to the truth of the statement as to residence.

Thereupon the Clerk of the Court is to issue a certificate stating that "under and by virtue of "the said Act, the said A.B. hath obtained all the "rights and capacities of a natural-born British "subject within this province."

Section 7. Any woman married to a natural-born British subject or person naturalized under the authority of this Act to be deemed naturalized, and have all the rights and privileges of a British subject.*

Section 10. The rights to be enjoyed under this Act to be subject to the conditions and limited to the province, as provided by the Act of the Imperial Parliament.

There are no disabling clauses.

Cape of Good Hope.

Colonization Circular, 1868. By a proclamation issued on the 2nd day of May 1817, by the then Governor-General, Lord Charles Henry Somerset, deeds of burghership, subject to the approbation of the Crown, can be granted to all foreigners and aliens of good character and conduct applying for the same, provided they shall have resided for the last five successive years within the settlement, and upon their taking the usual oaths of allegiance, and paying the usual fees for the deed of burghership in addition to a stamp of 18*l.* 15*s.*

By an Act, No. 8 of 1856, all former laws, customs, or usages inconsistent with the Act are repealed, and from its promulgation (4th June 1856) aliens may purchase, acquire, and own fixed property in the colony, in like manner as natural-born subjects. But beyond this nothing in the Act is to be taken as naturalizing any aliens or bestowing upon them any of the privileges conferred by deeds of burghership.

By an Act, No. 37 of 1861, the Governor is empowered to grant letters of naturalization to any alien of full age and good character, and able to read and understand some European language, and to write his name; provided he has been resident in the colony five years, or is married to a natural-born British subject, or possesses unencumbered landed property in the colony of not less value than 300*l.*

This Act also provides that naturalization elsewhere within British dominion shall hold good at the Cape.

The fee for these letters of naturalization is fixed at 20*l.*

Honduras.

Ditto The Naturalization Act for this Colony, 18 Vict. cap. 18., was proclaimed 19 July 1855. It is similar to the New South Wales Act. By the 23rd section, Immigration Act, 24 Vict. cap. 5., passed in 1861, every immigrant born out of the British dominions who shall have obtained or become entitled to a certificate of industrial residence, shall immediately thereafter become entitled to all such privileges as are conferred by the Act 18 Vict. cap. 18. on naturalized aliens, except the capability to become a member of assembly, which privilege, however, may be allowed by the Superintendent.

Hong Kong.

Ditto. By the Colonial Ordinance, No. 2. of 1853, passed on the 17th November of that year, aliens, though not naturalized, may acquire and dispose of real estate within the colony as effectually as natural-born subjects. The Ordinance confers no other rights on aliens.

* This clause, which is the same as the 16th section of the English Act, is repeated in all the Colonial Acts.

Jamaica.

The Governor may by instrumen under the broad seal, make any alien or foreigner coming to settle and plant in the island, having first taken the oath of allegiance, to be completely naturalized, and the persons named to enjoy the same immunities and rights to the laws of this island as natural-born subjects. Digest of Laws of Jamaica, by the Attorney-General of Jamaica, Ed. 1865, p. 5.

The statute 13 Geo. II. c. 7, naturalizing foreign Protestants and others settling in the colonies to be in full force and operation.

The alien disabled from being a member of the council or assembly.

The provisions, &c., as to the rights of aliens enacted by the English Act of 1844 made applicable to Jamaica by 14 Vict. c. 40., 1851.

By another Act, 22 Vict. cap. 1. (Nov. 1858), every "immigrant" born out of the British dominions, who may obtain or become entitled to a "certificate of industrial residence" under the Act, thereby becomes entitled to all the privileges of a natural-born subject within the island. An immigrant is defined to be any person introduced at the public expense from certain specified places. Colonization Circular, 1868.

Natal.

Under the Law No. 1, of 1860, the Lieutenant-Governor is authorized and empowered to grant, under the public seal of the colony, letters of naturalization to any alien who shall have attained the full age of 21 years, and who shall be able to read and understand one or more of the languages of Europe, and to write his name, and shall have presented to the said Governor a memorial praying to be naturalized; and every such alien, prior to obtaining such letters of naturalization, shall pay into the treasury of the colony a sum of five pounds sterling. Ditto.

No alien shall (except as in the next succeeding section is excepted) be capable of receiving letters of naturalization unless he shall have been a resident within the colony during the five years immediately preceding the presentation of his memorial praying to be naturalized.

Any alien who shall be married to a natural-born subject of Her Majesty the Queen, or who, being married to an alien, shall have had by his said wife, during their marriage and residence within the colony, not less than three children, and any alien who shall be the owner of landed property within the colony, and registered in his name, of not less a value than 300*l.*, over and above all special conventional mortgages affecting the same, shall be capable of obtaining letters of naturalization, although he shall not have resided in the colony for five years.

No letters of naturalization shall be granted to any alien who is an uncertificated insolvent, or of unsound mind, or has been convicted and sentenced for treason, murder, rape, theft, fraud, perjury, forgery, or any other infamous crime.

When such letters of naturalization shall have been obtained by any alien he shall be bound to take the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen.

Any alien woman already married or who shall be hereafter married to a natural-born subject or person naturalized under this or any other law, shall be deemed and taken to be herself naturalized. All minor children, alien born, of any alien parent, who shall himself or herself be naturalized under this or any other law, and which children shall be within the colony at the time of the naturalization of their parent, shall be themselves naturalized ipso facto by such naturalization.

New Brunswick.

The Colonial Act, 24 Vict. c. 24., April 1861, required one year's residence and an oath of allegiance. By the Dominion Consolidation Act, however, (cap. 66., 1868,) the process of naturalization in New Brunswick has been assimilated to that previously in force in Canada. (See Canada.) Ditto. Dominion Act, c. 66. 1868.

Newfoundland.

Colonization Circular, 1868.

By a Colonial Act, 19 Vict. cap. 20., passed on the 12th May 1856, the Governor may, by letters patent under the great seal of the colony, naturalize any alien resident therein.

Within 10 days thereafter the alien must take and subscribe in duplicate, before a judge of the Supreme Court, the oath of allegiance, one copy of which is to be filed in the registry of the court, and the other in the office of the Government secretary. The alien is then entitled to all the privileges, and subject to all the liabilities of a natural-born subject.

The judge shall, if required, certify on the letters of naturalization that the oath has been taken, which certificate shall be evidence of its contents.

New South Wales.

11 Vict. No. 39, 1848.

Callaghan's Statutes of New South Wales, vol. ii. p. 1830.

The same as the English Act of 1844, mutatis mutandis.

The Governor to grant the certificates.

Section 4 disables from being a member of the Executive or Legislative Councils.

The rights and capacities conferred by the certificate limited to "within the said colony."

Naturalized aliens who shall have resided in the colony for three years, being otherwise qualified, are entitled to vote at elections, and, after five years residence, to be elected members of the Assembly.

New Zealand.

Colonization Circular, 1868.

The Colonial Act (30 Vict. No. 17, 1866) is the same as the English Act mutatis mutandis, with the following additional provisions.

Persons resident in the colony who have been naturalized in the United Kingdom, or in any British colony on the continents of Australia (including Tasmania), Africa, or America, may if the Governor thinks fit, be naturalized in New Zealand on exhibiting the certificate of naturalization and stating in their memorials that such certificate has been obtained without fraud or intentional false statement, and that the signature and seal, if any, thereto are genuine.

The Colonial Secretary is to enrol all letters of naturalization and a certified copy of every such certificate, and shall be entitled to a fee of 1*l.* from every person to whom the letters are granted, and shall cause indices to be made to such letters and certificates which shall be open for inspection or copying on payment of a fee of 1*s.* for each inspection.

The penalty for false statements in the memorial is the avoidance of the letters of naturalization (except against bonâ fide purchasers for valuable consideration) in addition to the penalties of perjury. All pre-existing rights are saved, whether of aliens or natural-born subjects.

Nova Scotia.

Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, 2nd series, p. 153.

After one year's residence, and on taking the oath of allegiance, the alien was entitled to all the rights and privileges of a British subject within the province, under the Colonial Act of 1858, (Title 8, c. 43).

By the Dominion Act, however, (c. 66, 1868,) the Canadian naturalization law was extended to Nova Scotia. (See Canada.)

Prince Edward's Island.

Naturalization Law, April 17, 1862.

Laws of Prince Edward Island, vol. ii. p. 567.

After seven year's residence, and on taking the following oath, the alien is entitled to "all the "privileges of a natural-born subject of Her "Majesty":—

OATH.

"I, A.B., of do swear that I "have resided seven years in this island, without "having during that time been a stated resident in "any foreign country, and that I will be faithful "and bear true allegiance to the Sovereign of "Great Britain and Ireland, and of this island as "dependent thereon. So help me GOD."

It is somewhat remarkable that the period of seven years, required by the Act of Geo. 2., and which the Americans complained against as excessive in the Declaration of Independence, should be purposely retained to this day in Prince Edward's Island.

Queensland.

Queensland Act, 31 Vict. December 28, 1867.

A Colonial Act passed in 1867 contains the same clauses as the English Act with regard to the possession of leasehold property by aliens and the rights of aliens descended from British mothers, with the following additional provisions:—

1. Any alien, native of a friendly European or North American state can become naturalized on taking an oath of allegiance.

2. No Asiatic or African alien to be naturalized unless he has resided in the colonies for three years, and is married, and his wife resident in the colonies at the time of his naturalization.

Asiatic and African aliens only to be naturalized on obtaining a certificate from the Governor, subject to such reservations as he may think fit to insert in such certificate.

Such aliens disqualified from being members of the Executive or Legislative Council or Legislative Assemby.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE.

"I, A. B., do sincerely promise and swear that "I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her "Majesty Queen Victoria as lawful Sovereign of "the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ire-"land and of the colony of Queensland, dependent "and belonging to the said United Kingdom, and "that I will defend Her to the utmost of my power "against all traitorous conspiracies and attempts "whatsoever, which shall be made against Her "person, crown, and dignity; and that I will do "my utmost endeavour to make known to Her "Majesty, Her heirs and successors, all treasons "and traitorous conspiracies and attempts which I "shall know to be against Her or any of them. So "help me GOD."

The fees under this Act are remarkably small, viz.: oath, 1*s.*; filing record, 1*s.*; certificate, 2*s.* 6*d.*; so that any white alien can be naturalized for 4*s.* 6*d.*

St. Kitts and Anguila.

Colonization Circular, 1868.

By a Local Act, No. 127, passed on 3d February 1857, all domiciled or resident liberated Africans are to be deemed to be natural-born subjects, and capable of holding and conveying real and personal estate. The children, wherever born, of a mother a natural-born subject are made capable of taking real or personal estate by purchase or descent; and wives of natural-born or naturalized subjects are to be deemed to be naturalized.

Aliens, subjects of a friendly state, may acquire and hold either real or personal estate as effectually as natural-born subjects, but they are not thereby made capable of becoming members of the Council or of the Assembly, nor of voting at the election of members of the Assembly.

Sierra Leone.

Ditto

By the Imperial Act 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 86. (20 Aug. 1853), liberated Africans domiciled or resident in Sierra Leone are to be deemed within the colony to be natural-born subjects as from the date of their arrival, and to be capable of holding and transmitting any estate, real or personal, within the colony. Power is given to the local legislature to alter or repeal any of the provisions of the Act so far as they relate to the right to real property.

Liberated Africans are also to be considered as British subjects for the purposes of treaties with native chiefs.

South Australia.

olonization rcular, 1868. By the Colonial Amending and Consolidating Act, No. 5 of 1864, every person born of a mother who is a natural-born or naturalized subject is capable of holding real or personal estate.

Friendly aliens may hold every description of property whether real or personal.

A certificate of naturalization may be applied for by any alien and upon receipt of such application, countersigned by a justice of the peace, the Governor, if he think fit, shall direct the applicant to take the oath of allegiance before one of the judges of the Superior Court, and, on such oath being taken, he shall issue letters of naturalization. The fee for obtaining the certificate in duplicate is 1*l.* 1*s.*

The effect of this certificate is to vest all the rights and privileges of a natural-born British subject in such naturalized alien.

A subsequent Act, 23 & 24 Vict., No. 20, provides that aliens who obtain certificates of naturalization in any British colony or possession may obtain the privileges of naturalization in South Australia on lodging with the Registrar General of the colony their original certificates of naturalization, together with a true copy thereof. The original is then returned with an endorsement that the alien had made the declaration and taken the oath of allegiance prescribed by the Act.

The fee for this process is fixed at 10*s.* 6*d.*

Tasmania.

Ditto. By a Colonial Act, 25 Vict., No. 2, passed in November 1861, repealing 5 Will. 4., No. 4, the Governor in Council is empowered, on the presentation of a memorial, stating particulars, to issue a certificate granting all the rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject within the colony, such certificate to be enrolled in the Supreme Court, and an oath of allegiance to be taken before a judge or commissioner of the Supreme Court (within 60 days from the date of the certificate), who will grant a certificate of the taking and subscribing the oath. The cost of the whole process is 6*s.*

Trinidad.

Ditto. In this island a special ordinance of naturalization is required on each occasion, to obtain which the alien must present a petition to the Governor. When the ordinance has been passed, and the alien has taken the oath of allegiance before the Governor, he becomes entitled, within the limits of the colony, to all the privileges of a natural-born subject.

The taking of the oath is to be immediately certified by the Governor, and the certificate is to be recorded in the Registrar General's office.

These ordinances are reserved for Her Majesty's pleasure, and do not take effect until it has been signified.

Turk's Island and Caicos Island.

Ditto. By the Colonial Act, No. 1, Vict. c. 4, passed 22d March 1848, aliens become naturalized upon taking the oath of allegiance and obtaining a certificate from the President in Council, under the great seal of the colony, that the oath has been taken. The certificate is obtainable on presentation to the President of a memorial setting forth the grounds on which the privileges of naturalization are sought, and when obtained it must be recorded in the office of the Public Secretary and Registrar of Records. The fees are to be regulated by the President in Council.

By ordinance No. 8, of 1857, (passed 17th October 1857, and confirmed 13th February 1858,) aliens may hold lands, salt ponds, &c. (except salt ponds at Turk's Island), on lease not exceeding 21 years, which lease may be renewed at the end of the term.

Victoria.

The Colonial Act, 28 Vict., No. 256, which came into operation on the 1st of June 1865, and is called "The Alien's Statute, 1865," repeals the previous Acts, 24 Vict., No. 112, and 26 Vict., No. 166. It provides that alien friends resident in the colony may inherit, acquire, hold, and dispose of every description of property, whether real or personal, in the same manner as natural-born subjects of the Crown; and all dispositions of property made before the passing of this Act to or by such aliens are declared to be valid. The Governor may, if he thinks fit, grant under the seal of the colony letters of naturalization to resident alien friends, provided they be of good repute and take the oath of allegiance to the British Crown. But they are rendered incapable of being members of the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. Colonization Circular, 1868.

To obtain naturalization, the alien is to present a memorial to the Governor, signed by himself, and verified on oath, stating his name, age, birthplace, occupation, length of his residence in the colony, and his desire to settle therein. The memorial must be accompanied by a certificate, signed by a warden, police magistrate, or justice of the peace, that the applicant is known to him, and is a person of good repute.

If the application be favourably entertained, the alien must take the oath of allegiance before a judge of the Supreme Court, or of a county court, or court of mines, or police magistrate, and, on production of a certificate from the judge or magistrate to that effect, the Governor in Council issues the letters of naturalization; they, and a certified copy of the certificate, are then to be recorded by the Chief Secretary, for which a fee of 1*l.* is to be paid.

The penalty for false statements in the memorial is the avoidance of the letters of naturalization (except against purchasers for valuable considerations) superadded to the penalties of perjury.

The alien wives of natural-born or naturalized subjects are to be deemed naturalized.

Persons resident in Victoria who have been naturalized in the United Kingdom, or in any British colony in Australia (including Tasmania and New Zealand), Africa, or America, may, if the Governor thinks fit, be naturalized in Victoria on exhibiting the certificate of naturalization, and stating in their memorials that such certificate has been obtained without fraud or intentional false statement, and that the signature and seal, if any, thereto, are, to the best of their belief, genuine.

Western Australia.

Aliens can become naturalized by local ordinance, which is introduced on their own application, and on payment of 5*l.* for expenses of preparing the bill. The ordinance does not become law until it has received the confirmation of the Crown. Ditto.

Naturalized aliens may hold lands and enjoy all the rights within the colony of a natural-born subject, except the right of holding any place or office of trust in the courts of law or connected with the treasury.

Regulations respecting the issue of Passports to Aliens naturalized in the Colonies.

In the case of Mr. Schloss, it was decided by Mr. Addington in 1852 that persons naturalized in the Colonies were entitled to passports in the same manner as persons naturalized in Great Britain; and this seems to have been the subsequent practice of the Foreign Office. Foreign Office Memorandum, May 15, 1852.

In 1863, however, a Circular was issued to Her Majesty's Representatives and Consuls, stating Circular, July 21, 1863.

"That the mere fact of a foreigner having been "naturalized in a British Colony does not entitle "such foreigner to British protection out of the "Colony in which the certificate of naturalization "may have been granted, nor does it entitle him "to claim a British passport."

The Colonial Office sent a similar Circular to the Governors of British Colonies.

Colonial Office, June 12, 1865.

In 1865 remonstrances were received from Canada against the operation of this rule, by which naturalized Canadians were precluded from obtaining passports, while passports were freely granted by the United States Government to naturalized Americans.

Law Officers, March 10, 1865.

The opinion of the Law Officers having been taken a short time previously, who were of opinion that a foreigner duly naturalized in a British Colony is entitled, as a subject of the Queen in that Colony, to the protection of the British Government in every other State but that in which he was born, and to which he owes a natural allegiance, it was arranged that Foreign Office passports should be granted to persons naturalized in the Colonies, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, but limited to six months, as in the case of persons naturalized in Great Britain.

Circular, May 21, 1866.

Provision was likewise made for the renewal of these passports by Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Agents abroad for such a period as would enable the bearer to reach England, or one of Her Majesty's other possessions, and for the same protection to be afforded to naturalized Colonials as to other naturalized British subjects.

The period for which these passports are granted has recently been extended to twelve months.

The following are the instructions given by the Colonial Office to the Governors of Colonies on this subject:

Rules and Regulations for Her Majesty's Colonial Service, 1867, p. 100.

"404. Governors are authorized to issue Passports for foreign travel to persons naturalized in the Colonies. The form of Passport, and a Memorandum to accompany it relative to the renewal of the Passport or its exchange for a Foreign Office Passport, are inserted in the Appendix. These Passports must be signed by the Officer administering the Government, and must contain an express declaration that the person receiving it is naturalized as a British subject, stating the period for which it is available, which must not exceed twelve months from the date of issue."

"Form of Passport.

"This Passport is granted to A.B., naturalized as a British subject of , to enable him to travel in foreign parts, and is available for the period of months, from the day of , 18

"(Signed) C.D.
"Governor (or otherwise as the case may be) of the Colony of ."

"Memorandum.

"The Passport accompanying this Memorandum may, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, be exchanged in London for a Foreign Office Passport, available for the un-expired portion of the period for which it was originally granted.

"It can be renewed only at the Foreign Office in London, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but it may be exchanged, if run out, at any of Her Majesty's Missions or Consulates in foreign countries, for a Passport strictly limited to such length of time as will enable the bearer to reach England or any of Her Majesty's possessions abroad. Such limited renewal may be effected once, and once only, by a British Minister or Consul in foreign ports. The Passport confers on the bearer no claim to British protection in the country of his birth."

Naturalization in India.

Act No. XXX. of 1852, Passed by the Governor-General of India in Council on the 16th of July 1852.

This Act is substantially the same as the English Act but with some slight additional reservations.

The certificate to be issued by the Government.

VI. If any material statement in the Memorial presented by the alien be false, the Government may cancel the certificate either wholly or in part.

VIII. The naturalized alien on taking the oath to be deemed a natural-born subject of Her Majesty as if he had been born within the said territories, and to be entitled, within the said territories, to all the rights, &c., of a subject of Her Majesty born therein.

Oath.

I, A.B., of , do swear (or affirm) that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the Sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of those Territories as dependent thereon, and that I will be true and faithful to the East India Company.

(Signed) A.B.

So much of this Act as relates to the East India Company is now, of course, obsolete, but it does not appear that any Act has been substituted for it.

It seems that recourse is rarely had to it, at all events in some of the Presidencies, as Sir Henry Anderson, Secretary to the Judicial Department of the India Office, and who served for some time in India, says that he only recollects one case, that of a German, named Bubb, an advertising hatter at Calcutta.

EXPATRIATION.

Expatriation, in the sense of divestment of allegiance, is not recognized by the English law, (see the Chief Baron's ruling in the Warren case Addenda F).

"Blackstone's Commentaries," vol. i. p. 369.

"Allegiance, both expressed and implied, is however distinguished by the law into two sorts or species, the one natural, the other local; the former being also perpetual, the latter temporary. Natural allegiance is such as is due from all men born within the Sovereign's dominions immediately upon their birth. For, immediately upon their birth, they are under the protection of the Crown: at a time too when (during their infancy), they are incapable of protecting themselves. Natural allegiance is therefore a debt of gratitude, which cannot be forfeited, cancelled, or altered by any change of time, place, or circumstance, nor anything but the united concurrence of legislature, that is, of course, not the legislature of the adopted state, but the legislature of the state where the individual in question was born. An Englishman who removes to France or to China owes the same allegiance to the King of England there as at home, and 20 years hence as well as now, for it is a principle of universal law that the natural-born subject of one Prince cannot by any act of his own, no, not by swearing allegiance to another, put off or discharge his natural allegiance to the former, nemo potest exuere patriam; for this natural allegiance was intrinsic and primitive and antecedent to the other, and cannot be divested without the concurrent act of that Prince to whom it was due. Indeed the natural-born subject of one Prince, to whom he owes allegiance, may be entangled by subjecting himself absolutely to another, but it is his own act that brings him into these straits and difficulties, of owing service to two masters, and it is unreasonable that, by such voluntary act of his own, he should be able at pleasure to unloose those bands by which he is connected to his natural Prince . . . . . "

"Blackstone's Commentaries," vol. i. p. 370.

"Local allegiance is such as is due from an alien or stranger born, for so long a time as he continues within the King's dominion and protection, and it ceases the instant such stranger transfers himself from this kingdom to another. Natural allegiance is perpetual, local allegiance is only temporary, and for this reason, evidently founded upon the nature of government, that allegiance is a debt due from the subject upon an implied contract with the Prince, that so long as the one affords protection, so long will the other demean himself faithfully. As therefore the Prince is always under a constant tie to protect his natural-born subjects at all times and in all countries, for this reason their allegiance due to him is equally universal and permanent. But on the other hand, as the Prince affords his protection to an alien only during his residence in this realm, the allegiance of an alien is confined in point of time, to the duration of such his residence, and in point of locality to the dominions of the British Empire."

Chitty's Commercial Law," vol. i. p. 118.

The extent to which the doctrine of natural allegiance could be carried is shown by a rather curious case quoted by Chitty :—

" The father of Joseph Celt and his wife who was enceinte, inhabiting Calais when it was taken by the French, fled into Flanders, and there the woman was delivered of the said Joseph, and it was adjudged that he shall be entitled to the privileges of a natural-born British subject, under the Act 25 Edward III. because the parents were born in Calais, and he himself was begotten there, though born in Flanders."

bid. p. 112.

However, Lord Coke states that " the time of his birth is of the essence of a subject born," so that it is unnecessary to go back beyond that period to decide a subject's allegiance.

bid. p. 130.

But though a natural-born subject cannot voluntarily emancipate himself from his natural allegiance so as to exempt himself from the duties incident thereto, yet he may by his violation of the law, forfeit many of the advantages of a natural-born subject, and place himself in the situation of an alien. Thus it was enacted, that if an English subject go beyond the seas, and there become a sworn subject to any foreign Prince or State, he shall, during his residence abroad, pay such impositions as aliens do, with a proviso, that if he returns and lives here he shall be restored to his liberties and privileges (14 and 15 Henry VIII. cap. 4), and a more recent statute provided, that if any artificer or manufacturer of Great Britain should go into a foreign State, and there exercise or teach his art to foreigners, and should not return within six months after warning from the British Minister or Ambassador, he should be deemed an alien (5 Geo. I. cap. 27).

By the Act 26 Geo. III. cap. 60, sec. 8, " No " subject of His Majesty whose usual residence is " in any country not under the dominion of His " Majesty, shall be deemed or entitled during the " time he shall continue so to reside, to be the " owner, in whole or in part of any British ship " authorized to be registered by that Act, unless he " be a member of some British factory, or agent for " or partner in any house or co-partnership actually " carrying on trade in Great Britain and Ireland."

' Abbott on the Law of Merchant Ships and Seamen," 7th edition, by Shee, cap. ii. p. 67.

" Under that statute it was held* that an occasional residence for the purpose of obtaining a colourable qualification would not give a title ; that no person was entitled who had not his usual residence in Great Britain or in the dominions belonging to the Crown, unless he was within some of the exceptions ; that if a man went to another country and there had a more usual residence than in this, he was no longer entitled to the same privileges, and that a person who was continually shifting his residence between the British dominions and the American States so as not to have what, under any extension, could be deemed an usual residence in the British dominions, did not come within the description of the statute."

* By Lord Stowell, in the case of the "Eleanor Hall," 1 Edwards, 135.

A question having been raised whether a British subject, admitted a burgher of Memel, could be considered as a Prussian for the purposes of the Navigation Act, so as to be master of a Prussian vessel it was decided by the Law Officers, as stated in an Order of the Board of Customs, dated the 9th August, 1816, that though a native British subject could not throw off his allegiance, yet he could by domicil in a foreign country, so incorporate himself therewith as to be regarded as an alien for commercial purposes.

" Chitty's Commercial Law," vol. i. p. 189.

But, where a Scotchman had been admitted a burgher of Stockholm, Sir Philip Yorke held that he could not be considered as a Swede in Great Britain, as he still continued a British mariner entitled to navigate a British vessel.

Ibid. p. 123.

See also the case of the " Ann." (Addenda G.)

On the other hand, in the case of Wilson and Marryatt, it was decided that a natural-born subject of England having been admitted a denizen of the United States of America, was entitled as such denizen to the benefit of the Treaty between England and the United States, which authorized the trade of Americans to the Territories of the British East India Company ; although as an English subject he would not have been permitted to carry on such a commerce.

" Abbott on the Law of Merchant Ships and Seamen," 7th edition, by Shee, cap. ii. p. 66.

By 3 and 4 Wm. IV. cap. 55. sec. 513, " The " owners must be subjects of Great Britain. No " foreigner may directly or indirectly have any part " or share in the ship. No person may be an owner " of any ship authorized to be registered, who has " taken the oath of allegiance to any foreign State, " except under the terms of some capitulation, un- " less he shall afterwards become a denizen or " naturalized subject of the United Kingdom, nor " any person not usually residing in any country " not under the dominion of His Majesty, unless he " be a member of some British factory, or agent for " or partner in a house or co-partnership actually " carrying on trade in Great Britain or Ireland."

The Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (10th of August 1854), contains the following clause :

" Description and Ownership of British Ships.

" 18. No ship shall be deemed to be a British ship unless she belongs wholly to owners of the following description ; that is to say,

" (1.) Natural-born British subjects :

" Provided that no natural-born subject who has taken the oath of allegiance to any foreign Sovereign or State shall be entitled to be such owner as aforesaid unless he has, subsequently to taking such last-mentioned oath, taken the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty, and is and continues to be during the whole period of his so being an owner resident in some place within Her Majesty's dominions, or if not so resident, member of a British factory, or partner in a house actually carrying on business in the United Kingdom or in some other place within Her Majesty's dominions.

" (2.) Persons made denizens by letters of denization, or naturalized by or pursuant to any Act of the Imperial Legislature, or by or pursuant to any Act or Ordinance of the proper legislative authority in any British Possession :

" Provided that such persons are and continue to be during the whole period of their so being owners resident in some place within Her Majesty's dominions, or if not so resident, members of a British factory, or partners in a house actually carrying on business in the United Kingdom or in some other place within Her Majesty's dominions, and have taken the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty subsequently to the period of their being so made denizens or naturalized.

" (3.) Bodies corporate established under, subject to the laws of, and having their principal place of business in the United Kingdom or some British Possession."

This section of the Act is still in force.

Case of Æneas Macdonald.

This case has been so frequently referred to that it may be useful to give a brief account of it.

State Trials, Vol. xviii. p. 867.

"Æneas Macdonald was tried at the Court of King's Bench in 1747 before Lord Chief Justice Lee, for having been concerned in the rebellion of 1745. He pleaded that he was an alien, born in France, and had acted under a French commission, thereby entitling him to the privileges of the cartel between England and France for the exchange or ransom of prisoners.

"His counsel, however, apprehending that the weight of the evidence might be against them, as indeed it was, with regard to the place of the prisoner's birth, endeavoured to captivate the jury and bystanders by representing the great hardship of a prosecution of this kind against a person, who, admitting him to be a native of Great Britain, had received his education from his early infancy in France, and had spent his riper years in a profitable employment in that kingdom where all his hopes centered. And speaking of the doctrine of natural allegiance, they represented it as a slavish principle, not likely to prevail in these times. The court declared that it never was doubted that a subject born, taking a commission from a foreign Prince and committing high treason may be punished as a subject for that treason, notwithstanding his foreign commission. It is not in the power of any private subject to shake off his allegiance and to transfer it to a foreign Prince. Nor is it in the power of any foreign Prince by naturalizing or employing a subject of Great Britain to dissolve the bond of allegiance between that subject and the Crown."

The chief justice directed the jury that the only fact they had to try was whether Macdonald was a native of Great Britain, as the overt acts laid to his charge had been admitted by his counsel.

The jury found him guilty, but recommended him to mercy. He received sentence of death as in cases of high treason; but was afterwards pardoned on condition of his retiring out of the King's dominions and continuing abroad during his life.

Brakendridge's Miscellanies, p. 409, quoted in Mr. Caleb Cushing's opinion, Addenda A. p.

The leniency shown to him contrasts favourably with the treatment of Elijah Clark, a native of the United States, who was hung by the Americans as a traitor and spy in 1812, though he also set up the defence that he was an alien, having been domiciled in Canada.

PART II.—Laws of the United States.

Naturalization.

Tucker's "History of the United States," Vol i, pp. 652-658.

The Constitution of the United States, adopted on the 17th of September 1787, provides:—

"Article I, Section 8. The Congress shall have power . . . to establish an uniform rule of naturalization.

"Section 2. No person shall be a representative who shall not have . . . been seven years a citizen of the United States.

"Section 3. No person shall be a senator who shall not . . . have been nine years a citizen of the United States.

"Article II, Section 1. No person, except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall be eligible to the office of president.

"Article IV, Section 2. The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Wheaton's "Elements." Edition 1863. Note by Mr. Lawrence on Naturalization and Expatriation. Appendix pp. 900-901.

There have been several Acts of Congress enabling aliens to become naturalized.

The Act of March 26, 1790, required two years' residence in the United States: one year to have been passed within the State to whose Court of Record application for naturalization was made; the applicant to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

The Act of January 29, 1795, required a preliminary declaration of intention to become a citizen, a renunciation of all foreign allegiance three years before admission, and a residence at the time of admission of five years within the United States, and of one year within the State.

By the Act of June 18, 1798, no alien could become a citizen unless he had declared his intention five years before his admission, and proved a residence of fourteen years in the United States, and five years in the State where he applied.

Lawrence's note, p. 901. "Government and Laws of the United States," by Professor W. Wedgwood, LL.D., New York, 1866, p. 413.

By the Act of April 14, 1802, "and which is the law now applicable in ordinary cases,—

"Any alien, being a free white person, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States or any of them on the following conditions:

"1. That he shall have declared on oath or affirmation, before the supreme, superior, district, or circuit court of some one of the States or of the territorial districts of the United States, or a circuit or district court of the United States, three years at least before his admission, that it was bonâ fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce for ever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof such aliens may, at the time, be a citizen or subject.

"United States Statutes at Large" Vol. ii. p. 153. Seventh Congress, Sess i, chap 28. "An Act to establish an Uniform Rule of Naturalization and to repeal the Acts heretofore passed on that subject."

"2. That he shall, at the time of his application to be admitted, declare on oath or affirmation, before some one of the courts as aforesaid, that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof he was before a citizen or subject; which proceedings shall be recorded by the clerk of the court.

Addenda B. p. 85.

"3. That the court admitting such alien shall be satisfied that he has resided within the United States five years at least, and within the state or territory where such court is at the time held, one year at least; and it shall further appear to their satisfaction that during that time he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same, provided that the oath of the applicant shall in no case be allowed to prove his residence."

"4. That he shall renounce any title of nobility."

The Act further provides:

1. For saving existing rights.
2. For the registration of persons naturalized.
3. For Courts of Record.
4. Minor children of persons naturalized to be citizens if dwelling in the United States at the time of their father's naturalization.

"5. Children of citizens born out of the limits of the United States to be citizens, provided that the right of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers have never resided within the United States."

6. No person proscribed or convicted of having joined the army of Great Britain during the late war to be admitted a citizen without the consent of his State Legislature.

7. Treatment of alien enemies resident within the United States.

By an Act of March 26, 1804, the widow and children of an alien who had declared his intention to became naturalized, become citizens upon taking the oaths prescribed by law.

atutes at ge." Vol. ii. 09. Twelfth gress, Sess. ap 42.

The Act of the 3rd of March 1813, for the regulation of seamen, which was passed with a view to the then existing war with England, provided (Section 12) that no person should be admitted as a citizen who had not resided within the United State for a continuous period of five years previous to his admission. This clause was repealed by an Act of June 26, 1848.

i. Vol. ix. 40. hteenth gress, Sess. i, . 186.

The Act, May 26, 1824, provides for the naturalization of minors, and further enacts that "a "declaration by any alien, being a free white "person, of his intended application to be admitted "a citizen of the United States made in the manner "and form specified in the first section of the Act "to which this is in addition, two years before his "admission, shall be a sufficient compliance with "said condition; anything in the said Act, or in any "subsequent Act, to the contrary notwithstanding.

irty-seventh ngress, Sess. ii, . 200. tatutes at ge," Vol. xii. 594.

An Army Act of the 17th of July 1862, contains the following clause, which deserves attention at the present time:—

"Section 21. And be it further enacted that any alien of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has enlisted or shall enlist in the armies of the United States, either the regular or the volunteer forces, and has been or shall be hereafter honourably discharged, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States upon his petition, without any previous declaration of his intention, to become a citizen of the United States, and that he shall not be required to prove more than one year's residence within the United States previous to his application to become such citizen; and that the Court admitting such alien shall, in addition to such proof of residence and good moral character as is now provided by law, be satisfied by competent proof of such person having been honourably discharged from the service of the United States as aforesaid."

ddenda E. p. 87.

Attorney-General Bates, in a report dated the 29th of November 1862, thus explains the law of the United States with regard to the children of American citizens born in foreign countries:—

"In the United States it is too late now to deny "the political rights and obligations conferred and "imposed by nativity; for our laws do not pre- "tend to create or enact them, but do assume and "recognize them as things known to all men, "because pre-existent and natural; and therefore "things of which the laws must take cognizance. "Acting on this guiding thought, our constitution "does no more than grant to Congress (rather "than to any other department) the power to "'establish a uniform rule of naturalization.' "And our laws made in pursuance thereof indue "the made citizen with all the rights and obliga- "tions of a natural citizen. And so strongly was "Congress impressed with the great legal fact that "the child takes its political status in the nation "where it is born, that it was found necessary to "pass a law to prevent the alienage of children of "our known fellow-citizens who happen to be "born in foreign countries. The Act of February "10, 1855, 10 Statutes, 604, provides that "'persons,' (not white persons) 'heretofore "'born, and hereafter to be born, out of the "'limits and jurisdiction of the United States, "'whose fathers were or shall be at the time of "'their birth, citizens of the United States, shall "'be deemed and considered and are hereby "'declared to be citizens of the United States: "'Provided, however, That the rights of citizen- "'ship shall not descend to persons whose fathers "'never resided in the United States.'"

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, "That any "woman who might lawfully be naturalized under "the existing laws, married, or who shall be "married to a citizen of the United States, shall "be deemed and taken to be a citizen."

"But for that Act, children of our citizens who "happen to be born at London, Paris, or Rome, "while their parents are there on a private visit "of pleasure or business, might be brought to the "native home of their parents, only to find that "they themselves were aliens in their father's "country, incapable of inheriting their father's "land, and with no right to demand the protection "of their father's government."

"That is the law of birth at the common law of "England, clear and unqualified; and now, both "in England and America, modified only by "Statutes, made from time to time, to meet "emergencies as they arise."

Expatriation.

It will have been seen that the Acts of Congress, here cited, deal only with the naturalization of aliens within the territory of the United States.

"There is no provision of Federal law which defines citizenship, and none which expressly forbids, or expressly authorizes, the expatriation of citizens of the United States." "Opinions of Attorneys-General of the United States," Vol. viii. p. 139.

The omission on the part of the Statutes of the United States to make provision for the voluntary relinquishment of allegiance by citizens is, of course, of considerable importance in regard to the pretensions which have been put forward by the Executive Government of that country to an absolute right of protection over naturalized aliens, even when within the country of their birth.

The question is dealt with at length in a Report drawn up by Mr. Caleb Cushing, Attorney-General of the United States, dated October 31, 1856.

This Report discusses the doctrines of allegiance and expatriation, reviews the cases bearing upon them which have been brought before the Supreme and District Courts, and cites the opinions of the principal legal authorities of the United States.

[As this report is the State Paper to which constant reference is made by Lawrence, Dana, and other subsequent writers, and is also of great interest, a copy of it is appended to this memorandum.] Addenda A.

Mr. Cushing thus sums up the views of the Supreme Court and its members:—

"Here . . . . the matter stands, unadjudicated as decision, but not undetermined as opinion. After carefully reviewing the whole subject, Chancellor Kent pronounces the better opinion to be, that a citizen cannot renounce his allegiance to the United States without permission of the Government to be declared by law (Commentaries, Vol. ii. p. 49). It is a significant fact, at all events, that, on so many occasions where the question presented itself, not one of the Judges of the Supreme Court has affirmed, while others have emphatically denied the unlimited right of expatriation from the United States."

Mr. Lawrence, in the Appendix to his edition of Wheaton of 1863, gives a valuable note, or rather essay, upon "Naturalization and Expatriation," in which he embodies the greater part of Mr. Cushing's report.

In this note Mr. Lawrence quotes, as an argument in support of the necessity for legislation on this subject in England and the United States, the following passage from Sir Travers Twiss' "Rights and duties of Nations in times of Peace": "Law of Nations," Vol. i. p. 281. Edition 1861.

"Natural allegiance, or the obligation of perpetual obedience to the Government of the country, wherein a man may happen to have been born, which he cannot forfeit or cancel, or vary by any change of time or place, or circumstance, is the creature of Civil Law and finds no countenance in the Law of Nations, as it is in direct conflict with the incontestable rule of that law, 'Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur.'"

State Citizenship.

Besides the rights of national citizenship conferred by naturalization, there is a minor form of state-citizenship.

Mr. Cushing's Opinion, p. 140.

"The conditions of citizenship in the United States and of any one of the States are not identical; that is to say, it may happen that by the laws of a given State, a person shall be a citizen thereof and still not be a citizen of the United States. Nor does it follow, because he is a citizen of a given State by the very letter of its laws, that, therefore, he is of every or any other State. Persons may be, and in fact are, citizens of the State of Massachusetts, that is, invested with all the rights, political and municipal, which its institutions can bestow, without being citizens of the State of Virginia or of the United States."

Mr. Cushing's Opinion.

There are certain material advantages attached to citizenship. "Many ordinary municipal rights "are, by other laws, capable of being enjoyed by "citizens alone: such as the ownership of mer- "chant ships, the command and in part the man- "ning of such ships, and the purchase of public "lands by pre-emption. To this may be added, "that in many of the States the right to own land "within the same is, by their laws, restricted to "citizens of the United States."

By the Laws of New York, no person can hold a civil office, or vote at elections, who is not a citizen of that State.

"Manual of the Naturalization Laws," by a United State Lawyer, published at Baltimore, 1855, p. 60. (Lent by Mr. Wilkins, Her Majesty's Consul at Chicago,)

The right of voting at elections is restricted to national citizens in Alabama, Arkansas, Connecticut, California, Iowa, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Maine, Ohio, Rhode Island, Tennessee, and Utah.

In Indiana and Wisconsin aliens who have declared their intention to be naturalized are admitted as electors.

In the other States all State citizens are voters.

The term of residence required varies from six months to two years, and in some States there is a property qualification.

Most emigrants therefore get themselves constituted citizens of the States in which they settle as soon as they can.

The conditions on which State-citizenship is conferred vary greatly in the different States. In the more populous States the admission is restricted by regulations of greater or less severity, while in some of the Western States, and States where the capital and labour of emigrants are eagerly welcomed, the terms on which citizenship is granted are made as easy as possible. The result is, that aliens are often in the anomalous position of being citizens of a State for some time before they can become citizens of the United States.

During the late civil war all persons who had voted as State citizens were claimed by the United States' Government as liable to the conscription; and the Act of Congress of the 3rd of March 1863, expressly declared that the levy should include "all persons of foreign birth who shall have "declared on oath their intention to become "citizens."

Many of the persons thus forced into the army appealed to Her Majesty's Minister for protection, pleading that, as by the Constitution of the United States they were not citizens of that country, they must still be British subjects, and, as such, entitled to exemption from military service.

In order to explain the correspondence which ensued, as well as the difficulty which has occasionally arisen in other ways from this double citizenship, it has been necessary to notice it at some length, though in regard to international relations it would otherwise have no more importance than the Italian cittadinanza or any other system of territorial division for municipal or electoral purposes.

"Manual of Naturalization

It may be interesting to add that it is stated that in 1855 upwards of 2,500 names appeared in the Statute Books of New York State, of aliens authorized by Acts of the State Legislature to purchase and hold real property. "Among them "those of John Jacob Astor, Thomas Addis Emmet, "and others of note and eminence. These Acts "generally provided that the lands should escheat "if the said alien, if alive, was not within a limited "period naturalized." By the laws of New York, provision is made for persons to hold real property who have declared their intention of becoming naturalized.

Compiled from the Census of t United States, 1860, pages 620 621, 622, 623.

According to the Census of 1860, out of a total free population in the United States of 27,489,561, 4,136,175 were of foreign birth.

Birth-place:
England - - -	431,692
Ireland - - -	1,611,304
Scotland - - -	108,518
Wales - - -	45,763
Australia - - -	1,419
British America - -	249,970
British, not specified -	1,802
	2,450,468

Total Germany, 1,301,136; of which Prussia, 227,661; Germany not specified, 598,382; France, 109,870.

Compiled fro the Census of the United States, 1860, p xxix.

The increase of population during the 10 years 1850-60, coming from Great Britain and Ireland, amounted to 858,267, of which Ireland furnished 649,585. During the same 10 years, the number of residents of foreign birth was nearly doubled, rising from 2,210,839 to 4,136,175; the total free population, in 1850, having been 19,987,571.

PART III.—Laws of other Countries.

FRANCE.

Code Napoléon: "Code Civil," liv. i. c. i.

The provisions of the Code Napoléon, March 8, 1803, are as follows:—

"Chapitre I.—De la jouissance des Droits Civils.

"7. L'exercice des droits civils est indépendant de la qualité de citoyen, laquelle ne s'acquiert et ne se conserve que conformément à la loi constitutionnelle.

"8. Tout Français jouira des droits civils.

"9. Tout individu né en France d'un étranger pourra, dans l'année qui suivra l'époque de sa majorité, réclamer la qualité de Francais; pourvu que, dans le cas où il residerait en France, il déclare que son intention est d'y fixer son domicile, et que dans le cas où il résiderait en pays étranger, il fasse sa soumission de fixer en France son domicile, et qu'il l'y établisse dans l'année, à compter de l'acte de soumission.

"10. Tout enfant né d'un Français en pays étranger est Français. Tout enfant né en pays étranger d'un Français qui aurait perdu la qualité de Français pourra toujours recouvrer cette qualité en remplissant les formalités prescrites par l'Article 9.

"11. L'étranger jouira en France des mêmes droits civils que ceux qui sont ou seront accordés aux Français par les Traités de la nation à laquelle cet étranger appartiendra.

"12. L'étrangère qui aura épousé un Français suivra la condition de son mari.

"13. L'étranger qui aura été admis par l'autorisation du Roi à établir son domicile en France y jouira de tous les droits civils tant qu'il continuera d'y résider.

"14. L'étranger, même non résidant en France, pourra être cité devant les tribunaux Français, pour l'exécution des obligations par lui contractées en France avec un Français; il pourra être traduit devant les tribunaux de France, pour les obligations par lui contractées en pays étranger envers des Français.

"15. Un Français pourra être traduit devant un tribunal de France pour des obligations par lui contractées en pays étranger, même avec un étranger.

"16. En toutes matières, autres que celles de commerce, l'étranger qui sera demandeur sera tenu de donner caution pour le paiement des frais et dommages-intérêts résultant du procès, à moins qu'il ne possède en France des immeubles d'une valeur suffisante pour assurer ce paiement.

"Chapitre II.—De la Privation des Droits Civils.

"Section I.—De la Privation des Droits Civils par la Perte de la Qualité de Français.

"17. La qualité de Français se perdra, 1°, par la naturalisation acquise en pays étranger; 2°, par l'acceptation, non autorisée par le Roi, de fonctions publiques conférées par un Gouvernement étranger; 3°, enfin, par tout établissement fait en pays étranger, sans esprit de retour. Les établissements de commerce ne pourront jamais être considérés comme ayant été faits sans esprit de retour.

"18. Le Français qui aura perdu sa qualité de Français pourra toujours la recouvrer, en rentrant en France avec l'autorisation du Roi, et en déclarant qu'il veut s'y fixer et qu'il renonce à toute distinction contraire à la loi Française.

"19. Une femme Française qui épousera un étranger suivra la condition de son mari. Si elle devient veuve, elle recouvrera la qualité de Française, pourvu qu'elle réside en France, ou qu'elle y rentre avec l'autorisation du Roi, et en déclarant qu'elle veut s'y fixer.

"20. Les individus qui recouvreront la qualité de Français, dans les cas prévus par les Articles 10, 18, et 19, ne pourront s'en prévaloir qu'après avoir rempli les conditions qui leur sont imposées par ces Articles, et seulement pour l'exercice des droits ouverts à leur profit depuis cette époque.

"21. Le Français qui, sans autorisation du Roi, prendrait du service militaire chez l'étranger, ou s'affilierait à une corporation militaire étrangère, perdra sa qualité de Français. Il ne pourra rentrer en France qu'avec la permission du Roi, et recouvrer la qualité de Français qu'en remplissant les conditions imposées à l'étranger pour devenir citoyen; le tout sans préjudice des peines prononcées par la loi criminelle contre les Français qui ont porté ou porteront les armes contre leur patrie."

Naturalization of Frenchmen Abroad.

An Imperial Decree of 1811 imposes severe penalties upon Frenchmen naturalized abroad without permission from their own Government.

It is a question whether this Decree is still in force, but it appears to have been acted upon in 1834; and it is referred to in an official communication from the French Government in 1859.

At all events it has never been formally abrogated, and its existence in the French Statute Book must be borne in mind when the liberality of the French law in recognizing expatriation is extolled.

The other disabilities mentioned in it having been abolished, the only penalty enacted by this Decree which could now be enforced is that of the 75th Article of the Penal Code: "Tout Français qui "aura porté les armes contre la France sera puni "de mort."

Les Cinq Codes: "Code Pénal," liv. iii. article 75.

Imperial Decree of the 26th of August 1811.

"Bulletin des Lois," vol. xlvii. p. 183.

"Titre I.—Des Français naturalisés en Pays Etranger avec notre autorisation.

"Article 1. Aucun Français ne peut être naturalisé en pays étranger sans notre autorisation.

"Art. 2. Notre autorisation sera accordée par des Lettres-Patentes dressées par notre Grand-Juge, signées de notre main, contre-signées par notre Ministre Secrétaire d'Etat, visées par notre cousin le Prince Archichancelier, insérées au Bulletiu des Lois, et enregistrées en la Cour Impériale du dernier domicile de celui qu'elles concernent.

"Art. 3. Les Français naturalisés ainsi en pays etranger jouiront du droit de posséder, de transmettre des propriétés, et de succéder, quand même les sujets du pays où ils seront naturalisés ne jouiraient pas de ces droits en France.

"Art. 4. Les enfants d'un Français naturalisé en pays étranger et qui sont nés dans ce pays sont étrangers.

"Ils pourront recouvrer la qualité de Français en remplissant les formalités prescrites par les Articles 9 et 10 du Code Napoléon.

"Néanmoins ils recueilleront les successions et exerceront tous les droits qui seront ouverts à leur profit pendant leur minorité, et dans les dix ans qui suivront leur majorité accomplie.

"Art. 5. Les Français naturalisés en pays étranger, même avec notre autorisation, ne pourront jamais porter les armes contre la France, sous peine d'être traduits devant nos cours et condamnés aux peines portées au Code Pénal, livre iii, Articles 75 et suivants.

"TITRE II.—Des Français naturalisés en Pays Etranger sans notre autorisation.

"Art. 6. Tout Français naturalisé en pays étranger sans notre autorisation encourra la perte de ses biens, qui seront confisqués : il n'aura plus le droit de succéder ; et toutes les successions qui viendront à lui échoir, passeront à celui qui est appelé après lui à les recueillir, pourvu qu'il soit régnicole.

"Art. 7. Il sera constaté par-devant la cour du dernier domicile du prévenu, à la diligence de notre Procureur-Général ou sur la requête de la partie civile intéressée, que l'individu s'étant fait naturaliser en pays étranger, sans notre autorisation, a perdu ses droits civils en France ; et en conséquence, la succession ouverte à son profit sera adjugée à qui de droit.

"Art. 8. Les individus dont la naturalisation en pays étranger sans notre autorisation aurait été constatée, ainsi qu'il est dit en l'Article précédent, et qui auraient reçu distinctement, ou par transmission, des titres institués par le Sénatus-Consulte du 14 Août, 1806, en seront déchus.

"Art. 9. Ces titres et les biens y attachés seront dévolus à la personne restée Française, appelée selon les lois, sauf les droits de la femme, qui seront réglés comme en cas de viduité.

"Art. 10. Si les individus mentionnés en l'Article 8 avaient reçu l'un de nos ordres, ils seront biffés des registres et états, et défenses leur seront faites d'en porter la décoration.

"Art. 11. Ceux qui étaient naturalisés en pays étranger, et contre lesquels il aura été procédé comme il est dit aux Articles 6 et 7 ci-dessus, s'ils sont trouvés sur le territoire de l'Empire, seront, pour la première fois, arrêtés et reconduits au-delà des frontières : en cas de récidive, ils seront poursuivis devant nos cours, et condamnés à être détenus pendant un temps qui ne pourra être moindre d'une année, ni excéder dix ans.

"Art. 12. Ils ne pourront être relevés des déchéances et affranchis des peines ci-dessus que par des lettres de relief accordées par nous en Conseil Privé, comme les lettres de grâce.

"Art. 13. Tout individu naturalisé en pays étranger sans notre autorisation, qui porterait les armes contre la France, sera puni conformément à l'Article 75 du Code Pénal."

The ninth Article of the Code Napoléon was modified by a Law of 1851 :—

"29–29 Janvier et 7 Février, 1851 (10e série, No. 2,730) (Article 9, C. N.)—Loi concernant les individus nés en France d'étrangers qui eux-mêmes y sont nés, et les enfants des étrangers naturalisés.

"Article 1. Est Français tout individu né en France d'un étranger qui lui-même y est né à moins que, dans l'année qui suivra l'époque de sa majorité, telle qu'elle est fixée par la loi Française, il ne réclame la qualité d'étranger par une déclaration faite, soit devant l'autorité municipale du lieu de sa résidence, soit devant les Agents Diplomatiques ou Consulaires accrédités en France par le Gouvernement étranger.

"2. L'Article 9 du Code Civil est applicable aux enfants de l'étranger naturalisé, quoique nés en pays étranger, s'ils étaient mineurs lors de la naturalisation. A l'égard des enfants nés en France ou à l'étranger, qui étaient majeurs à cette même époque, l'Article 9 du Code Civil leur est applicable dans l'année qui suivra celle de la dite naturalisation."

By the Law on the Army of 1831 (21st March, 1832), "Nul ne sera admis à servir dans les troupes Françaises s'il n'est Français."

This provision has led to much correspondence between France and other Powers, more especially the United States, respecting the right to exemption from the conscription, on their return to France, of Frenchmen naturalized abroad.

In 1859 M. Walewski furnished the American Chargé d'Affaires with an authoritative declaration of the views of the French Government on this point:

"Sir, Paris, November 25, 1859.

"I HAVE the honour to communicate to you the reply of the Government of the Emperor to the questions which the deceased Mr. Mason had put to him in his letter of the 27th July last, relative to Frenchmen emigrants to the United States who have there obtained letters of naturalization.

"After having set forth the principles of the American law in the matter of naturalization, Mr. Mason reduced his inquiry to a formula, as follows :—

"First Question.—Does the French legislation recognize in individuals, French by birth, the right to cause themselves to be naturalized as subjects or citizens of a foreign country, without preliminary authorization from the Government ?

"French legislation does not confer on a Frenchman the right to renounce his nationality, but he loses it by positive law (Article 7, Code Napoléon) through naturalization in a foreign country.

"That naturalization, by the terms of the Decree of August 26, 1811, may have grave consequences, provided for by that Decree, when it has not been authorized by the Government.

"Even in cases in which such authorization has been accorded, it effectively disperses the prejudicial results of an unauthorized naturalization, but expressly maintains the loss of nationality.

"Second Question.—Are Frenchmen by birth, but naturalized citizens of the United States, who return to France without having the intention to recover their nationality nor to establish themselves permanently, subject to the law of conscription ?

"The law of conscription imposes on every Frenchman the obligation of military service. It attaches to the fulfilment of this obligation a penal sanction.

"Therefore, the Frenchman who, before he had lost that quality, shall have emigrated, thus placing himself out of the way of the obligation of military service would assuredly be punishable on his return to France, even although he should have obtained a foreign naturalization, and he may be prosecuted, whether as refractory (Article 230 du Nouveau Code Militaire, Loi du Juin, 1859), or as a deserter (Articles 235, 236, 237, of same date).

"This, moreover, is recognized by the Government of the United States, as it is a sequence from the letter of Mr. Mason, that it refuses its protection to the Frenchman become a stranger, in the two cases following :

"1. If the obligation of military service be anterior to the epoch of emigration.

"2. If, before his emigration, the Frenchman had not satisfied the law of conscription. The question becomes more difficult when it treats of a man born abroad of French parents, and who, consequently, by the provisions of Article 10 of Code Napoléon, is himself a Frenchman, and bound to military service, in conformity with Article 6 of the Law of March 21, 1832.

"But if, in France, the quality of citizen is now actually acquired by parentage, yet, for a long time, nativity alone conferred it, and it may still be so in the United States. In such a case it would be hard to subject to French law an individual who should have fulfilled similar obligations towards the country in which he was born.

"Third Question.—Does the French law of conscription render the Frenchman born and resident in a foreign country subject to military service in the same degree as if he had not left the country of his birth, or as if he had not caused himself to be naturalized as a foreigner ?

"This question is disposed of by the solution which the Federal Government itself admits to the second.

"United States Senate Documents," 1859–60 vol. xi. p. 214.

"If, in effect, the Frenchman, before emigrating and causing himself to be naturalized in a foreign country, has not satisfied the obligation of military service, evidently he may be prosecuted in France, in case of his return, even though the return should be only accidental. Besides, he might, during his absence, have been sentenced for contumacy, and his presence in France would impose, as well on the public authority as himself, the duty of clearing off this contumacy.

"Such are the solutions which the three questions that the Legation of the United States has presented to me can receive. It is difficult, however, to treat them theoretically, without knowledge of the circumstances which may have given birth to them, which often are of a nature to draw out modifications of the application of strict law.

"I will add that all the points treated in the present despatch present veritable questions of State, upon which the Government of the Emperor can only express opinions, but the solutions belong exclusively to the Courts.

"Receive, &c.,

"WALEWSKI.

"Mr. Calhoun, Chargé d'Affaires of the "United States at Paris."

It will be seen from M. Walewski's note that he considered that a Frenchman naturalized abroad was liable to the law of conscription on his return to France; but a case occurred in 1860 in which it was decided by a civil tribunal that naturalization in a foreign country exempted a Frenchman from the conscription.

The case, that of M. Zeiter, is frequently referred to in the correspondence, and is of importance as establishing a principle of French law.

It has never been published, but a copy has now been procured from Wissembourg, where the Judgment was delivered, and is printed in the Addenda (F).

These conscription cases are ordinarily dealt with by the local military tribunals (Conseils de Guerre), and there does not seem to have been any other instance of a recent decision on the subject by a Civil Court, nor does this Provincial Judgment appear to have been revised by a Superior Court.

Lord Lyons has been good enough to procure a report from M. Treitt, the Counsel to the Paris Embassy, upon the general question of the status in France of Frenchmen naturalized abroad, with reference especially to their liability to the conscription.

As this report gives a full explanation of the French Law and of the practice of the French Government, it is here inserted at length:—

"A Son Excellence Lord Lyons, Ambassadeur de Sa Majesté Brittanique à Paris.

"My Lord, "Paris, le 26 Janvier 1868.

"Votre Excellence m'a demandé la copie d'un jugement rendu par le Tribunal Français de Wissembourg, en faveur de Michel Zeiter, né citoyen Français. Le jugement est cité par Laurence dans ses Notes sur Wheaton (édition de 1863) comme ayant déchargé Michel Zeiter de toutes les obligations qu'un Français doit à sa patrie, entre autres l'obligation du service militaire. Le motif de cette décision serait que Zeiter avait été naturalisé citoyen des Etats-Unis.

"Il est ajouté que ce jugement semble être une des rares décisions (si ce n'est la seule) où un Tribunal ait reconnu que la naturalisation d'un individu dans un pays étranger suffisait pour effacer les droits souverains de la mère-patrie et les obligations qu'il y a contractées par sa naissance.

"Par suite d'observations que j'eus l'honneur d'adresser à votre Excellence elle ma signalé une note que M. le Comte Walewski, Ministre des Affaires Etrangères en France, a adressée à M. Calhoun, Ministre Américain, à la date du 25 Novembre 1859, note qui a été publiée en 1860 parmi les documents distribués au Congrés des Etats-Unis.

"Dans cette note M. Walewski n'admet point qu'un citoyen Français puisse, par le seul fait de sa naturalisation à l'étranger, s'exonérer des obligations que lui imposent les lois de sa patrie, et se soustraire, entre autres charges, au service militaire. Dans ce dernier cas, dit le Ministre, ce Français réfractoire encourt les peines du Code Militaire (Article 230) relatives à l'insoumission. De plus, M. de Ministre Walewski vise le Décret Impérial du 26 Août, 1811, lequel applique des peines sévères aux Français qui se sont fait naturaliser étrangers sans l'autorisation du Gouvernement.

"Enfin votre Excellence a bien voulu encore me signaler le cas d'un nommé Alibert, insoumis de la classe de 1839, lequel a été, le 10 Octobre 1852, condamné à un mois de prison pour insoumission par le Conseil de Guerre de Marseille.

"Mais il a fait appel de cette sentence devant le Conseil de Revision de Toulon, et là, avec l'assistance du Consul Américain, il a excipé de sa naturalisation aux Etats-Unis, et il a été acquitté.

"En résumé votre Excellence m'a posé la question suivante:—

"'Quelle est la loi qui régit le Français qui s'est fait naturaliser étranger, après son retour en France?'

"La question est simple, mais la réponse sera nécessairement complexe.

"Voici d'abord la copie du jugement du Tribunal de Wissembourg, en date du 2 Juin 1860. [Vide Addenda F.]

"Comme on le voit, ce jugement constate uniquement que Zeiter a perdu la qualité de Français; la conséquence légale de cette constatation est qu'il ne peut pas servir dans les troupes Françaises; mais le jugement n'avait pas à se préoccuper des pénalités et des incapacités civiles que Zeiter pouvait avoir encourues, comme nous le verrons plus loin; cette décision est fondée en droit, comme plusieurs autres rendues par différents tribunaux dans des cas analogues, surtout depuis la guerre du Nord et du Sud, à cause de laquelle, bien des Français, naturalisés Américains, sont revenus en France.

"La naturalisation d'un Français, à l'étranger, quelle que soit cette nouvelle patrie, entraîne pour lui la perte de la qualité de Français, et celle-ci entraîne ipso facto l'incapacité pour le service militaire. C'est là aussi le cas Alibert; il aura justifié de sa qualité d'Américain, et aura été acquitté de la peine de l'insoumission, qui est de un mois à une année d'emprisonnement d'après l'Article 38 de la Loi de 1832 concernant l'armée. Cas Alibert.

"Les deux cas ci-dessus ne sont rapportés dans aucun recueil de jurisprudence: mais ils ne sont pas les seuls; il y en a une dizaine au Bureau de la Justice Militaire au Ministère de la Guerre.

"L'autorité militaire en France voit avec regret la facilité qu'ont les jeunes gens de s'exonérer du service militaire par une naturalisation à l'étranger, acquise depuis plus de trois ans. Jurisprudence du Ministère de la Guerre.

"Voici comment le Ministre de la Guerre procède aujourd'hui en cette matière.

"Quand un insoumis lui est signalé, il le traduit devant un Conseil de Guerre, car un insoumis est un soldat qui n'a pas rejoint son drapeau.

"Si l'insoumis excipe de sa naturalisation en pays étranger, le Conseil de Guerre surseoit à l'application de la peine et accorde au prévenu un délai pour faire constater par les tribunaux civils sa qualité d'étranger.

"S'il obtient un jugement déclarant qu'il a perdu sa qualité de Français, le Conseil de Guerre l'acquitte, mais seulement quand sa naturalisation est antérieure à trois années; sinon les juges lui appliquent la peine de l'insoumission: en effet, l'insoumission est un délit successif, c'est-à-dire, Prescription du délit d'insoumission.

qu'il ne peut se prescrire (se pardonner) par aucun laps de temps, qu'il dure aussi longtemps que l'insoumission elle-même, et ne finit que quand l'insoumission cesse. Or, la jurisprudence des Conseils de Guerre est que l'insoumission cesse le jour de la naturalisation en pays étranger. Dès ce jour, la prescription court contre le délit d'insoumission ; alors ce délit, comme tous les autres délits, se prescrit par trois ans, et l'insoumis dont la naturalisation remonte à plus de trois ans n'encourt plus aucune peine. Si, au contraire, la naturalisation n'a pas trois années de date, l'ex-Français est traité comme un insoumis et puni lors même qu'il serait citoyen d'un autre pays, quelqu'il soit.

"Ainsi pour échapper à la peine de l'insoumission, l'ex-Français est obligé de passer au moins trois années loin de la France ; s'il revient avant ce délai, il risque que les Conseils de Guerre lui appliquent une peine de un mois à un an de prison, car il est encore en état d'insoumission.

Libération de l'insoumis.

"Il ne faut pas oublier de dire que quand, dans ce cas, l'insoumis a fait sa peine, il est libre, et sa qualité d'étranger empêche qu'il soit incorporé dans l'armée Française.

"Telles sont les regles que suit le Bureau de la Justice Militaire au Ministère de la Guerre.

Garde Nationale.

"Les choses se passent à peu près de même pour la garde nationale. Là il existe des Conseils de Recensement.

"Ces Conseils ont pour mission de statuer sur les motifs d'exemption des citoyens qui refusent le service.

"Or, il arrive souvent (et cela est à ma connaissance personnelle) que des Français, appelés au service de la garde nationale, ont opposé des lettres de naturalisation Américaine ou autre; en présence d'un pareil document ces individus ont été déclarés exempts du service à cause de leur extranéité. Du reste, un avis du Conseil d'Etat du 18 Novembre, 1842 (affaire Vignié), a consacré cette jurisprudence.

"De toutes les observations qui précèdent que conclure ? C'est que le Français peut, en se faisant naturaliser à l'étranger, se soustraire aux obligations que lui impose la mère-patrie.

"Cette conséquence découle du droit commun et du droit exceptionnel.

Droit commun.

"En effet l'Article 17 du Code Civil dit en termes formels que la qualité de Français se perd par la naturalisation acquise en pays étranger. Il résulte des discussions du Législature de 1803, que le mot acquise s'appliquait à un acte d'expresse volonté, accompli selon les formes légales de la nouvelle patrie, et ayant pour but de renoncer proprio motu à la qualité de Français. (Locré, "Esprit du Code Civil," vol. 1er, page 333.)

"Le Code Civil permet donc aux Français d'acquérir une nationalité étrangère. C'est, en effet, un principe inhérent à la liberté humaine, un principe de droit naturel, qu'un individu puisse quitter le sol sur lequel l'a jeté le hasard de sa naissance. Ce principe est admis par tous les publicistes depuis Cicéron* jusqu'à nos jours. Les lois Françaises en contiennent maintes fois l'énonciation. Cependant en Prusse la naturalisation à l'étranger est soumise, dit-on, à l'autorisation préalable du Gouvernement. (Code Prussien, Article 2, livre 17, § 127.)

"Mais en France, d'après le Code Civil, qui est le droit commun, le droit de se faire naturaliser à l'étranger est absolu.

Droit exception.

"Le 26 Août 1811, l'Empereur Napoléon I promulgua un Décret relatif à la naturalisation des Français à l'étranger.

"L'Article 1 de ce Décret est ainsi conçu :

"'Aucun Français ne peut être naturalisé en pays étranger, sans notre autorisation.'

"Les Articles suivants mentionnent les droits civils dont les Français naturalisés en pays étranger avec autorisation continueront de jouir en France.

"Puis l'Article 6 s'exprime ainsi :—

"Article 6. 'Tout Français naturalisé en pays étranger sans notre autorisation encourra la perte de ses biens, qui seront confisqués ; il n'aura plus le droit de succéder, et toutes les successions qui viendront à lui échoir passeront à celui qui est appelé à les recueillir après lui, pourvu qu'il soit régnicole.'

"Enfin l'Article 11 donne au Gouvernement la faculté d'expulser de la France le Français naturalisé en pays étranger sans autorisation ; et en cas de retour sur le territoire de l'empire une seconde fois, il peut être condamné à une peine de une à dix années d'emprisonnement.

"Ce Décret a été, dit-on, inspiré à Napoléon I par le ressentiment qu'il éprouvait de voir chez les nations ennemies et dans les armées étrangères des Français rebelles à l'empire. C'est ainsi qu'on explique la sévérité de ce Décret, qui a été l'objet des plus vives attaques. D'abord on lui a reproché d'être inconstitutionnel, parcequ'il a été fait et promulgué sans le concours du Corps Législatif, contrairement aux Constitutions Impériales; aussi, depuis la chûte du premier empire, plusieurs écrivains ont soutenu que ce Décret est tombé en désuétude. Il y a même des actes du Gouvernement de la Restauration qui ont annulé des jugements rendus en vertu de ce Décret. (Arrêts du Conseil d'Etat du 19 Juin 1814, insérés au Bulletin des Lois.)

"Cependant un plus grand nombre d'auteurs ont écrit que ce Décret avait encore force de loi, par le motif qu'il n'avait jamais été attaqué et annulé comme inconstitutionnel par le Corps Legislatif. De plus, de nombreux arrêts ont jugé que les Décrets Impériaux promulgués et exécutés comme lois du temps de l'Empire sont restés en vigueur dans toutes leurs dispositions qui n'ont pas été abrogées par des lois postérieures. En effet, le Décret de 1811 a été appliqué dans des cas de succession de Français qui s'étaient fait naturaliser à l'étranger sans autorisation.*

"Mais ce Décret n'en est pas moins une violation de la loi naturelle, en frappant de peines sévères la naturalisation à l'étranger, alors que tout les publicistes proclament le droit qu'a tout homme de changer de patrie.

"Aujourd'hui ce Décret est paralysé dans son application ; en effet, la confiscation des biens a été abolie par la Charte de 1814. Puis est venue la Loi de 1819 (14 Juillet), qui place, quant aux biens et aux successions, tous les étrangers dans les mêmes droits que les Français, sans distinction entre les étrangers d'origine et les étrangers par naturalisation. Un arrêt solemnel de la Cour de Paris a jugé que ce Décret n'est plus applicable au droit de succéder.†

"Les annales de la jurisprudence ne fournissent depuis plus de vingt ans pas un seul cas où, soit le Gouvernement, soit des parties intéressées dans des successions, aient provoqué l'application du Décret de 1811. Je crois que si le cas se présentait, les Cours hésiteraient beaucoup avant d'appliquer les dispositions si rigoureuses de cette législation exceptionnelle.

"Mais que d'incertitudes en cette matière, si importante puis qu'elle touche au status personnel!

"Remarquons cependant que le Décret du 26 Août 1811 (qu'il soit encore en vigueur ou qu'il soit tombé en désuétude) n'annule pas les naturalisations à l'étranger sans autorisation ; il les punit, mais il les laisse subsister. Le Français a donc une

* Ciceron, "Oratio pro Cornelio Balbo," c. 13 ; Grotius, lib. ii. et v. § 24; Puffendorff, lib. viii. c. 11. § 2; Merlin, "Répertoire Général," verbo "Souveraineté," § 4; Wolf, 76 partie, p. 187 ; "Constitution Française de Frimaire, An 8," dans son Article 4 ; Toullier, "Code Civil," tome i. No. 266; &c.

* Voyez, entre autres, un Arrêt de la Cour de Pau, de 19 Mars 1834. "Collection des Arrêts de Dalloz," Année 1835, 2me Partie, p. 38.

† Arrêt du 1 Février, 1836. "Collection des Arrêts de Dalloz" Année 1836, 2e partie, p. 71.

nouvelle patrie, à laquelle il a été obligé de prêter serment. Personne ne peut avoir deux patries.* L'intérêt général des nations exige qu'on n'ait pas deux patries.†

"La patrie d'adoption efface la mère-patrie; dans mon opinion, l'ex-Français est dégagé de ses obligations envers cette dernière. Le Gouvernement Anglais en délivrant des lettres de naturalisation aux étrangers, les avertit en même temps qu'il n'entend point les dégager de leurs obligations envers leur mère-patrie.

"C'est là un acte de prudence. Mais la loi Française est muette sur les droits qu'elle retient contre les individus qui se font naturaliser au dehors sans autorisation. Elle les assimile aux étrangers quant aux droits civils. La loi Française rompt ainsi elle-même tous les liens qui rattachent un ex-Français à la mère-patrie. En dehors de la confiscation des biens et de la déchéance du droit de succéder en France—pénalités de 1811, aujourd'hui inapplicables et inappliquées—la loi n'impose à l'ex-Français que l'obligation de ne jamais porter les armes contre la France, sous peine de mort.‡

"Le Français qui renonce à sa qualité sait les droits dont il sera privé en France. Les tribunaux peuvent lui refuser leur justice dans ses débats avec des étrangers. S'il est plaignant ou demandeur, il peut être soumis à la caution judicatum solvi. Il ne jouit plus d'aucun droit politique ou municipal. Il est incapable de fonctions publiques et de l'exercice de certaines professions; enfin, pour abréger cette nomenclature, il peut être expulsé du territoire Français, comme tous autres étrangers, par simple mesure de police.§

"Le Français a du calculer les inconvénients et les avantages de sa naturalisation à l'étranger. Il est exonéré des charges imposés par la mère-patrie.

"Cet état des choses est fâcheux; ainsi, pour se faire naturaliser Suisse, il suffit d'un an de séjour dans le pays et du paiement de quelques francs. C'est une grande facilité donnée aux jeunes Français que veulent échapper à la loi militaire. Ce point mériterait l'attention du législateur Français, mais en ce moment il faut prendre la loi telle qu'elle est, et dire que la naturalisation à l'étranger dégage le Français de ses obligations envers la France. Les jugements des tribunaux ne font que constater l'extranéité; les conséquences de l'extranéité découlent des lois elles-mêmes; l'une de ces conséquences est l'exonération du service militaire.

"Je crois avoir ainsi répondu en tous points à la question que votre Excellence m'a posée; je l'ai dégagée de toutes les questions accessoires que la perte de la qualité de Français fait surgir, mais qui auraient obscurci la matière. En résumé, je suis amené à conclure que La France n'impose à l'ex-Français d'autre obligation que de ne pas porter les armes contre elle.

"Je me permets d'ajouter que cette conclusion choque mon sentiment intime; je regrette de voir une simple naturalisation à l'étranger anéantir toutes les obligations que l'on doit à la mère-patrie. Mais les questions de droit ne se résolvent pas avec le sentiment seulement; c'est avec la loi telle qu'elle est et non telle qu'elle devrait être.

"Agréez, &c.
(Signé) "TREITT,
"Avocat à la Cour Impériale,
"Conseil à l'Ambassade Anglaise.
"Paris le 26 Janvier, 1868."

Naturalization of Aliens in France.

Sir R. Phillimore, "International Law," vol. i. p. 350.

Under the old law of France, the Dutch and Swiss and other nations had, by virtue of Treaties, the rights of natives (indigenatûs); and by the Bourbon Family Compact of 1761, a similar privilege was conceded to Spanish subjects.

Fœlix, "Droit International Privé," Edition Demangeat, 1856, tom. i. s. 11. Mr. Ward and Mr. McGregor's evidence before the Alien Committee.

The Law of May 2, 1790, provided—

"Tous ceux qui, nés hors du royaume de parents étrangers, sont établis en France, seront réputés Français et admis, en prêtant le serment civique, à l'exercice des droits de citoyen actif, après cinq ans de domicile continue dans le royaume, s'ils ont, en outre, acquit des immeubles, ou épousé une Française, ou formé un établissement de commerce, ou reçu dans quelque ville des lettres de bourgeoisie."

The Constitution of the 3rd of September 1791, "permet au pouvoir législatif de délivrer à un "étranger, pour des considérations importantes, un "acte de naturalisation, á la charge seulement de "la résidence et du serment."

Thus was established the system of "grande et petite naturalisation," which, with various modifications, has continued in force up to the accession of the present Emperor.

The Constitution of 1793 did away with the oath, and declared French citizens all aliens aged 21 who had been domiciled in France for one year, and who lived by labour.

The Constitution of 1795 abrogated that of 1793, and made it a condition of naturalization that an alien should have previously declared his intention to domicile himself in France.

By the terms of the 3rd Article of the Constitution of 1801, "un étranger devient citoyen Français "lorsque, après avoir atteint l'âge de 21 ans ac- "complis, et avoir déclaré l'intention de se fixer "en France, il y a résidé pendant dix ans consécu- "tives."

By a Decree of the Senate of 1804, confirmed by a Decree of the 17th of February 1808, the Government was authorized to confer the quality of French citizen, after one year's residence, on any alien who had rendered important services to France, thus reviving the "grande naturalisation" of 1790, but without requiring an oath.

By an Ordinance of the 4th of June 1814, Article 1, "conformément aux anciennes Consti- "tutions Francaises, aucun étranger ne pourra "siéger, à compter de ce jour, ni dans la Chambre "des Pairs ni dans celle des Députés, à moins que, "par l'importants services rendus á l'Etat, il n'ait "obtenu de nous (du Roi) des lettres de naturali- "sation vérifiés par les deux Chambres."

The privilege of "grande naturalisation" has been conferred on Benjamin Constant, and other distinguished foreigners.

These laws were consolidated by the Law of the 3rd of December 1849.

"Bulletin des Lois," vol. clxvii. p. 545.

"Article 1. Le Président de la République statuera sur les demandes en naturalization.

"La naturalization ne pourra être accordée qu'après enquête faite par le Gouvernement relativement à la moralité de l'étranger, et sur l'avis favorable du Conseil d'Etat.

"L'étranger devra, en outre, réunir les deux conditions suivantes:—

"1. D'avoir, après l'âge de vingt et un ans accomplis, obtenu l'autorisation d'établir son domicile en France, conformément à l'Article 13 du Code Civil.

"2. D'avoir résidé pendant dix ans en France depuis cette autorisation.

"L'étranger naturalisé ne jouira du droit d'éligibilité à l'Assemblée Nationale qu'en vertu d'une loi.

"2. Néanmoins, le délai de dix ans pourra être réduit à une année en faveur des étrangers qui auront rendu à la France des services importants, ou qui auront apporté en France, soit une industrie, soit des inventions utiles, soit des talents distingués, ou qui auront formé de grands établissements.

"3. Tant que la naturalisation n'aura pas été prononcée, l'autorisation accordée à l'étranger d'établir son domicile en France pourra toujours

* "Exposé des Motifs du Premier Titre du Code Civil." 1803.

† "Répertoire Général de Merlin," verbo 'Loi,' § 6.

‡ "Article 75 du Code Pénal; et Article 11 du Décret du 26 Aout, 1811; Articles 21 et 22 du Code Civil.

§ Article 13, Loi du 3 Décembre 1849, sur les etrangers.

être révoquée ou modifiée par décision du Gouvernement, qui devra prendre l'avis du Conseil d'Etat.

"4. Les dispositions de la loi du 14 Octobre 1814, concernant les habitants des Départements réunis à la France ne pourront plus être appliquées à l'avenir.

"5. Les dispositions qui précèdent ne portent aucune atteinte aux droits d'éligibilité à l'Assemblée Nationale acquis aux étrangers naturalisés, avant la promulgation de la présente Loi.

"6. L'étranger qui aurait fait, avant la promulgation de la présente Loi, la déclaration prescrite par l'Article 3 de la Constitution de l'an VIII, pourra, après une résidence de dix années, obtenir la naturalisation suivant la forme indiquée par l'Article 1.

"7. Le Ministre de l'Intérieur pourra, par mesure de police, enjoindre à tout étranger voyageant ou résidant en France, de sortir immédiatement du territoire Français, et le faire conduire à la frontière.

"Il aura le même droit à l'égard de l'étranger qui aura obtenu l'autorisation d'établir son domicile en France; mais après un delai de deux mois, la mesure cessera d'avoir effet, si l'autorisation n'a pas été révoquée suivant la forme indiquée dans l'Article 3.

"Dans les Départements frontières, le Préfet aura le même droit à l'égard de l'étranger non résidant, à la charge d'en référer immédiatement au Ministre de l'Intérieur.

"8. Tout étranger qui se serait soustrait à l'exécution des mesures énoncées dans l'Article précédent ou dans l'Article 272 du Code Pénal, ou qui, après être sortis de France par suite de ces mesures, y serait rentré sans la permission du Gouvernement, sera traduit devant les tribunaux et condamné à un emprisonnement d'un mois à six mois.

"Après l'expiration de sa peine, il sera conduit à la frontière.

"Les peines prononcées par la présente Loi pourront être réduites conformément aux dispositions de l'Article 463 du Code Pénal."

On the 29th of June 1867 a law was passed reducing the term of residence required from 10 to three years:—

"Art. 1. Les Articles 1 et 2 de la Loi du 3 Décembre 1849, sont remplacés par les disposition suivantes:

"Art. 1. L'étranger qui, après l'âge de vingt et un ans accomplis, a, conformément à l'Article 13 du Code Napoléon, obtenu l'autorisation d'établir son domicile en France, et y a résidé pendant trois années, peut être admis à jouir de tous les droits de citoyen Français.

"Les trois années courront à partir du jour où la demande d'autorisation aura été enregistrée au Ministère de la Justice.

"Est assimilé à la résidence en France le séjour en pays étranger pour l'exercice d'une fonction conférée par le Gouvernement Français.

"Il est statué sur la demande en naturalisation, après enquête sur la moralité de l'étranger, par un décret de l'Empereur, rendu sur le rapport du Ministre de la Justice, le Conseil d'Etat entendu.

"Art. 2. Le délai de trois ans, fixé par l'Article précédent, pourra être réduit à une seule année en faveur des étrangers qui auront rendu à la France des services importants, qui auront introduit en France soit une industrie, soit des inventions utiles, qui y auront apporté des talents distingués, qui y auront formé de grands établissements ou créé de grandes exploitations agricoles.

"Art. 2. L'Article 5 de la Loi du 3 Décembre, 1849, est abrogé."

It will be seen, therefore, that there are two forms of naturalisation in France,

"La grande naturalisation,"* which confers the privilege of sitting in the Chambers, and which corresponds in some measure to the former English form of special naturalization by Act of Parliament repealing the disabilities of previous Acts in favour of a particular person, as was done in the case of Prince Albert, and to the present naturalization by Act of Parliament, as in the Bischoffsheim case.

"La petite naturalisation" corresponds with our naturalization by certificate from the Secretary of State, and is granted by lettres de déclaration de naturalité to aliens who have complied with the conditions of the law. The alien is supposed to have resided in France with the permission of the Government, from the fact of his name and domicile having been registered with the Ministry of the Interior, as required by the Police Regulations from all residents.

"Aliens Committee," p. 30. Mr. McGregor.

Debate in Corps Législatif on the Army Bill, December 1867.

In the recent discussion on the law for the reorganization of the army, M. des Rotours proposed the following amendment to the first clause of the Bill:—

Lord Lyons, No. 228; Dec. 31, 1867. "Moniteur," Dec. 31, 1867.

"Les individus nés en France de parents étrangers et y ayant leur résidence seront soumis à la loi du recrutement dans l'année qui suivra leur majorité.

"Ceux d'entre eux qui voudront conserver leur qualité d'étrangers en feront la déclaration et seront admis dans la légion étrangère."

Maréchal Niel, the Minister of War, spoke in favour of the principle of this amendment, and stated that the conscription ought at all events to be extended to the sons born in France of aliens themselves born in France, and who by the Law of 1851 were declared to be Frenchmen, unless they selected the nationality of their fathers on attaining their majority.

Objection was, however, taken to making such an alteration in the laws affecting the nationality of aliens by means of a clause introduced into an Army Bill; and, on M. Baroche, Minister of Justice, undertaking that the matter should receive the careful attention of the Government, M. des Rotours withdrew his amendment.

In Lord Cowley's No. 176; June 22, 1861.

Nombre des sujets Anglais qui ont obtenu de 1851 à 1861 l'autorisation d'établir leur domicile en France, et de ceux qui, pendant la même periode, ont été naturalisés Français.

Années.	Admission à domicile.	Naturalizations.
1851 - -	8	—
1852 - -	6	—
1853 - -	6	1
1854 - -	6	—
1855 - -	5	1
1856 - -	3	—
1857 - -	9	—
1858 - -	24	—
1859 - -	13	—
1860 - -	9	2
1861, Janvier à Avril	3	—
	92	4

(For further information respecting French naturalization, see Fœlix, "Droit International Privé," already cited, and "Revue de Droit Français et Etrangers," par MM. Fœlix, Duvergier,

* M. Dumangeat in his note to M. Fœlix's "Droit International Privé" doubts whether "la grande naturalisation" still exists, as by the Decree of February 2, 1852, all electors are eligible to seats in the Corps Législatif, and the Senate is composed of such citizens as the Emperor may please to select; and he cites Prince Poniatowski as an instance of a citizen naturalized by Imperial Decree and promoted to the Senate without any special law.

&c., vol. xii. p. 321 ; Article, " De la Naturalisation collective et de la perte collective de la qualité de Français," par M. Fœlix, and vol. x. p. 446 ; " Des Effets de la Naturalisation," par M. Fœlix ; and Dictionnaire de Droit," par M. Dalloz, " Naturalisation.")

PRUSSIA.

Naturalization of Aliens in Prussia.

Fœlix, " Droit International Privé," vol. i. p. 98.

" En Prusse, l'étranger acquiert le droit de citoyen par sa nomination à une fonction publique. Aussi la Loi du 31 Décembre 1842, donne aux autorités administratives supérieures (régences) le pouvoir d'accorder la naturalisation à l'étranger qui justifie d'une bonne conduite et de moyens d'existence. La loi excepte seulement les Juifs, les sujets d'un Etat faisant partie de la Confédération Germanique, les mineurs et autres personnes incapables de disposer ; à leur égard, elle contient des dispositions particulières.

" La femme étrangère acquiert le droit de sujet Prussien par son mariage avec un Prussien."

Provision was made by the Constitution of the Germanic Confederation for the reciprocal admission of the subjects of one State to the privileges of citizenship in the other States.

Expatriation.

Extract from the Laws of Prussia, of December 31, 1842, concerning the loss of the quality of a Prussian subject.

§ 15. The quality of a Prussian subject is lost :

1. By discharge upon the subject's request.
2. By sentence of the competent authority.
3. By living 10 years in a foreign country.
4. By the marriage of a female Prussian subject with a foreigner.

§ 16. The discharge has to be asked for from the police authority of the province in which the subject's domicile is situated, and is effected by a document made out by the same authority.

§ 17. The discharge cannot be granted:

(1.) To male subjects who are between seventeen and twenty-five years of age, until they have got a certificate of the military commission of recruitment of their district, proving that their application for discharge is not made merely to avoid the fulfilling of their military duty in the standing army.

(2.) To actual soldiers, belonging either to the standing army or to the reserve ; to officers of the militia and to public functionaries, before their being discharged from service.

(3.) To subjects having formerly served as officers in the standing army or the militia, or having been appointed military employés, with the rank of officers, or civil functionaries, before they have got the consent of their former chief.

(4.) To the persons belonging to the militia, not being officers, after their having been convoked for actual service.

§ 18. To subjects wishing to emigrate into a State of the German Confederacy, the discharge may be refused if they cannot prove that the said state is willing to receive them.—(See Act of the German Confederation, Art. 18, No. 2, lit. A.)

§ 19. For other reasons than those specified in §§ 17 and 18, the discharge cannot be refused in time of peace. For the time of war, special regulations will be made.

§ 20. The document of discharge effects, at the moment of its delivery, the loss of the quality as Prussian subject.

§ 21. If there is no special exception, the discharge comprehends also the wife and the minor children that are still under their father's authority.

§ 22. Subjects living in a foreign country may lose their quality as Prussians by a declaration of the police authority of Prussia, if they do not obey, within the time fixed to them, the express summons for returning to their country.

§ 23. Subjects who either—

(1.) Leave our states without permission, and do not return within 10 years, or—

(2.) Leave our states with permission, but do not return within 10 years after the expiration of the term granted by the said permission, lose their quality as Prussian subjects.

§ 24. Entering into public service in a foreign state.

The entering of a subject into public service in a foreign state is allowed only after his discharge (see § 20) has been granted to him. Anybody who has obtained it, is permitted to do so, without restriction.

§ 25. A subject who—

(1.) Either takes public service in a foreign state with our immediate permission,—

(2.) Or is appointed in our states by a foreign power, in an office established with our permission, as, for instance, that of consul, commercial agent, &c., remaining in his quality as a Prussian.

§ 26. General disposition.

Subjects who emigrate without having obtained their discharge, or violate, by their entering into public service in a foreign state, the disposition of § 24, are to be punished according to the laws existing in that respect.

Given under our hand and seal, Berlin, this 31st of December 1842.

FREDERICK WILLIAM.

(L. S.)

Extract from the Constitution of Prussia of 1850.

TIT. I. Rights of the Prussians.

Art. 1. The right to emigrate cannot be restricted by the state, except with respect to the duty of military service.

See also a memorandum furnished to the United States' Minister at Berlin by the Prussian Government in 1859. (Appendix G.)

AUSTRIA.

Naturalization of Aliens.

In Austria an alien acquires the rights of citizenship by being named a public functionary. The Government can also confer those rights upon an alien who has been previously authorized to exercise a profession, after 10 years' residence. Fœlix, vol. i. p. 98.

No one can exercise any profession in Austria without the permission of the authorities.

Mere admission into the military service does not give the right of naturalization.

The wife of an Austrian becomes an Austrian subject by her marriage.

Expatriation.

Emigration is not permitted without the consent of the proper authorities; but the emigrant who has obtained permission and who quits the empire sine animo revertendi forfeits his privileges as an Austrian subject.

For a fuller account of the Austrian laws, see the Report by the Counsel of the Vienna Embassy.* (Addenda H.)

* This Report was procured by the Hon. H. Wodehouse, 2nd Secretary at Vienna.

BAVARIA.

Naturalization of Aliens.

Naturalization is acquired,—

Fœlix, vol. 1. p. 99. Sir R. Phillimore, vol. 1. p. 352.

1. By the marriage of a foreign woman with a Bavarian;

2. By domicil, on affording proof of having been liberated from personal allegiance to a foreign State;

3. By Royal Decree, under the supervision of the Council of State.

Expatriation.

By naturalization in a foreign country without having previously obtained authorization from the King:

By emigration;

By the marriage of a Bavarian woman with an alien.

WURTEMBERG.

Naturalization.

Fœlix, vol. 1. p. 99.

An alien must belong to a commune in order to have the rights of citizenship, unless he has been named to some public employment.

Expatriation.

The rights of citizenship are lost by emigration under the authority of Government and by accepting foreign service.

NETHERLANDS.

Ibid. p. 100.

The power of conferring naturalization rests with the King. (Articles 9 and 10 of the Constitution of 1815.)

RUSSIA.

Fœlix, vol. 1. p. 100.

An alien becomes naturalized by taking an oath of fidelity to the Emperor; but he can, if he wishes it, renounce his naturalization and return to his native country.

Naturalization Law of the 6th of March 1864.*

Lord Napier, No. 186; March 30, 1864.

(A.)—1. A foreigner must be domiciled in the Empire before he can be admitted as a Russian subject.

2. A foreigner wishing to become domiciled in Russia must inform the Governor of the Province in which he wishes to reside of his desire to do so explaining the nature of his occupation in his own country, and the pursuits he purposes to follow in Russia. On the receipt of such declaration the petitioner is considered to be domiciled in Russia, but will nevertheless be accounted a foreigner until he shall have taken the oath of allegiance.

3. Foreigners already resident in Russia, distinguished in art, trade, commerce, or in any other pursuit, may prove their domiciliation by other means than those specified in § 2.

4. A foreigner, after being domiciled five years in Russia, may apply to be admitted to Russian allegiance.

5. Foreign married women cannot become Russian subjects without their husbands.

6. The allegiance, when sworn to, is merely personal, and does not affect children, whether of age or minors, previously born. Those born after the adoption of Russian nationality are acknowledged as Russians.

7. Specifies rules to be observed in petitioning the Minister of the Interior to be admitted to Russian allegiance (documents and declarations required, &c.)

8. It is optional with the Minister to grant the above petition or not.

9. An oath to be taken.

10. Mode of taking oath.

11. In special cases, the period requisite to constitute a domicile may be shortened.

12. Children of foreigners not Russian subjects, born and educated in Russia, or, if born abroad, yet who have completed their education in a Russian upper or middle school, will be admitted to Russian allegiance, should they desire to do so, a year after they shall have attained their majority.

13. The children of foreigners wishing to become Russian subjects will be admitted on the same terms as their parents.

14. Foreigners in the Russian military or civil service, or ecclesiastics of foreign persuasions, will be admitted to Russian allegiance without period of domicile.

15. A Russian subject marrying a foreign husband, and therefore cousidered a foreigner, may, on the death of her husband, or in case of her divorce, return to her former allegiance.

16. The children in the above case are treated as in § 12.

17. Foreign women marrying Russian subjects, and the wives of foreigners who have become Russian subjects, are admitted as Russian subjects without taking oath of allegiance. Widows and divorced wives retain the nationality of their husbands.

18. Special enactments relative to colonists, foreign agricultural labourers, Bulgarians, &c., remain in full force.

19. Foreigners admitted to Russian nationality are placed, in respect to their rights and obligations, on a perfect equality with born Russians.

20. Provides for the speedy transaction of business in connexion with the adoption of Russian nationality.

(B.)—Transitional Measures.

1. Foreigners who shall have already adopted Russian nationality may return at any time to their former nationality, on payment of all claims against them, whether Government or private.

2. Those who throw off their Russian allegiance may either quit the country, or remain in Russia, enjoying equal rights with other foreigners. They must provide themselves with national passports within a year, if resident in European Russia or belonging to a country in Europe, or within two years, if residing in Siberia, or having to obtain such passports in any other quarter of the globe. On the lapse of those dates, without production of passport, the foreigner must either leave the country or resume his Russian nationality.

3. Exceptions in cases of deserters and Asiatics.

4. Annuls all enactments compelling Russian women married to foreigners to sell their immovable property in Russia, with the exception of certain kinds of property which, as foreigners, they still have no right to possess. With respect to the enactment concerning the payment of three years' dues and export duties by foreigners wishing to leave their Russian nationality, that law is abrogated in respect to those countries which shall adopt a reciprocity in such matters.

(C.) Abrogating law by which a foreigner was obliged to take an oath of allegiance prior to his marriage with a Russian woman, and by which he was required to ask permission of the Emperor to contract marriage with a Russian woman of the orthodox faith.

---

* For a full translation of this Law, see the "Journal de St. Pétersbourg," inclosed in Lord Napier's No. 207, April 13, 1864.

HAMBURGH.

Aliens Committee, p. 59.

Aliens can become naturalized after six months' residence on payment of a small fee.

The law of Hamburgh is said to recognise a double allegiance in persons thus naturalized, and does not require any renunciation of native allegiance.

BELGIUM.

Ibid. p. 53. Letter from Mr. Provost, Swiss Consul.

The law of Belgium is the same as that of France, except that the "grande naturalisation" can only be conferred by Act of the Legislature.

SWITZERLAND.

According to a paper quoted before the Aliens Committee "in some Cantons the Acts of Naturalization are granted by the Legislature, in others by the Executive Government. In most Cantons, among others in Berne, Zurich, Vaud, and Geneva, the privileges are complete and without any restriction, from the date of the act. In Tessin, a naturalized foreigner can only exercise the rights of citizenship after a lapse of five years from the date of his naturalization. In Thurgovie, no one can hold any office in or under the Government unless he has been a burgess of the Canton at least five years. In St. Gall, Thurgovie, and Tessin, a foreigner, in order to obtain his naturalization, must renounce his foreign rights of citizenship or allegiance."

(See also what M. Treitt says respecting the facility with which Swiss citizenship is acquired.)

ITALY.

Laws of the Two Sicilies.

By the Civil Code of the Two Sicilies provision was made both for naturalization and expatriation.

Codice delle Due Sicilie, Art. 11.

A Royal decree of the 17th December 1817, provided that special naturalization may be granted after one year's residence to any one who has rendered important service to the State, and ordinary naturalization after 10 years' consecutive residence, on giving proof of means of subsistence and declaring intention to become domiciled in the kingdom.

Ibid. Article 25.

Expatriation followed on entry into a foreign military service, but the person expatriated still remained subject to the penal law if he re-entered the kingdom after having taken up arms against it.

Permission was given to enter a foreign service on condition that the person to whom it was granted should not take any oath on accepting such service, except with a reservation that he should not be called upon to take arms against the Two Sicilies, and with the understanding that he should not be accredited to that country as ambassador or minister.

Laws of Sardinia.

"Lois Civiles et Commerciales" de M. Victor [illegible] vol. ix. [illegible] Code Civil.

The Civil Code of Sardinia of 1837, known as the "Codice Albertino," contains the following, among other, provisions respecting aliens :—

"19. A child born abroad of a father who enjoys civil rights, is also a subject, and exercises all the rights of one."

"24. A child, born in the State, of an alien who has established his domicile therein, with intent to remain permanently, is considered a subject.

"The intention to establish a permanent domicile is shown by an uninterrupted residence of 10 years for other than commercial purposes."

"42. Aliens who have been naturalized lose the privileges of naturalization by an absence from the kingdom for one year without the King's permission."

Conscription Law.

"Atti Ufficiali, Leggi, Decreti, &c." Vol. v. Part i. p. 292.

The Army Law of the Kingdom of Italy is very strict. ("Regolamento sul Reclutamento dell' Esercito :" March 31, 1855.

Sec. 21. The sons of an alien born within the State, who are comprised within the terms of the 24th Article of the Civil Code, are considered as citizens, and must inscribe their names, or cause them to be inscribed, on the Levy List of the communes in which they reside.

Sec. 22. Aliens and their sons who are admitted to enjoy civil rights, and are presumed to be citizens according to the Civil Code, are obliged to inscribe their names in like manner, unless the class to which they belong by age has furnished its contingent.

Sec. 23. Aliens who, according to the code, are considered citizens, or have been naturalized, must inscribe their names and satisfy the obligations of the levy, although they may be required for military service, and maintained to be subjects of their native State.

Sec. 24. The sons of a naturalized citizen born before his naturalization must be inscribed on the list of their last place of residence in the State.

Sec. 25. Naturalization abroad, without the King's permission, does not exempt from the conscription, and the inscription of the name must be at the last place of residence within the State.

Sec. 26. Diplomatic and consular agents abroad to send to the Minister of War every year lists of the citizens resident within their jurisdiction, who are liable to the conscription.

Such persons to be warned that they are required to return to their native country to fulfil their obligations, under penalty of incurring the law for the punishment of contumacy.

Regulations made for persons residing in countries distant more than 600 miles off, with certain reservations, and for the case of those who are undergoing legal punishment in a foreign country.

Revised Italian Code.

By a decree of the 2nd of April 1865, the government was authorized to publish a new Revised Civil Code for the Italian kingdom, and this Code was accordingly prepared and came into operation on the 1st of January 1866.

The Code is of great interest and importance as being the last Code published, founded on the Code Napoléon.

It may, therefore, be supposed to contain all the additions and alterations which experience has proved requisite.

"Codice Civile del Regno d'Italia," lib. in. tit. i.

An official copy has been furnished by Sir A. Paget for use in this Memorandum.

The following is a translation of the provisions of the first book of the Code.

"Of Citizenship and the Enjoyment of Civil Rights.

"1. Every citizen enjoys civil rights who has not been deprived of them by a penal sentence.

"2. Communes, Provinces, Civil and Ecclesiastical establishments, and in general all legally recognized public bodies, are considered as personal, and enjoy civil rights according to the laws and usages of public right.

"3. An alien is admitted to enjoy the civil rights appertaining to citizens.

"4. The child of a citizen is a citizen.

"5. If the father has lost his citizenship before the birth of the child, the latter is reputed a citizen if he is born within the State and resides therein.

" Nevertheless, on becoming of age, according to the laws of the realm, he may elect to take the quality of an alien on making a declaration before the authorities of the civil state in which he resides, or, if in a foreign country, before the Royal diplomatic or consular agents.

" 6. The child, born in a foreign country, of a father who has lost his citizenship before the child's birth, is reputed as alien.

" He can, however, elect to take the quality of a citizen on making a declaration as prescribed by the preceding Article, and fixing his domicil in the kingdom during the year in which he makes such declaration.

" Nevertheless, if he has accepted public employment in the kingdom, or has served in the army or navy, or otherwise satisfied the requirements of the conscription without seeking exemption as an alien, he shall be considered a citizen without further process.

" 7. When the father is unknown, the child of a citizen mother is a citizen.

" When the mother has lost her citizenship before the birth of the child, the dispositions of the two preceding Articles become applicable.

" If even the mother is unknown, a child born in the kingdom is a citizen.

" 8. The child of an alien who has established his domicil within the kingdom uninterruptedly for 10 years is considered a citizen; residence for commercial purposes is not sufficient to constitute domicil.

" The child can, however, elect to be considered an alien, on making the declaration prescribed in Article 5.

" When the alien has not established his domicil in the kingdom for 10 years, the child is considered an alien; but the dispositions of the two first paragraphs of Article 6 are applicable to the case.

" 9. An alien woman who marries a citizen acquires citizenship, and preserves it even in widowhood.

" 10. Citizenship is conferred on an alien together with naturalization by law or by Royal decree.

" Royal decree will not be effectual unless it be registered by the proper civil authority of the State in the place where the alien intends to establish or has established his domicil, and unless an oath has been taken by him, before the said official, to be faithful to the king, and to observe the statutes and laws of the realm.

" The registration must be effected within six months of the date of the decree, which will be otherwise annulled.

" The wife and minor children of an alien who has obtained citizenship become citizens, on the condition of their also establishing their residence in the realm, but the children can elect to take upon them the quality of aliens on making the declaration prescribed in Article 5.

" 11. Citizenship is lost:

" (1.) On renunciation by declaration before the proper civil authority of the province wherein the person resides, and subsequent emigration to a foreign State.

" (2.) By naturalization in a foreign country.

" (3.) By accepting employment from a foreign state without previous permission of the Italian Government, or by entry into the military service of a foreign Power.

" The wife and minor children of one who has lost his citizenship become aliens, unless they have continued to reside within the realm.

" Nevertheless, the wife can re-acquire citizenship in the case and by the means stated in the second paragraph of Article 14, and the children according to the second and third paragraphs of Article 11.

" 12. Loss of citizenship in the cases stated in the preceding Article does not exempt from the obligations of military service, nor from the penalty inflicted on anyone who bears arms against his native country.

" 13. The citizen who has lost his citizenship for any of the reasons stated in Article 11 will recover it:

" (1.) By returning to the realm with the special permission of the Government.

" (2.) By renunciation of the foreign citizenship, employment, or military service acquired in the foreign country.

" (3.) By declaring before the proper civil authority of the State an intention to establish domicil within the realm, and by so bonâ fide establishing it within a year.

" 14. A woman who is a citizen, and who marries an alien becomes alien; since by the act of marriage she acquires the citizenship of her husband.

" On becoming a widow she recovers citizenship by residence within or return to the realm, on declaring in either case, before the civil authority of the State, her intention to establish her domicil therein.

" 15. The acquisition or restoration of citizenship in the cases aforesaid does not take effect until the day after that in which the required conditions and formalities are complied with."

In the Articles of the Code of which the foregoing is a translation, the expression " cittadinanza " is used to express citizenship; but it will be seen, on referring to Article 10, a distinction is drawn between citizenship (" cittadinanza ") and naturalization (" naturalità).

This is owing to the fact that Italian citizenship, properly speaking, is local; the provinces being divided, for the purposes of conscription and taxation, into districts, within one of which every Italian is bound to have his name inscribed on the the district lists.

This " cittadinanza," therefore, corresponds somewhat to the German " burgher-recht," and as a local honorary privilege is conferred on distinguished persons, like our " City freedom."

Thus Garibaldi was presented with the " cittadinanza " of all the Italian towns.

The distinction is of no great importance, as by Article 1, " every citizen enjoys civil rights; " but it may be worth mentioning.

SPAIN.

Extract from the Constitution of May 23, 1845.

PART I.

Article I.

" Spaniards are:

" 1. All persons born within the dominions of Spain.

" 2. The children of a Spanish father and mother, though born out of the dominions of Spain.

" 3. Aliens who have obtained a certificate of naturalization.

" 4. Those who, without having obtained such certificate, have acquired a domicil in any part of the monarchy.

" The quality of a Spaniard is lost by naturalization in a foreign country or by admission to the employ of a foreign government without the royal license.

" The rights which aliens who may become naturalized or domiciled shall enjoy shall be determined by law."

Extracts from the Royal Decree, of the 17th of November 1852, respecting Aliens.

PART I.

CAP. I.

Collecion Legislativa de Espana, Tomo lvii. p. 482.

"Aliens are:

"1. All persons born of alien fathers without the Spanish dominions.

"2. The children of an alien father and Spanish mother born without the said dominions, unless they reclaim Spanish nationality.

"3. Children born within Spanish territory of alien fathers or of an alien father and Spanish mother, unless they make such a reclamation as aforesaid.

"4. Children born without the Spanish dominions of fathers who have lost their Spanish nationality.

"5. A Spanish woman married to an alien.

"The national vessels are considered as part of the Spanish dominions without any distinction.

"Article 2. Aliens who have obtained a certificate of naturalization or become domiciled in accordance with the law are considered Spaniards.

"Article 3. All persons residing in Spain who have neither become naturalized nor settled therein are aliens domiciled or transitory.

"Article 4. A legal domicil is acquired by those who have established themselves with a settled habitation or fixed residence for the space of three years, with the possession of real property or the exercise of some trade or profession or known mode of livelihood in the Spanish territory, with the permission of the superior civil authority of the province.

"Article 5. Transitory aliens are those who have not acquired a fixed residence in the kingdom in the manner prescribed by the preceding article."

CAP. II.

"Article 8. A transitory alien who desires to become domiciled must request the necessary license from the superior civil authority of the province, with proofs of his having fulfilled the conditions required by Article 4.

"Articles 9, 10. Registries of transitory and domiciled aliens to be kept by governors of provinces and foreign consuls.

"Article 12. Those whose names are not inscribed in such registries are not legally entitled to the rights of aliens.

CHAP. III.

"Article 18. Aliens may possess real property, exercise trades and professions, and share in all undertakings not expressly reserved by law to Spanish subjects.

"Article 21. Both transitory and domiciled aliens are subject to the payment of all imposts and taxes on the profits arising from their lands, commerce, or profession.

"Article 24. Both domiciled and transitory aliens and their children, who have not elected Spanish nationality, are exempt from military service.

"But this exemption does not extend to sons whose fathers have been born within Spanish territory, even though they retain their alien nationality."

PART IV.—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

The questions of naturalization and allegiance have been a fruitful source of controversy between the two countries. Commencing from the first establishment of the American Union, they have continued with unabated vigour until the present day, when the great increase in the number of persons of British birth settled in America has raised them to a position of the utmost importance.

It would be impracticable within the compass of a Memorandum to attempt to give a full abstract of this long correspondence, and the present paper will accordingly be confined to such an account of the principal occasions which have led to it, as will be sufficient to give a general explanation of the arguments and doctrines which have been respectively advanced and maintained by the English and American Governments.

FROM THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE TO THE WAR OF 1812–14.

Chitty's "Commercial Law," 1824, Vol. i. p. 125.

By the statute 13 Geo. II. c. 7, all foreigners who have resided seven years in any of His Majesty's Colonies in America, without having been absent longer than two months at any one time, are naturalized on taking the oaths, making the declaration, and receiving the sacrament, as therein prescribed.

The statute 20 Geo. II. c. 44, extended the benefit of this Act to the Moravian Brethren, and to all foreign Protestants conscientiously scrupulous of taking an oath.

The Act 2 Geo. III. c. 25, naturalized foreign Protestants serving two years in the Royal American regiment or as engineers in America.

Tucker's "History of the United States," Vol. i. p. 632.

The Colonists complained in the Declaration of Independence of the restrictions imposed by these Acts:—

"He (the King of Great Britain) has endeavoured to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of land."

It is to be remarked, however, that no such complaint appears in the address and protest of the people of America to the King and people of England of the preceding year, 1775.

Several cases arose, after the Treaty of Peace of 1783, in which the status of persons owing allegiance respectively to the British and United States Governments were discussed.

Kent deals with the subject at length in his 25th Lecture, especially with regard to the position of antenati.

Kent's "Commentaries," Boston, 1858, Vol. ii. pp. 22, 23. (See also generally on the Laws of Naturalization in the United States, and other countries.)

He says, "The sound and prevailing doctrine now is, that by the Treaty of Peace of 1783, Great Britain and the United States became respectively entitled, as against each other, to the allegiance of all persons who were at the time adhering to the Governments respectively; and that those persons became aliens in respect to the Government to which they did not adhere. This is the meaning of the Treaty of 1783, and it put an end to all con-

Treaty of Paris, Sept. 3, 1783,

Arts. V.-VI. State Papers, Vol. i. p. 782.

flicting and double allegiance growing out of the Revolution.

The Treaty of the 19th of November 1794 contains the following Articles:—

Ibid. p. 785.

"II. His Majesty will withdraw all his troops and garrisons from all posts and places within the boundary lines assigned by the Treaty of Peace to the United States . . . All settlers and traders within the precincts or jurisdiction of the said posts . . . shall be at full liberty to remain there, or to remove . . . Such of them as shall continue to reside within the said boundary lines shall not be compelled to become citizens of the United States, or to take any oath of allegiance to the Government thereof, but they shall be at full liberty to do so if they think proper; and they shall make and declare their election within one year after the evacuation aforesaid. And all persons who shall continue there after the expiration of the said year without having declared their intention of remaining subjects of His Britannic Majesty, shall be considered as having elected to become citizens of the United States."

Ibid. p. 791.

"IX. It is agreed that British subjects who now hold lands in the territories of the United States, and American citizens who now hold lands in the dominions of His Majesty, shall continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their respective States and titles therein, and may grant, sell, or devise the same to whom they please, in like manner as if they were natives, and that neither they nor their heirs or assigns shall, so far as may respect the said lands, and the legal remedies incident thereto, be regarded as aliens."

Impressment.—United States' Proposal, 1792.

The outbreak of the wars of the French Revolution led to a discussion on the claim of the British Crown to the allegiance of its subjects, which culminated in the war of 1812–14.

Several cases of impressment of British seamen from on board American vessels having been brought to the notice of the American Government in 1792, they instructed Mr. Pinckney, then Minister in London, to make a proposal to the British Government, to the following effect:—

Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Pinckney, July 1, 1792.

State Papers and Public Documents of the United States, 10 vols. Published 1817. (Referred to as "Congress Papers.")

That the American Government must reject any condition by which seamen on board United States' vessels should be bound to carry with them on all occasions certificates of citizenship. The simplest rule would be that "the vessel being American shall "be evidence that the seamen on board her are "such; but if it is apprehended that our vessels "might thus become asylums for the fugitives of "their own nation from impress gangs, the number "of men to be protected by a vessel may be limited "by her tonnage, and one or two officers only be "permitted to enter the vessel in order to examine "the number on board, but no press-gang should be "allowed ever to go on board an American vessel "till after it shall be found that there are more "than the stipulated number on board . . . and "even then the American Consul shall be called "in."

Nothing, however, came of this proposal, and the Treaty of 1794 did not contain any Article on the subject of impressments.

Mr. King's Negotiations, 1796–1803.

Fourth Congress, Sess. i. c. 36. May 28, 1796. "United States' Statutes at Large," Vol. i. p. 477.

In 1796, an Act of Congress was passed authorizing the appointment of Agents to reside in British and other ports for the purpose of watching over the interests of American seamen, procuring their release when impressed, and rendering an account to the United States' Government of all cases of impressment and detention.

The Act further provided for a form of certificate of citizenship to be given by the United States' Collectors of Customs to American seamen who might apply for it.

"American State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 582.

On the 30th of November, 1796, Mr. King, United States' Minister, wrote to Lord Grenville, complaining that an American had been impressed and refused his discharge on the grounds that he was "married and settled at Bristol," and that the orders of the Admiralty "usually contain a proviso "that the discharge is not to operate in favour of "any person who has entered on board Her "Majesty's ships, or who is married and settled "within any of Her Majesty's dominions." Mr. King adds, "Without admitting or contesting, on "this occasion, the rule of English law that a "subject cannot divest himself of his natural "allegiance, I take the liberty to request your "Lordship's attention to the diversity of practice, "so much to the disadvantage of the American "citizens, which prevails in the application of this "rule."

He then argues that if domicil in Great Britain rendered an American liable to the press, domicil in the United States ought to free a British subject from such liability.

Ibid. p. 574.

In the instructions furnished to Mr. King on his proceeding to England, he was directed to urge that on the high seas the American flag should protect all who sailed under it:—"In the ports of "Great Britain and Ireland the impress of British "subjects found on board our vessels must doubt-"less be admitted. . . .

Mr. Pickering to Mr. King; June 8, 1796.

"There are three classes of men concerning whom there can be no difficulty: 1st, Native American citizens; 2nd, American citizens, wherever born, who were such at the definitive treaty of peace; 3rd, foreigners other than British subjects sailing in American vessels, and whose persons ought to be as sacred, as it respects the British, as those of native citizens. The fourth class consists of British-born subjects, but who, or many of whom, may have become citizens subsequent to the treaty of peace, or who hereafter may be admitted to the rights of citizens. It is this class alone about which any pretence of right to impress can be made. With regard to these, it may be attempted to protect them as well in time of war as in peace in the following cases: First, when they shall have served in American vessels, public or private, for the same term in which foreigners serving in British vessels would acquire the rights of British subjects, which is understood to be three years; or, secondly, if so much cannot be obtained, when those persons, originally British subjects, shall have resided five years in the United States, and been formally admitted to the rights of citzens according to our laws."

Mr. Liston to Mr. Pickering; August 30, 1797. Papers on Impressment, MSS.

In 1797 a dispute arose between Admiral Sir Hyde Parker and the United States agent in the West Indies, in consequence of the agent having attempted to procure the release of some seamen from on board British ships by writ of habeas corpus.

In writing to the American Government on the subject, Mr. Liston, His Majesty's Minister in the United States, complained that the protections or certificates of citizenship were granted without due inquiry, and were used as a means of fraudulently evading the press.

American State Papers, Vol. iii. p. 271.

It appears that Sir Hyde Parker informed the agent that "no proofs would be regarded by him "unless specially presented by the American "Government through the British Minister, nor "then but in the single case of native Americans." He is stated to have positively refused to listen to applications on behalf of naturalized citizens.

Ibid. pp. 274, 593, 777

In 1799 the United States Government published a list of the seamen whose discharge had been applied for.

This list, as well as the similar lists published in 1803 and 1806, contain a great number of names of persons claiming to be United States citizens, with or without protection, but there are only two cases of naturalized citizens.

In 1803 "Henry Kipp, a native of Hamburgh " and a naturalized citizen of the United States, " impressed into the British frigate 'Endymion,' " from the American ship 'Eagle.' No protection."

In 1806 "Lawrence Brown, naturalized citizen, with a protection."

It must be remembered that at this time the Act of Congress of 1798 was in force, requiring 14 years' residence for naturalization. It is true, however, that this Act did not interfere with those naturalized under the Acts of 1790 or 1795, requiring respectively one and five years' residence.

There is only one case mentioned in the returns of vessels seized of a vessel having been taken which was the property of a naturalized citizen.

Congress Papers," Vol. iv, . 314.

This case occurred in 1800. "Brigantine 'Sally,' " of Philadelphia, owned by Stephen Girard, from " Batavia to Philadelphia,—cargo, sugar, and coffee; " taken July 20, 1800, by the 'Cleopatra' frigate; " carried into Halifax; vessel and cargo con- " demned. The condemnation appears to be " grounded upon the allegation that the owner is " a native of France, carrying on a course of trade " to a French colony. N.B.—M. Girard was natu- " ralized a citizen of Pennsylvania in the year 1777, " and has ever since resided in the United States."*

Draft to Mr. Liston, July 5," 797, "Impress- nent Papers."

In 1797 Mr. Liston had been instructed by His Majesty's Government to propose a convention for the mutual surrender of deserters.

Some delay appears to have been occasioned by a difficulty which arose between the two Governments respecting the interpretation of the treaty of 1794, and it was not until February 1800 that Mr. Liston forwarded to the United States Government a draft of an additional article to be appended to that treaty, providing for the mutual surrender of deserters in the terms of his instructions.

merican "State Papers," Vol. iii. . 576.
Hertslett's "State Papers," Vol. i. Part 2, p. 1386, et seq.

The American Government objected to a clause introduced into this draft providing that its stipulations "should not extend to authorize either of the " parties to demand the delivery of any sailors, " subjects or citizens, belonging to the other party, " who have been employed on board the vessels of " either of the respective nations, and who have in " time of war or threatened hostility voluntarily " entered into the service of their own sovereign " or nation, or have been compelled to enter " therein according to the laws and practice pre- " vailing in the two countries respectively." The United States Government accordingly tendered a counter project and the negotiation fell through.

American " State Papers, Vol. ii. p. 486.

On the 20th of September 1800 Mr. J. Marshall, Secretary of State, furnished Mr. King, the United States Minister in London, with full instructions for resuming negotiations with the British Government on contraband, blockade, and impressment. On the latter subject he says:—

"The impressment of our seamen is an injury of very serious magnitude, which deeply affects the feelings and the honour of the nation.

"This valuable class of men is composed of natives and foreigners who voluntarily engage in our service.

"No right has been asserted to impress the natives of America, yet they are impressed.

"Those seamen who, born in a foreign country, have been adopted by this, were either the subjects of Britain or some other Power.

"The right to impress those who were British subjects has been asserted, and the right to impress those of every other nation has not been disclaimed. Neither the one practice nor the other can be justified.

"With the naturalization of foreigners no other nation can interfere further than the rights of that other are affected. The rights of Britain are certainly not affected by the naturalization of other than British subjects; consequently those persons who, according to our laws, are citizens must be so considered by Britain, and by every other Power not having a conflicting claim to the person.

"The United States therefore require positively that their seamen who are not British subjects, whether born in America or elsewhere, shall be exempt from impressments.

"The case of British subjects, whether naturalized or not, is more questionable; but the right even to impress them is denied. The practice of the British Government itself may certainly, in a controversy with that Government, be relied on. The privileges it claims and exercises ought to be ceded to others. To deny this would be to deny the equality of nations and to make it a question of power and not of right.

"If the practice of the British Government may be quoted, that practice is to maintain and defend in their sea-service all those of any nation who have voluntarily engaged in it, or who, according to their laws, have become British subjects."

The negotiations were interrupted in February 1801 by the appointment of Lord Hawkesbury to succeed Lord Grenville as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

On the 10th of March 1801 Mr. King forwarded to Lord Hawkesbury a memorandum of the points which his Government required settled, including a provision against impressment on the high seas.

American "State Papers," Vol. ii. p. 492.

In his message of the 8th of December 1801 President Jefferson recommended a revision of the naturalization laws and the substitution of a shorter term for the 14 years required by the existing law.

"Congress Papers," Vol. iv. p. 325.

The Peace of Amiens of March 27, 1802, caused the negotiations to be again suspended, but they were renewed, when war became again imminent in 1803, by Mr. King, who arranged with Lord St. Vincent an article forbidding impressment on the high seas, but on this article being submitted to Lord Hawkesbury it was objected to as not recognizing the jurisdiction of Great Britain over the narrow seas.

American "State Papers," Vol ii. p. 503.

Mr. King, who had supposed that he had settled this question of the mare clausam with Lord St. Vincent, then abandoned the negociation.

War broke out again in April 1803.

In 1803 Mr. King was succeeded by Mr. Monroe.

Mr. Monroe's Negotiations, 1804–1806.

Instructions were given to him by Mr. Madison (January 5, 1804), for the conclusion of a treaty and a draft forwarded to him, showing the terms to be originally proposed together with those which the United States Government were prepared to accept.

American "State Papers," Vol iii. p. 81.

In this despatch Mr. Monroe urges that Great Britain has the "less excuse for this practice (of impressment) as it is in direct contradiction to the principles in which she proceeds in other cases . . . . . whilst she impresses her own subjects from the American service, although they may have been settled and married, and even naturalized in the United States, she constantly refuses to release from her service American citizens impressed into it, whenever she can give for a reason that they were either settled or married within her dominions; . . . . when marriage and residence and even naturalization are against her, no respect is paid to either. . . .

"Should any difficulty be started respecting seamen born within the British Dominions and naturalized by the United States since the Treaty of 1783, you may remove it by saying, first, that very few, if any, such naturalizations can take place . . . Secondly, that a discontinuance of impressments on the high seas will preclude an actual collision between the interfering claims. Within the jurisdiction of each nation, and in their respective vessels on the high seas, each will enforce the allegiance which it claims. In other situations, the individuals doubly claimed will be within jurisdiction independent of both nations."

* Before the adoption of the constitution, aliens were naturalized by the several States.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. pp. 92, 93.

Mr. Monroe accordingly submitted a project of a convention to Lord Hawkesbury on the 7th of April 1804.

Soon afterwards Mr. Pitt succeeded Mr. Addington as Premier, and Lord Harrowby was appointed to the Foreign Office.

On Mr. Monroe calling his attention to the draft Convention submitted to his predecessor, Lord Hawkesbury, Lord Harrowby animadverted strongly on the conduct of the United States, with regard to an article in a boundary convention entered into in 1803, but which they had refused to ratify in the cession of Louisiana in 1804, and declined to enter into further engagements for the present.

The negotiations were consequently again postponed.

It appears, however, that the papers were submitted to Sir W. Scott.

"Impressment Papers," MS. Sir W. Scott; September 20, 1804.

Sir W. Scott furnished two reports; in the first of which he stated that "The exercise of the rights "claimed on the part of this country in calling for "the service of its seafaring subjects out of foreign "vessels, ought unquestionably to be rendered as "little incommodious and vexatious to those vessels "as the nature of the thing will admit; all unnecessary inconvenience, and still more all unnecessary violence of conduct or language, ought to be "avoided or repressed; and there can be no doubt "that the Admiralty will enforce a general observance of these duties, by proper regulations of "their own; but the right itself cannot be departed from; and, being as clear in its principles, "as it is important in its purposes, must neither be "surrendered nor enervated by conventional regulations that may affect its utility."

And, in the second paper—

"Impressment Papers," MS. King's Advocate; September 1804.

"The great and fundamental principle of British Maritime Jurisprudence is, that ships upon the high seas compose no part of the Territory of a State. The surrender of this principle would be a virtual surrender of the belligerent rights of this country.

"If a seafaring person, though born in another country, fixes his domicil here, and is habitually employed in British navigation and commerce, he assumes the character of a British Mariner, and becomes liable to its duties. It cannot reasonably be expected that such persons shall reside here, with all the advantages of British protection and navigation, without being called upon for the maritime defence of the country. . . .

"It can hardly be expected by the one Government from the other, that a mere certificated list or protection issued in such form as they shall respectively prescribe, shall in all cases be deemed satisfactory evidence of the citizenship or subjection of the party . . . . the contracting States may hold very different principles of law upon the question of national character and relation; if so, the parties have no common measure to resort to, and one government may find itself deprived of the most important services of those whom it deems its own subjects, upon grounds held by the other State in direct opposition to those principles which it conceives to be the only just and rational principles applicable to such a state of circumstances."

"Congress Papers," Vol. v. p. 309.

On the 23rd of September 1805 Mr. Monroe addressed a remonstrance to the English government entering into the various grounds of complaint, and concluding by pressing "the topic of impressment" as urgent. "The United States are aware, "from the similarity in the person, the manners, "and, above all, the identity of the language, which "is common to the people of both nations, that the "subject is a difficult one. They are equally "aware that, to Great Britain also, it is a delicate "one."

Lord Mulgrave to Mr. Monroe; November 25, 1805.

Lord Mulgrave (who had succeeded Lord Harrowby in January 1805) informed Mr. Monroe that he must consult the law officers before returning an answer to his representations.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 108.

Mr. Pitt died January 23, 1806, and the seals of the Foreign Office passed to Mr. Fox.

A further list of cases of impressment, up to 1806, shows only two instances of naturalization. In one the person was not on board the vessel named; in the other (James McKain, No. 3246), the seaman being a native of Ireland, the discharge was refused.

Ibid. p. 63.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney.—Special Mission, 1806–7.

The United States' Government supposed that the new ministry would be more favourable to their views than Mr. Pitt's administration, and on the 17th of May 1806 Mr. Pinckney, who had served for some years in London, engaged in the negotiation of the Maryland Bank Stock affairs, was associated with Mr. Monroe in a Joint Special Mission for the settlement of the various questions at issue between the two countries.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii p. 119.

Mr. Pinckney arrived in England in June, just at the time that Mr. Fox was taken ill, and Lord Auckland and Lord Holland were accordingly appointed by Lord Grenville to treat with the Special Mission.

"Statutes at Large," Vol. ii. p. 379.

On the 18th of April 1806 an Act of Congress had been passed prohibiting the importation of British leather, silk, linen, woollen, and other goods.

The British Commissioners lost no time in remonstrating against this Act, which was accordingly suspended.

Mr. Fox died September 13, and was replaced by Lord Howick (afterwards second Earl Grey).

A report of the Law Officers was sent to the American Commissioners on the 4th November.

"Impressment Papers," MS.

This report seems to have been a report by Sir John Nicholl, of the 3rd of November 1806, in reply to an inquiry addressed to him by Lord Holland and Lord Auckland on the 1st.

"On what ground does a nation which has not a right, by treaty, to reclaim its subjects from the territory of another, to which they have escaped, claim the right of taking them by force from on board its merchantmen on the high seas? and what is your opinion of the soundness of this pretension?"

Answer. "His Majesty, by his Royal Prerogative, has a right to require the service of all his "seafaring subjects against the enemy, and to seize "them by force wherever they shall be found. "This right is limited by the territorial sovereignty of other nations, and therefore His Majesty cannot seize his subjects, because he cannot "exercise any act of force within the territory of "another State. But the high seas are extra-territorial, and merchant vessels navigating upon them "are not admitted to possess a territorial jurisdiction, so as to protect British subjects from the "exercise of His Majesty's prerogative over them. "This right, I apprehend, has from time immemorial been asserted in practice, and acquiesced in

" by foreign nations. The pretension appears to " me to be sound in principle, although difficulties " may arise in its exercise, particularly on board " vessels of the United States, from the similarity " of language and appearance in British and Ameri- " can seamen." Sir John Nicholl adds, that if foreign merchants are aggrieved by it, they have only themselves to blame for engaging British seamen.

"Impressment Papers," MS.

In a further report, Sir John Nicholl gives additional arguments in favour of the right to search merchant vessels on the high seas for British seamen, and of the extension of this right, when required, to foreign ships of war, and of its enforcement by arms.

The American and British Commissioners met on the 5th of November, when, it being found impossible for them to agree on an Impressment Article, Lord Auckland and Lord Holland wrote a note, stating that His Majesty could not give up the right of which complaint was made, but that instructions should be given to avoid, as far as possible, any injury to United States' citizens, and that in the meanwhile the British Commissioners were authorized to proceed to the other articles of negotiation.

On the 27th of December the Commissioners agreed upon a Treaty, which was signed by them on the 31st.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 147.

This Treaty provided for reciprocal rights of commerce and navigation, regulations as to prize, privateering, blockade, and contraband of war, trade with the enemies' colonies not being blockaded, the extension of the territorial limit from three to five miles on the American coast, on the understanding that a similar limit be observed by other belligerents, extradition, &c.

An additional Article was annexed, on the subject of the Canada trade.

Ibid. Vol. iii. p. 153.

Mr. Madison replied to the Commissioners' despatch inclosing this Treaty, by criticising it stringently, and stating that it did not "comport " with the President's views of the national senti- " ment or the Legislative policy, that any Treaty " should be entered into with the British Govern- " ment which" did not include the subject of impressment.

Mr. Canning, on the final break up of the "All the Talents" Ministry, was appointed to the Foreign Secretaryship in March 1807.

In the meanwhile an additional complication had been introduced into the relations between the United States and Great Britain, by the publication by the Emperor Buonaparte of the Decree of Berlin,* on the 21st of November 1806, forbidding all intercourse with England or dealing in English goods, and declaring the British islands in a state of blockade.

In reply to further communications from the American Plenipotentiaries, Mr. Madison enjoined them in May 1807, that "no Treaty would be " ratified without a provision against impressments," but authorized them, if every other arrangement were rejected, to propose an article providing that neither country should permit any seaman to be engaged who was not a subject or citizen of such country, and who should not have been at least two years previously within its jurisdiction or on board its vessels.

Ibid. Vol. iii. p. 172.

Mr. Madison points out that "this proposition " is so framed as not to comprehend among British " seamen those who have been made citizens of the " United States, and who must necessarily be so regarded within their jurisdiction and under their " flag. This modification of the Article cannot " produce any real objection on the part of Great " Britain, 1. Because the legal pre-requisites to " naturalization in the United States imply what " is sufficiently known, that the number of seamen " actually naturalized, or likely to be so, is too " small to claim attention in any arrangement of " this kind. 2. Because the right of British sub- " jects to naturalize themselves in a foreign trade " and navigation as laid down by the judicial " authority of Great Britain, ought to restrain the " Government from making a difficulty on this " point. (See Durnford and East's Reports, Wil- " son v. Marriatt; and the same case in Bosanquet " and Buller's Reports.)"

On the 22d of June 1807 the unfortunate affair of the "Chesapeake" took place.

His Majesty's ship "Leopard" met the "Chesapeake" three leagues off Cape Henry, and demanded to search it for deserters.

This was refused, and the "Leopard" then fired into the "Chesapeake," which was unprepared for battle, and did great damage killing some men and wounding others.

The "Chesapeake" did not return the fire; and eventually four men, stated to be deserters, were given up to the "Leopard" under protest.

This led to a proclamation from the President, July 2, 1807, forbidding intercourse with British ships of war, and ordering them to depart from the ports of the United States.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 29.

On the 11th of November 1807 the celebrated British Orders in Council were published, declaring all French ports, and ports in French possession to be in a state of blockade, and that the sale of belligerents' vessels to neutrals would not be recognized.

Ibid. Vol. iii. p. 197.

In October, Mr. Canning informed Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney that there was no prospect of the British Government consenting "to recede from " its declared pretensions relative to searching on " the high seas the merchant ships of neutral " nations for British seamen," and, together with the Orders of Council, the King issued a proclamation (November 11, 1807), recalling all British seamen who might be employed in foreign vessels.

This proclamation contains the following passage:—

Ibid. p. 25.

"And whereas it has been further represented unto us that divers mariners and seafaring men, our natural-born subjects, have been induced to accept letters of naturalization, or certificates of citizenship, from foreign states, and have been taught to believe that, by such letters or certificates, they are discharged from that duty of allegiance which, as our natural-born subjects, they owe to us. Now we do hereby warn all such mariners, seafaring men, and others, our natural-born subjects, that no such letters of naturalization, or certificates of citizenship, do, or can, in any manner, divest our natural-born subjects of the allegiance, or in any degree alter the duty which they owe to us, their lawful Sovereign. But, in consideration of the error into which such mariners and seafaring men as aforesaid may be led, we do hereby publish and declare our free pardon to all such our subjects, who, repenting of the delusion under which they have acted, shall immediately, upon the knowledge of this our Royal proclamation, withdraw themselves from foreign service and return to their allegiance with us. And we do declare that all such our subjects who shall continue in the service of foreign States, in disregard and contempt of this our Royal Proclamation, will not only incur our just displeasure, but are liable to be proceeded against for such contempt, and shall be proceeded against accordingly. And we do hereby declare that if any such masters of ships, pilots, mariners, seamen,

* Copies of the English and French Decrees, Proclamations, and Orders in Council from the beginning of the war, are published in the American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 262, et seq.

shipwrights, or other seafaring men (being our natural-born subjects), shall be taken in any foreign service by the Algerines or other Barbary Powers and carried into slavery, they shall not be reclaimed by us as subjects of Great Britain."

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 199.

The refusal to ratify the Treaty of 1806, having been formally communicated to the English Government, Mr, Canning wrote to the Commissioners on the 22d of October to say that the King could not consent to negotiate anew.

Mr. Monroe shortly afterwards returned to America leaving Mr. Pinckney as minister.

Mr. Jackson's Mission to the United States.

It was decided about this time to send a special envoy to America, whose instructions were to be limited, in the first instance, to the "Chesapeake" affair.

Ibid. p. 290.

On the 17th of December 1807 the Emperor issued the Milan Decree, declaring every vessel that had submitted to be searched by a British cruiser denationalized, and liable to seizure, and reiterating the blockade of the British islands.

The relations with the United States now assumed a very unsatisfactory character. Acts of Congress were passed, laying an embargo on vessels trading with Great Britain in United States' ports, and interdicting commercial intercourse with England and France.

The British Minister having represented that the Orders in Council would be withdrawn, these Acts were revoked by the President's proclamation of April 19, 1809.

A dispute now arose as to the powers entrusted to Mr. Jackson, the British representative, to make communications to the United States' Government on matters other than the case of the "Chesapeake," and in November 1809 the President refused all further official intercourse with him.

Ibid. p. 319.

In the despatch announcing this decision to Mr. Pinckney, Mr. Smith, Secretary of State refers to the impressment question, and objects to the terms proposed by Mr. Jackson, respecting the "Chesapeake," as "admitting a right on the part of Great "Britain to claim a discharge from our service of "deserters generally, and particularly of her "natural-born subjects, without excepting such "as had been naturalized under the laws of the "United States. . . . What possible consideration could have induced the British "Government to expect that the United States "would admit a principle that would deprive our "naturalized citizens of the legal privileges which "they hold in common with their native fellow-"citizens? The British Government less than "any other ought to have made such a proposition, because it not only, like others, naturalizes "aliens, but, in relation to the United States, has "even refused to discharge from the British service "native citizens of the United States involuntarily "detained. If an American seaman has resided in "Great Britain, or has accepted a bounty in her "naval service, his discharge therefrom on the "regular application to the British Government "has been invariably refused by its Board of "Admiralty."

Correspondence respecting Orders in Council and "Chesapeake" Case.

A discussion now commenced respecting the alleged revocation of the French Decrees. The British Government declared that, as soon as those decrees were revoked, the British Orders in Council should be revoked also.

By a Proclamation of November 1810 the President announced that the Acts of Congress affecting France were revoked, but that the Acts affecting England would be enforced if the British Orders in Council were not repealed by February 1811.

In June 1811 a case was tried before Sir W. Scott, in which the question was raised, whether the French Decrees were in force or not, or, if they were not, whether the Orders in Council were revoked by the contingent promise of repeal made by the British Government.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 421.

It was then decided that the French Decrees still remain unrevoked. A long correspondence ensued.

The "Chesapeake" affair was brought to a conclusion in October 1811, by a disavowal of the proceedings of the "Leopard," the restoration of the men, and compensation to the families of the killed, and to the wounded of the "Chesapeake."

"Congress Papers," Vol. viii. p. 239.

Mr. Pinckney left London, and Mr. Russell became Chargé d'Affaires in November 1811.

Mr. Foster, who had become British Minister, in February 1811, proposed to the Secretary of State, to procure the release of certain Americans from His Majesty's ships.

Ibid. p. 371.

Mr. Monroe, the then Secretary of State, replied, "It is impossible for the United States to dis-"criminate between their native and naturalized "citizens, nor ought your Government to expect "it, as it makes no such discrimination itself." May 30, 1812.

War of 1812–14.—War declared by United States.

By this time much ill-feeling had arisen between America and England out of the Orders in Council, the possession by the United States of part of West Florida, and a recent encounter between the United States' ship "President" and the British sloop-of-war "Little Belt;" and on the 1st of June, 1812, the President sent a message to Congress recommending war.

In this message he lays great stress on the practice of impressment, and the proceedings of British cruizers having become intolerable.

The message was referred to the Committee for Foreign Affairs, who concurred in it; and on the 19th of June 1812 the President declared war by proclamation.

On the 23rd of June 1812 the Orders in Council were formally revoked.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 433.

In September 1812 Mr. Russell had an interview with Lord Castlereagh, with a view to some arrangement being arrived at.

Ibid. pp. 594-5.

He reports the conversation which took place respecting impressment as follows:—

"I finally offered, in order to answer at once all the observations and inquiries of Lord Castlereagh, that the proposed understanding should be expressed in the most general terms; that the laws to take effect on the discontinuance of the practice of impressment should prohibit the employment of the native subjects or citizens of the one State, excepting such only as had already been naturalized, on board the private or public ships of the other; thus removing any objection that might have been raised with regard to the future effect of naturalization, or the formal renunciation of any pretended right. . . . I was disappointed and grieved to find that these propositions, moderate and liberal as they were, should be treated in a manner which forbids me to expect their acceptance. I was even asked by Mr. Hamilton (Under Secretary of State) if the United States would deliver up the native British seamen who might be naturalized in America. Although shocked at this demand, I mildly replied that such a procedure would be disgraceful to America, without being useful to Great Britain; that the habits of seamen were so peculiarly unaccommodating that no one would patiently go through the long probation required by law to become a citizen of a country where he could not pursue his professional occupations, and that not to employ him in this way would be virtually to surrender him to Great Britain."

Prince Regent's Declaration, 1813.

"Annual Register," 1813, p. 330.

On the 9th of January 1813 the Prince Regent issued a Declaration in reply to the President's Proclamation, entering into a full explanation of the conduct of the British Government with regard to the negotiations which had preceded the war, the Orders in Council, blockade, belligerent rights, impressment, American embargo, non-intercourse, and non-importation Acts, and concluding by a statement of the principles which Great Britain determined to maintain:—

"His Royal Highness can never admit that in the exercise of the undoubted and hitherto undisputed right of search of neutral merchant-vessels in time of war, the impressment of British seamen when found therein, can be deemed any violation of a neutral flag. Neither can he admit that the taking of such seamen from on board such vessels can be considered by any neutral State as a hostile measure or a justifiable cause of war.

"There is no right more clearly established than the right which a Sovereign has to the allegiance of his subjects, more especially in time of war. Their allegiance is no optional duty, which they can decline and resume at pleasure. It is a call which they are bound to obey: it began with their birth, and can only terminate with their existence.

"If a similarity of language and manner may make the exercise of this right more liable to partial mistakes and occasional abuse, when practised toward vessels of the United States, the same circumstances make it also a right with the exercise of which in regard to such vessels it is more difficult to dispense.

"But if, to the practice of the United States to harbour British seamen be added their assumed right to transfer the allegiance of British subjects, and thus to cancel the jurisdiction of their legitimate Sovereign, by acts of naturalization and certificates of citizenship, which they pretend to be as valid out of their own territory as within it, it is obvious that to abandon this ancient right of Great Britain, and to admit these novel pretensions of the United States, would be to expose to danger the very foundation of our maritime strength."

"Impressment Papers," MS. February 21, 1812.

It appears from an Admiralty Minute that there were supposed to be upwards of 20,000 British born seamen in the American marine; many of them provided with fraudulent protections.

These protections were regular articles of speculation, the price being about two dollars.

They were forged in large numbers in England, and procured in America by any seaman who chose to go before a Customs Collector and call himself an American. The men had no difficulty in procuring witnesses to swear to their having been born in the United States; there were plenty of people who carried on a trade in such affidavits.

The Admiralty suggested that protections should in all cases be certified by British Consuls, which would ensure their bona fides, but this suggestion was never carried out.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 597.

When war was declared, orders were given for the discharge from the British fleet of all native-born Americans who could satisfactorily prove their nationality.

Refusal to exchange British Subjects taken in United States' Service—Retaliation.

In September 1812 six seamen were taken prisoners from the United States' ship "Nautilus," and sent to England, their exchange being refused on the ground that they were British subjects. Four were subsequently stated to have been native Americans, and two naturalized.

Twelve British sailors, prisoners of war, were then similarly detained as hostages by the American Commodore.

Shortly afterwards, six more American prisoners were taken from the jail at Nassau and sent to Jamaica to be tried, as was affirmed, as traitors. Of these, one was naturalized, one had been domiciled in America since 1793, and four were alleged to be American born, but had no protection.

President Madison, in his inauguration speech of March 4, 1813, refers to these cases.

"Annual Register," 1813, p. 394.

After praising the honourable manner in which the contest had been conducted by the United States, he says, "How little has been the effect of "this example on the conduct of the enemy. They "have retained as prisoners of war, citizens of the "United States, not liable to be so considered "under the usages of war. They have refused to "consider as prisoners of war, and threatened to "punish as traitors and deserters, persons emigrating without restraint to the United States, incorporated by naturalization into our political family, "and fighting under the authority of their adopted "country in open and honourable war, for the "maintenance of its rights and safety. Such is the "avowed purpose of a Government which is in the "practice of naturalizing by thousands citizens of "other countries, and not only of permitting, but "compelling them, to fight its battles against their "native country."

This system of retaliation was pursued by land as well as by sea.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 632, et seq.

In January 1813 twenty-three soldiers of the American army were selected from the prisoners taken at Queenstown and sent to England for trial as traitors.

Some of these were naturalized and all of them domiciled in the United States.

A like number of British prisoners, officers and men, were then placed in strict confinement by the American Government.

Ibid. p. 641.

In August Lord Bathurst instructed General Sir S. Prevost to inform the American Commander-in-chief that "the Prince Regent commanded forty-"six American officers and non-commissioned "officers to be held as hostages for the safe keeping of the twenty-three British soldiers stated to "have been put in close confinement by order of "the American Government, and to apprize him "that if any of the said British soldiers shall suffer "death by reason that the soldiers now under "confinement have been found guilty, and that "the known law, not only of Great Britain, but "of every Independent State under similar circumstances, has been in consequence executed, "to select out of the American officers and non-"commissioned officers in such strict confinement, "as many as may double the number of British "soldiers who shall have been so unwarrantably "put to death, and cause such officers and non-"commissioned officers to suffer death immediately; "and further, to notify that if the American "Government persisted in the policy of retaliation, "the war would be prosecuted with 'unmitigated "'severity against all cities, towns, and villages "'belonging to the United States.'"

It appears that the "Nautilus" and "Nassau" seaman were shortly afterwards exchanged, but some other seamen were sent to England in like manner.

"Historical Register," Vol. iii. p. 4.

The President, in his speech of the 7th of December 1813, gives an account of the retaliatory measures adopted, and especially complains of the treatment of naturalized citizens.

"A standing law of Great Britain naturalizes, as is well known, all aliens complying with conditions limited to a shorter period than those required by the United States; and naturalized subjects are, in war, employed by her Government in common with native subjects. In a contiguous British province, regulations, promulgated since the commencement of the war, compel citizens of the United States, being there under certain circumstances, to bear arms, whilst, of the native emigrants from the United States who compose much of the population of the province, a number have actually borne arms against the United States within their limits; some of whom, after having done so, have become prisoners of war, and are now in our possession.

In January 1814, an important debate arose in the House of Representatives on the subject of naturalization.

Some of the speakers maintained that "native "allegiance was unalienable, and yet not at all in "conflict with the practice of naturalization, which "was a mere municipal regulation, whose effects "could not extend beyond the limits of territorial "jurisdiction" (Mr. Sheffey). "By claiming to "give our naturalization laws an extended operation to other countries, we interfere in their "internal government, we set up the lofty pretension of legislating for the whole world" (Mr. Hanson).

Mr. Robertson quoted, as a precedent against England, the enlistment of Frenchmen in 1794 to serve against France, and the debate in which Mr. Burke said that "if they were taken prisoners "and treated as traitors England would retaliate "as a general principle. . . . I am ready to "repeat, and maintain that retaliation of any "severity which an enemy may practise is right "and proper. . . . But the right honourable "gentleman is fearful we may inflame the Jacobins "by this severity on our part. Inflame a Jacobin! "We might as well talk of 'setting fire to hell.'" Mr. Robertson also urged the case of the Irish brigade taken into the service of France in 1688, and recruited from Ireland, of which a whole regiment was taken in 1746, but no severity practised: the Irish who fought at Fontenoy; the French Protestants who served against France after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; and other instances where foreigners had enlisted in Swedish and German armies and served against their native country.

On the whole the debate seems to have been pretty equally divided between those who supported and those who rejected the doctrine of natural allegiance.

"Historical Register," Vol. iii. pp. 214, 215.

In February Mr. Dana moved in the Senate for papers respecting the retaliatory measures adopted; and in March a further resolution was passed, requesting the President to lay before the Senate "such information as he may possess of "the cases, with their circumstances, in which "any civilized nation has punished its native "subjects taken in arms against her, and for "which punishment retaliation has been inflicted "by the nation in whose service they were taken." The papers moved for were laid April 16, 1814. In reply to the resolution, the Secretary of State pleaded that he had not been able, from other business, to engage in a research into history, and could only observe—

"That all the nations of Europe naturalize foreigners.

"That they all employ in their service the subjects of each other, and frequently against their native countries, even when not regularly naturalized.

"That they all allow their own subjects to emigrate to foreign countries.

"That although examples may be found of the punishment of their native subjects taken in arms against them, the examples are few, and have either been marked by peculiar circumstances, taking them out of the controverted principle, or have proceeded from the passions or policy of the moment."

Negotiations for the Treaty of Ghent, 1813–14.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 701.

In the autumn of 1813 Russia had made an offer to mediate between Great Britain and the United States. This offer was accepted by the United States, but refused by England, who, however, consented to negotiate directly.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, Mr. Bayard, Mr. H. Clay, Mr. Russell, and Mr. Gallatin were appointed Commissioners on the part of the United States, and Lord Gambier, Mr. Goulbourn, and Mr. Adams on that of Great Britain.

On the 23d of April 1814 a convention for the suspension of hostilities with France was signed at Paris.

Drafts to Lord Gambier, &c.; July to December 1814. MS.

The British Commissioners were instructed to negotiate on the following points:—

1. The questions mainly affecting our maritime rights and strength, and especially the undoubted right of the Sovereign of these realms to claim and enforce in war the allegiance and service of his subjects.
2. The protection of the Indian allied tribes.
3. The boundary question.
4. The fisheries.

No. 1 to Lord Gambier; July 28, 1814.

On the first of these points they were informed that "the British Government can never recede "from the principle of holding their own subjects "to their duty of allegiance. You will endeavour "to ascertain whether the American Government "is disposed prospectively to desist from their "extravagant pretensions under this head, in "which case something might possibly be devised "to relieve their difficulties as to the past by "adopting a system of reasonable indulgence "towards individuals who may have actually and "bonâ fide settled amongst them under the faith "of their acts of naturalization. This might be "effected by stipulation without bringing the "question of right to issue on either side.

"The right of search and of withdrawing our "seamen from on board American merchant ships "can never be given up, even for a time," &c. &c. "The difficulties, however, of finding a satisfactory "expedient may perhaps render it more desirable "to waive this discussion altogether, if other "points can be adjusted. To this the British "Government will have no objection, considering "the question to be practically at rest by the "return of peace."

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 695.

Mr. Monroe, in the instructions to the American Commissioners of the 15th of April 1814, urges the importance of coming to some understanding with regard to impressments.

He points out that an Act of Congress had been passed in the previous year, forbidding the employment of British subjects in the American naval or mercantile marine, unless they could produce certificates of naturalization, showing that they had resided five years without intermission within the United States, and suggests that one of two alternatives should be adopted—either that an agreement should be come to, that the two countries should not naturalize each other's seamen; or, that if they did naturalize them, all seamen not naturalized should be excluded from their marine.

"If the alternative is adopted, that all native British subjects are to be hereafter excluded from our service, it is important that the stipulation providing for it should operate so as not to affect those who have been already naturalized. By our law all the rights of natives are given to naturalized citizens. It is contended by some that these complete rights do not extend beyond the limits of the United States; that, by naturalizing a foreigner, no State can absolve him from the obligation which he owes to his former Government, and that he becomes a citizen in a qualified sense only. This doctrine, if true in any case, is less applicable to the United States than to any other Power. Expatriation seems to be a natural right, and, by the original character of our institutions, founded by compact on principle, and particularly by the unqualified investment of the adopted citizens with the full rights of the native, all that the United States could do to place him on the same footing has been done. In point of interest, the object is of little importance to either party. The number to be affected by the stipulation is inconsiderable."

Mr. Monroe then presses on the attention of the American Commissioner the claim that the American flag should protect those who sail under it.

"The British Government, aware of the truth of this doctrine, has endeavoured to avoid its consequences in the late declaration of the Prince Regent. It has not contended that British cruisers have a right to pursue and search our vessels for British seamen. It asserts only that they have a right to search them for other objects, and being on board for a lawful cause and finding British seamen there, that they have a right to impress and bring them away under the claim of allegiance.

"It might naturally be expected that Great Britain would have given, by her conduct, some support to her pretensions; that if she had not disclaimed altogether the principle of naturalization, she would, at least, have excluded from her service foreign seamen. Her conduct, however, has been altogether at variance with her precepts. She has given great facility to naturalization in all instances where it would advance her interest, and peculiar encouragement is given to foreign seamen. She naturalizes by special Act of Parliament; she naturalizes all persons who reside a certain term of years in British colonies, all those who are born of British subjects in foreign dominions, and all seamen who have served a certain short term in the British service, and would doubtless protect all such British subjects, if required by them to do so. Her Governors of neighbouring provinces are, at this time, compelling emigrants thither from the United States to bear arms against the United States."

America, Domestic Various, MS. January to December 1814.

On the 24th of July 1814 a Proclamation was issued by the Prince Regent, recalling and prohibiting natural-born subjects of his Majesty from serving in the ships and armies of the United States.

After charging all such persons at once to quit the enemy's service, the Proclamation proceeds:—

"And whereas it has been further represented to us, that divers of our natural-born subjects as aforesaid have been induced to accept letters of Naturalization or Certificates of Citizenship from the said United States of America, vainly supposing that by such Letters or Certificates they are discharged from that duty and allegiance which, as our natural-born subjects, they owe to us: Now we do hereby warn all such our natural-born subjects, that no such Letters of Naturalization or Certificates of Citizenship do, or can in any manner discharge our natural-born subjects of the allegiance, or in any degree alter the duty which they owe to us, their natural Sovereign:" A pardon is then offered to those who have so acted under error on immediately withdrawing from the service of the United States, and notice given that any who shall persist in remaining in that service will subject themselves to be proceeded against with the utmost rigour; and, "Moreover, that all such our "subjects, as aforesaid, who have voluntarily "entered, or shall enter, or voluntarily continue to "serve, on board of any such ships of war, or in "the land forces of the said United States of "America, at enmity with us, are, and will be "guilty of high treason.

America, Domestic, Various, MS. July 1814.

A paper on the subject of Impressment (drawn up apparently by the Admiralty Advocate), containing suggestions for instructions to the British Commissioners, was submitted to Sir W. Scott, in July 1814.

The general principles therein laid down are incorporated in the despatch to the Commissioners previously quoted. The other suggestions were,—1st, that a neutral vessel found with British seamen on board should be brought in for inquiry in a Prize Court, in the same manner as vessels carrying contraband; and, 2ndly, That in case of a seaman being impressed from on board any neutral vessel, the particulars of the case should, in each instance, be at once communicated to the nearest Admiral, Consul, or other official authority of the neutral Government for investigation, and compensation given if the seaman was proved not to be a British subject.

To the first of these suggestions Sir W. Scott, for reasons given in a note written by him on the paper, most strongly objected. He thought, however, that some understanding might be arrived at on the second.

No proposal was made for dealing with the case of naturalized Americans.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. pp. 707, 708.

The Commissioners met at Ghent on the 8th of August 1814, when the British Commissioners proposed as the first point on which discussion was likely to take place, and on which they were instructed:—

"The forcible seizure of mariners from on board merchant vessels on the high seas, and in connexion with it, the right of the King of Great Britain to the allegiance of all his native subjects."

The British Commissioners at the same time intimated "that the British Government did not "propose this point as one which they were par- "ticularly desirous of discussing; but that, as it "had occupied so prominent a place in the dispute "between the two countries, it necessarily attracted "notice, and was considered as a subject which "would come under discussion."

The conference was then directed to other matters, and the subject was not renewed until the 24th of August, when the Commissioners of the United States stated that "the causes of the war "between the United States and Great Britain "having disappeared by the maritime pacifications "of Europe, the Government of the United States "did not desire to continue it in defence of abstract "principles, which have, for the present, ceased "to have any practical effect. The undersigned "have been accordingly instructed to agree to its "termination, both parties restoring whatever ter- "ritory they may have taken, and both reserving all "their rights in relation to their respective seamen. "To make the peace between the two nations solid "and permanent, the undersigned were also "instructed, and have been prepared to enter into "the most amicable discussion of all those points. ". . . It is, therefore, with extreme regret "that the undersigned have seen that other views "are entertained by the British Government, and "that new and unexpected pretensions are raised, "which . . . will only be a fit subject of "deliberation when it becomes necessary to decide "upon the expediency of an absolute surrender of "the national independence."

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 725.

On the 21st of October the British Commissioners made the following communication with respect to the forcible seizure of mariners from on board merchant vessels on the high seas, and the right of the King of Great Britain to the allegiance of his native subjects: "and with respect to the "maritime rights of the British Empire, the un- "dersigned conceive that, after the pretensions "asserted by the Government of the United States, "a more satisfactory proof of the conciliatory "spirit of His Majesty's Government cannot be "given than by not requiring any stipulation on. "those subjects which, though most important in "themselves, no longer, in consequence of the "maritime pacification of Europe, produce the "same practical results."

From Lord Gambier, MS. August to December 1814.

The American Commissioners, however, although the subject had thus been put aside without discussion, reverted to it in their note of the 10th of November, submitting a draft of a Treaty.

"The only other subjects which had been presented by the undersigned as suitable for discussion are those respecting seamen, blockades, and indemnities.

"Keeping in view the declarations made by Lord Castlereagh in his note of the 29th of August 1812 to Mr. Russell, and in his letter of the 4th of November 1813 to Mr. Monroe, the undersigned propose only a temporary article, intended without affecting the rights or pretensions of either country, to attempt to accomplish by means less liable to vexation, the object for which impressment has hitherto been thought necessary by great Britain. The proposed agreement being purely conditional, and limited in duration, each party will be bound only so far and so long as the other shall fulfil its conditions; and at the end of the term fixed for the duration of the article, or whenever either party may fail to perform his engagement, the rights of both will be as valid and entire as they were before the agreement."

The article was the 11th in the draft treaty.

"Article XI. Each party shall effectually exclude from its naval and commercial service all seamen, seafaring or other persons, subjects or citizens of the other party not naturalized by the respective Governments of the two parties before the day of "Seamen or other persons subjects of either party who shall desert from public or private ships or vessels shall, when found within the jurisdiction of the other party be surrendered, provided they be demanded within from the time of their desertion.

"No person whatever shall, upon the high seas, and without the jurisdiction of either party, be demanded or taken out of any ship or vessel belonging to subjects or citizens of one of the parties, by the public or private armed ships or vessels belonging to or in the service of the other unless such person be at the time in the actual employment of an enemy of such other party.

"This article shall continue in force for the term of years. Nothing in this article contained shall be construed thereafter to affect or impair the rights of either party."

This article was struck out of the draft by the British Commissioners, who, in their note of the 26th of November, remark, "with respect to "Articles XI. and XII. (regarding blockades), Her "Majesty's Government has strongly manifested its "sincere disposition to the speedy restoration of "peace by agreeing under all the present circum- "stances to conclude the treaty without any stipu- "lation on the points to which those articles relate. "No advantage can arise from entering into dis- "cussion, upon a successful result of which the "American Plenipotentiaries have stated more "than once, that they will not make the conclu- "sion of the peace at all depend."

Nevertheless, the American Commissioners reproduced this XIth Article in their second draft of a treaty. It was then again returned to them marked "inadmissible," and on the 30th of November they consented to omit it. They say:—

"They will also waive the residue of that (the XIIIth) Article and the XIth Article, it being understood that the rights of both Powers on the subject of seamen . . . shall not be affected or impaired by the omission in the treaty of any specification with respect to those two subjects.

"In forebearing to insist upon the discussion of subjects deeply involving interests important to their country, and upon which the undersigned view the proposal offered by them for consideration as founded upon principles the most moderate and conciliatory, they give the strongest evidence of the anxious wish of their Government, that the negotiation should be brought to a happy issue."

The Treaty of Peace was accordingly signed on the 24th of December 1814, without any provisions being inserted in it respecting either impressment or blockade, nor is any reference made to those subjects in the President's message of the 18th of February 1815, communicating the treaty to Congress.

Hertslet's "State Papers" Vol. ii, pp. 355, 357.

The IIId Article of the treaty provides for the mutual restoration of prisoners.

Restoration of Hostages.

On the 16th of July, a Convention for the exchange of prisoners had been concluded, which contained a stipulation that the 23 British soldiers put into confinement as hostages by the United States, and the 46 American commissioned and non-commissioned officers put into confinement in retaliation for the confinement of these 23 soldiers, should be immediately released and exchanged in the same manner as other prisioners of war.

American "State Papers," Vol. iii. p. 728.

On the 12th of August 1814, the American Commissary-General of prisoners, writing to Colonel Barclay, states that all the British hostages had been placed on the footing of ordinary prisoners, and gives as the reason that the American Government had been informed by their agent in London, that the seamen sent to England for trial had been similarly treated.

No further cases of retaliation seem to have occurred, nor were any of the seamen put on their trial for treason.

It is alleged that, in consequence of the Americans omitting to supply any means of conveyance across Lake Erie, many of the released hostages were detained there so long that they were attacked by lake fever, and several of them died.

James "History of the Military Occurrences of the War," Vol. i. p. 184.

Case of the "Ann."

During the war of 1812–14, a case was brought before the Court of Admiralty in which the claim of a British subject, naturalized in America, to retain the privileges of a British subject under the Order in Council of 1812, providing for the restitution of British ships sailing under the American flag, was rejected by Sir W. Scott, who decided that a British-born subject may, by his employment and residence in a foreign country, acquire a new national character for commercial purposes.

As this case is frequently referred to by writers on the subject of naturalization, a copy of the Report (2 Dobson p. 221, Robinson's Admiralty Reports, Vol. VIII.), is appended to this Memorandum.

Addenda C.

Mr. Rush's Negotiations, 1818.

In 1818 another attempt was made to settle the Impressment controversy.

Residence at e Court of Lon- n." By Mr. ush. 1833. age 359.

essage to the ouse of Repre- ntatives, Feb- ary 15, 1823: 'ith the Corre- ondence rela- ng to the Ne- otiation of the onvention of ctober 20, 1823. nclosure in Mr. tratford Can- ing's No. 27. larch 4, 1823.)

A full account of the negotiations is given by Mr. Rush, who was the United States Minister in England from 1817 to 1825, in his "Residence at the Court of London."

Mr. Rush delivered to Lord Castlereagh two propositions which, taken together, embodied an offer by the United States to exclude, by all the means in their power, British seamen, native-born or naturalized, from their service. As an equivalent they demanded that impressment from their vessels should be totally relinquished. The stipulation for excluding seamen to be reciprocal. The exclusion to extend to the public and private marine of both nations.

This offer of exclusion was at first rejected, but afterwards considered. Two conditions were then annexed to it by Lord Castlereagh: one, that any Treaty containing the mutual stipulations should be revocable on short notice by either party. The other condition was, that the British boarding officer entering American vessels at sea for purposes agreed to be lawful in time of war, and finding British seamen, or men suspected to be such, should be allowed to make a proces-verbal of the fact, to be presented to the notice of the American Government, but the officer to be prohibited from taking away the men.

At the third conference, the British Plenipotentiaries submitted a project of six articles designed for the regulation, by a separate Treaty, of the whole subject.

Article I. stipulated for the reciprocal exclusion of natural-born subjects and citizens of either party from the marine of the other, "Provided always "that nothing contained in this Article shall be "understood to apply to such natural-born subjects "or citizens of either Power as may have been "naturalized by their respective laws, previous "to the signature of the present Treaty.

"Art. 2. For the better ascertaining the number of persons on either side that may fall within the exception contained in the preceding Article, the High Contracting Paaties engage to deliver, each to the other, within 12 months from the ratification of the present treaty, a list of all persons falling within the said exception, specifying the places of their birth, with the date of their becoming naturalized. And it is further agreed that none other than the persons whose names shall be included in the lists, shall be deemed to fall within the said exception."

Art. 3. The Contracting Parties reserved power to authorize, by proclamation, their subjects and citizens to serve in the marine of the other country.

Art. 4. During the continuance of the Treaty, neither party to impress from the vessels of the other on the high seas: Provided always, that nothing contained in this article shall be construed to apply to the vessels of either power which may be within the ports or within the maritime jurisdiction of the other; and also provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or affect the established right of search as authorized in time of war by the law of nations.

Art. 5. The treaty to endure for 10 years, but terminable at six months' notice.

Art. 6. It is agreed that nothing contained in the preceding articles shall be understood to affect the rights and privileges on which the high contracting parties have heretofore acted, except so far as the same shall have been modified by the said Articles. On the termination and abrogation of the Treaty, or in the event of war between the two Parties, the said Parties to stand with respect to each other, as to the said rights and privileges, as if no such Treaty had ever been made.

The American Plenipotentiaries proposed several amendments, two of which proved fatal to the projected Articles.

In Article 2 they objected to the list of naturalized citizens; and, as a substitute, proposed that "no naturalized subject or citizen of either Power "whose name should not be included in the list "should be deemed to fall within the exception, "unless he produced proof of his having been duly "naturalized prior to the exchange of ratifications "of the Treaty."

Mr. Rush adduced as reasons for being unable to accede to the proposal of keeping a list, that previously to 1789, persons were naturalized by the States, and the form of naturalization not being uniform no record could in many instances be obtained. No discrimination of the birth-place of aliens was recorded. There was no means of making the States' Courts supply information for such a list, and even if it were obtained it would not designate seamen nor the minor children of naturalized persons, of whom no register was kept; in short, the scheme was, he alleged, impracticable, and the consequence of consenting to it would have been that aliens naturalized before the Treaty, and entitled to all the rights of citizenship, would, by an ex post facto measure, have been excluded from following their pursuit of seamanship.

The Plenipotentiaries further objected to the term in the first Article,—"signature of the present Treaty," and proposed to substitute "ratification."

The British Government would not give way on either of these points, and the negotiation was consequently abandoned.

Mr. Rush adds, "This subject falling through, "others of a maritime nature were withdrawn. It "had been agreed that none were to be proceeded "with, if we failed on impressment. We offered "Articles on blockade contraband, trading with the "Colonies of a belligerent, for the regulation of "proceedings in prize cases, and the conduct of "privateers and letters of marque. Britain had "joined in offers on most of them, omitting the "third. Their discussion was carried on to some "extent, but given over when we discovered that "we could not arrange the point on which all "depended."

Lord Ashburton's Mission.

The long peace which followed the overthrow of Napoleon, and the subsequent establishment of a voluntary system for the manning of the navy, prevented any occasions arising on which questions regarding naturalization and allegiance could be brought into dispute between Great Britain and the United States, from the exercise of impressment on the high seas.

The United States, however, did not fail to watch jealously any assertion of British authority which might seem to revive the obnoxious claim to visit and search their vessels, and at once raised objections when the proposal was made in 1841 for a joint agreement by the maritime Powers authorizing their respective cruizers to visit suspected slavers within certain latitudes.

Lord Ashburton's special mission to the United States followed in 1842.

Lord Ashburton was authorized to negotiate for the settlement of all existing differences between the two countries.

On the 8th of August 1842 Mr. Webster addressed a long note to Lord Ashburton, calling his attention to the importance of coming to some definite understanding respecting impressment.

Parliamentary Papers relative to Lord Ashburton's Special Mission in 1842. Presented 1843, page 59.

After showing that all efforts to come to such an understanding during the last 50 years had failed, he proceeds:—

"England asserts the right of impressing British subjects in time of war, out of neutral merchant vessels, and of deciding by her visiting officers who, among the crews of such merchant vessels, are British subjects. She asserts this as a legal exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, which prerogative is alleged to be founded on the English law of the perpetual and indissoluble allegiance of the subject, and his obligation under all circumstances, and for his whole life, to render military service to the Crown whenever required. . . . . The claim asserts an extra-territorial authority for the law of British prerogative; and assumes to exercise this extra-territorial authority to the manifest injury and annoyance of the citizens and subjects of other States on board their own vessels on the high seas.

"Every merchant vessel on the seas is rightfully considered as a part of the territory of the country to which it belongs. . . . English soil, English territory, English jurisdiction, is the appropriate sphere for the operation of English law. The ocean is the sphere of the law of nations, and by that law every merchant vessel on the seas is under the protection of the laws of her own nation," &c.

He then argues, that "if this notion of perpetual allegiance," was the law of the world, and was usually practised like the right of search for enemies' goods in time of war, it might be admissible, but that it is an English law, and can only be exercised of right within English jurisdiction.

He next refers to the great number of emigrants from Great Britain to the United States, "a greater "or less number of whom becoming in time naturalized citizens, enter into the merchant service "under the flag of their adopted country," and urges that nothing could be more unjust than for England to seek out these persons in time of war, and compel them to take arms for a country which has ceased to be their own country.

For these and other reasons, such as the great inconvenience to which neutral merchants are subjected by the practice, Mr. Webster declares, on behalf of the American Government, "that the "impressment of seamen from American vessels "cannot hereafter be allowed to take place. That "practice is founded on principles which it does "not recognize, and is invariably attended by "consequences so unjust, so injurious, and of such "formidable magnitude, as cannot be submitted "to. . . . . In every regularly documented "American merchant vessel, the crew who navi-"gate it will find their protection in the flag which "is over them."

Lord Ashburton replied, August 9, that his instructions were limited to existing subjects of difference, "and no differences have, or could have, "arisen of late years with respect to impressment, "because the practice has, since the peace, wholly "ceased, and cannot, consistently with existing "laws and regulations for manning Her Majesty's "Navy, be under present circumstances renewed. ". . . . I am well aware that the laws of our "two countries maintain opposite principles respecting allegiance to the Sovereign. America, re-"ceiving every year by thousands the emigrants "of Europe, maintains the doctrine suitable to her "condition, of the right of transferring allegiance "at will. The laws of Great Britain have at all "times maintained the opposite doctrine. The "duties of allegiance are held to be indefeasible, "and it is believed that this doctrine, under "various modifications, prevails in most, if not "in all, the civilised States of Europe. . . We "may safely leave this part of the subject without "indulging in abstract speculations, having no ma-"terial practical application to matters in discussion "between us."

It does not appear that anything further was done upon this overture from the American Government, and the subject of impressment thenceforth ceased to be a matter of discussion or dispute between the two countries.

Cases in Ireland in 1848.

The next occasion on which the question of disputed allegiance was raised was at the time of the disturbances in Ireland in 1848.

Her Majesty's Government having been informed that a plot had been entered into in America for sending over detachments of men to co-operate with the Irish malcontents, orders were given in August, 1848, to arrest every American or returned emigrant landing in Ireland. In September the order was modified to the arrest of suspicious persons and the search of American baggage. Hertslet's "State Papers," Vol. xlvii. p. 1222, et seq.

Under these orders a Mr. Bergen, a native American, and a Mr. Ryan, an Irishman naturalized in America, were arrested and detained.

Mr. Bancroft, then United States' Minister in London, was instructed to interfere on their behalf, which he did, and was informed that they had been arrested as being concerned in treasonable practices under the Act 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 35.

Lord Palmerston added that Mr. Ryan had been shown to be a British subject.

In reporting his proceedings to the President, Mr. Bancroft calls attention to this statement, and as an assertion in Mr. Ryan's case of the British doctrine of perpetual allegiance.

"Two questions," Mr. Bancroft says, "then "arise: Does a naturalized citizen owe allegiance "to any country but that of his adoption? and "does the return of a naturalized citizen, for tran-"sient purposes, to his native country bring back "upon him the obligation of allegiance to that "country?" Ibid. p. 1235.

Mr. Buchanan replies, October 23: "Treason "cannot be committed by a citizen of the United "States against a foreign Government; and we "are bound by every principle of faith and national "honour to maintain the doctrine firmly in favour "of our naturalized as our native citizens." Ibid. p. 1236.

Five days afterwards Mr. Buchanan acknowledges that he was "too hasty in stating that "treason could not be committed by a citizen of "the United States against a foreign Govern-"ment."

He then shows that aliens are liable in the United States, as well as in Great Britain, to trial for treasonable offences committed within the country's jurisdiction.

He concludes the despatch—"Whenever the "occasion may require it, you will resist the "British doctrine of perpetual allegiance, and "maintain the American principle, that British "native-born subjects, after they have been naturalized under our laws, are, to all intents and "purposes, as much American citizens, and entitled "to the same degree of protection, as though they "had been born in the United States."

On the 17th of November, Mr. Bergen and Mr. Ryan were liberated on condition of their leaving the kingdom.

Mr. Bancroft, however, considered himself bound to carry out the President's instructions, although the necessity for doing so had now ceased, and on the 26th of January addressed a representation to Lord Palmerston, remonstrating against any distinction being at any time made between naturalized and native Americans. He argued that by permitting emigration, England recognized the right of expatriation, and that to continue to claim the allegiance of those who had left her shores and taken up their abode in a foreign country, was to endeavour to plant alien colonies within that country, and to exercise the prerogative of royalty within a republic. United States "Congress Papers," Executive Documents, 1859-60, Vol. ii. p. 161.

Mr. Bancroft's letter concludes as follows:—

"It is quite time that the two nations should come to an understanding on this subject. If the United Kingdom really wishes to retain as subjects all the natives of this realm, let the United Kingdom forbid the emigration of its sons. But if their emigration is permitted, and even stimulated, the land which accepts the anxious responsibility of receiving them must take full power of regulating their political condition."

Lord Palmerston's reply of the 16th of August, 1849, is of importance as containing an authoritative declaration of the position occupied by Her Majesty's Government on this question, and is of special interest with reference to the present state of affairs in Ireland.

It must be remembered that when the arrests, out of which the discussion arose, were made, the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended in Ireland.

" Lord Palmerston to Mr. Bancroft.

" Foreign Office, August 16, 1849.

" The Undersigned, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the note which Mr. Bancroft, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America at this Court, addressed to him on the 26th of January last, referring to the imprisonment in Ireland of some American citizens, who were arrested in that country in August 1848, under the Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 35, and remonstrating against the consequences of the doctrine which Mr. Bancroft assumes to be maintained in this country in regard to the allegiance due to the Queen from Her Majesty's natural-born subjects.

" In reply, the undersigned begs to state, that he apprehends that the remonstrance contained in Mr. Bancroft's note has originated in a mistaken notion as to the doctrine held by Her Majesty's Government upon this matter ; because Mr. Bancroft states that one consequence of the British doctrine of natural allegiance is, that Great Britain denies to the United States the right of regulating the condition of emigrants from Great Britain in such manner 'as may most conduce to the well-'being of the emigrants and the safety of the '[American] commonweaith.' Now, although by the law of England natural allegiance is a tie which cannot be severed or altered by anything but the 'united concurrence of the legislature,' and although it is true (as observed by Mr. Justice Story, an eminent American authority,) that 'every nation has 'hitherto assumed it as clear, that its laws extend to 'and bind natural-born subjects at all times and in 'all places,' yet Her Majesty's Government did not dissent from the opinion of the same learned Judge, that 'in speaking of the right of a state to bind its 'own native subjects everywhere, we speak only of 'its own claim and exercise of sovereignty over 'them, and not of its rights to compel or require 'obedience to such laws, on the part of other 'nations;' and Her Majesty's Government concur with Mr. Justice Story, in maintaining that 'every 'nation has an exclusive right to regulate persons 'and things within its own territory according to 'its own sovereign will and polity.'

" The undersigned considers the above exposition of public law to be perfectly correct, and it appears to him to meet the objections to the doctrine of Her Majesty's Government which have been raised in Mr. Bancroft's note.

" With reference to those observations of Mr. Bancroft, from which it would appear that he assumes that Her Majesty's Government is disposed to doubt whether the poorer classes of emigrants who have come from Great Britain to the United States have a natural right to expatriate themselves, the undersigned begs to observe that it has never been denied by the British Government that those persons leave this country by virtue of that right, which is asserted by Mr. Bancroft to be the foundation of all liberty, namely, 'the right of every reasonable being to seek a new country;' and it is well known that by the laws of Great Britain no restraint can, except in very special cases, be placed upon the perfect liberty of every British subject to leave the realm, when and for whatever period of time he chooses. It does not appear, however, that the passage quoted by Mr. Bancroft from Cicero* sanctions expatriation, in the sense of a voluntary abjuration of natural allegiance, without the assent of the Sovereign power ; nor does an emigrant's departure from Great Britain debar him from returning thereto, at any subsequent time, as a natural-born subject. So long as the emigrant remains in the United States, or in any other country, he is amenable to the laws of the country in which he resides ; and it cannot therefore be said as suggested in Mr. Bancroft's note, that the British Crown, by permitting its subjects to emigrate to the United States, is sending among the United States not only people to be provided for by sharing in the opportunities for industry, but 'subjects,' who may get arms and still serve Her Majesty, or that England is planting garrisons in all the territories of the Union.

" The undersigned has also to observe that Mr. Bancroft has referred generally to the orders issued in Ireland last year for the arrest of suspected persons, and has alluded to the distinction drawn by Her Majesty's Government between native and naturalized American citizens ; and, although Mr. Bancroft's argument does not bear specifically upon that point, the undersigned begs leave to repeat what he has stated in his previous correspondence with Mr. Bancroft respecting this matter, namely : that natural-born subjects of Great Britain, who may have become naturalized in a foreign country, but who return to the United Kingdon, are as amenable as any other of Her Majesty's subjects to any laws which may be in force, either of a permanent or of a temporary nature; and the maxim, 'ignorantia legis non excusat,' must apply to them as well as to those who may be permaneutly resident within the United Kingdom.

" The undersigned begs, in conclusion, further to remark, that the Stat. 13 Geo. II. c. 7, to which Mr. Bancroft has adverted, has no bearing upon the status of a native of Great Britain naturalized in the United States. That statute applies only to persons not being subjects of Great Britain, who settled in America before the declaration of American independence. And it never has been contended by Great Britain that that statute would affect in the slightest degree the 'status' of the foreign settler as a subject of the country of his origin, if he should think proper to return to such country.

" The undersigned has the honour, &c.

" PALMERSTON.

" George Bancroft, Esq.,
" &c. &c. &c."

This closed the correspondence, and the controversy again lay dormant until the

CIVIL WAR IN THE UNITED STATES, 1861–65.

Conscription in Northern and Southern States.

The outbreak of the Civil War changed the relative position of the disputants.

Hitherto it had been always the United States who had been pleading the cause of the emigrant. It was now England's turn to be called upon to interfere on his behalf.

The British Consulates were crowded by applicants hastening to register themselves as British subjects, and to assert their claims to British Protection ; and even those who had taken the preliminary proceeding for a renunciation of their allegiance clamoured for the shelter of the flag which they had been preparing to desert.

* "Ne quis invitus civitate mutetur: neve in civitate maneat invitus," &c.

It would be impossible to give a résumé of all the cases that occurred, but an attempt will be made to include in this Memorandum most of those in which questions of allegiance were dealt with.

On the 13th of April 1861 Fort Sumter surrendered, and on the 15th the President issued his Proclamation, calling out 75,000 men of the Militia.

Previously to this, Messrs. Pearson and Cox had applied to Lord Lyons respecting their liability, as British subjects, to serve in the Missouri and Virginia Militia.

To Lord Lyons, No. 76; April 4, 1861.

Lord Lyons was instructed "that there is no "rule or principle of international law which "prohibits the Government of any country from "requiring aliens, resident within its territories, "to serve in the Militia or Police of the country "or to contribute to the support of such establish-"ments.

"It would appear that in this country the question whether an alien could be compelled to serve in the Militia has never been authoritatively decided."

If, however, the Militia were to be embodied for active service, and no alternative of providing substitutes were permitted, "the position of "British subjects would appear to deserve very "favourable consideration, and to call for every "exertion being made in their favour on the part "of Her Majesty's Government."

To Lord Lyons, No. 349; October 7, 1861.

In July, Lord Lyons again applied for instructions in this head, and was informed, that although Her Majesty's Government "might well be content "to leave British subjects voluntarily domiciled in "a foreign country, liable to all the obligations "ordinarily incident to such foreign domicil; in-"cluding, when imposed by the municipal law of "such country, service in the Militia or National "Guard, or Local Police, for the maintenance of "internal peace and order, or even, to a limited "extent, for the defence of the territory from "foreign invasion; it is not reasonable to expect "that her Majesty's Government," should passively allow British subjects to be compelled to serve in the armies in a Civil War, where, besides the ordinary incidents of battle, they might be exposed to be treated as rebels and traitors in a quarrel in which, as aliens, they would have no concern; and that, if such enforced enlistment were persisted in, Her Majesty's Government would be obliged to concert with other neutral Powers for the protection of their respective subjects.

Lord Lyons, No. 379; July 29, 1861.

It appears, however, that "in no case, either in "the Northern or Southern States, had the dis-"charge of a British subject, enlisted against his "will, been refused or delayed on proper repre-"sentation being made."

Refusal of American Passports to intended Citizens.

Lord Lyons, No. 448; August 26, 1861.

A regulation having been made in August by the United States Government that foreigners who wished to leave the country must be provided with passports, Lord Lyons inquired of the United States Secretary of State whether persons who had announced their intention to become naturalized were included in this regulation, and was told officially by Mr. Hunter, in reply, that "until the "final act of naturalization such a person is to all "intents and purposes a subject or citizen of his "native country."

Mr. Carlisle, the legal adviser of the Legation, was also consulted, and gave it as his opinion that "such persons remain aliens until the complete "final act, owing none of the duties and entitled "to none of the peculiar protections of allegiance.."

Under these circumstances, Lord Lyons was directed "to grant passports to the persons in "question as a general rule, it being of course "understood that the granting of a passport was a "matter for his Lordship's discretion, and not one "of strict legal right."

Suspension of Habeas Corpus Act in Northern States.

Parliamentary Papers. "North America," No. 1, 1862.

A correspondence now commenced as to the right of the President to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act without the sanction of Congress, and Lord Lyons was instructed to remonstrate against the arbitrary arrests of British subjects, but no question of allegiance was raised.

Mr. Seward, on the 11th of October, denied the right of Her Majesty's Government to protest, and added that "in every case subjects of Her Majesty "residing in the United States, and under their "protection, are treated during the present troubles "in the same manner, and with no greater or less "rigour, than American citizens."

Claim to British Protection of Minor Children of Naturalized Americans.

November 4, 1861.

In October a claim to British protection was set up by three persons who had been arrested at Baltimore on the ground that they were minors, natural-born British subjects, whose fathers had been naturalized in the United States.

A similar claim was urged on behalf of a Mr. James Hoy, a merchant of New York.

The United States Government declared that such persons were American citizens, and Mr. Carlisle reported that, by the statute law of the United States, minors in this position were regarded as American citizens, and obtained and enjoyed in the United States all the rights and benefits incident to that character.

Her Majesty's Government decided that minors who were born in Her Majesty's dominions, but whose fathers had become naturalized American citizens, ought during their minority to be considered and treated as between the two Governments, not as British subjects, but as American citizens, and that they must continue to be so considered if, after attaining their majority, they had continued to remain domiciled in the United States, and had not taken any active steps to absolve themselves from their allegiance to that country.

Status in Confederate States of Persons naturalized in the United States.

To Lord Lyons, No. 259; June 7 1862.

Early in 1862 Mr. Coppell, Her Majesty's Consul at New Orleans, requested instructions as to the answer which he should return to persons applying to him for information as to the status within the Confederate States of those who had been naturalized within the United States.

Lord Lyons was directed to inform Mr. Coppell and any other of Her Majesty's Consuls who might require information on the matter:

1. That a natural-born British subject, who had been naturalized in the United States would not be recognized by Her Majesty's Government within the United States as a British subject, but if he returned to British territory his native allegiance would revert.

2. In the event of the independence of the Confederate States being established, Her Majesty's Government would not interfere on behalf of such naturalized Americans, and their status must be left to be determined by the Government of those States. Naturalized citizens would have a right to claim from the United States to be treated with regard to a transfer of allegiance in the same manner as native citizens. Until, however, the independence of the Confederate States was recognized, the United States would be justified in enforcing against all persons resident therein the obligations of the oath of allegiance which they had taken.

3. In the event of the Confederate States becoming independent, Her Majesty's Government would not be bound, nor would the Confederate States, to recognize such persons as British subjects, nor would their return to Great Britain, and renunciation there of their United States allegiance make any difference in this respect.

Oath of Allegiance at New Orleans.

. Stuart's, No. 1862.

General Butler having assumed the Government of New Orleans, compelled all resident aliens, who had been domiciled within the United States for more than five years, to take an oath of allegiance, and all aliens claiming any of the ordinary legal rights of residence (with the single exception of "protection from personal violence") to take an oath of neutrality, binding upon them, wherever they might be, so long as their Government was at peace with the United States.

Mr. Stuart, ..., August 1862.

These orders having been revoked as regards foreigners, and those who had been forced to take the oaths having been "dispensed from its obligations," Mr. Stuart was not instructed to remonstrate unless an attempt should be made to re-impose them.

Conscription in Northern States.—Liability of Intended Citizens, Voters, and Sons of Naturalized Citizens.

nited States' Statutes at rge," Vol. xii. 597.

On the 17th of July an Act of Congress was passed, calling out the Militia.

Its operation was confined to Citizens of the United States. "The enrolment of Militia shall "in all cases include all able-bodied male citizens "between the ages of 18 and 45."

rliamentary ..., "North ..erica," No. 1. 63, p. 10.

On the 5th of August a draft of 300,000 men was called out, and, on the 8th, orders were issued forbidding persons liable to the draft from leaving the country, and great numbers of persons were arrested. At Mr. Stuart's request instructions were given not to detain alien travellers.

id. p. 13.

North ..." No. 1. 63; pp. 25, 26.

Much inconvenience being apprehended from the divergence of practice in the Northern States with regard to the exemption of aliens from the Draft, Mr. Anderson of the Foreign Office, at that time attached to Her Majesty's Legation, was directed by Mr. Stuart to go to the several States and endeavour to arrange with the Governors for the adoption of some system to secure the immunity of British subjects.

Mr. Anderson succeeded in establishing an understanding that notarial or County Court affidavits should be accepted as evidence of nationality, and thereby overcame the principal difficulty which arose in dealing practically with the matter.

He found, however, that in Ohio the State Governor considered persons who had declared their intention of becoming United States citizens to be citizens within the meaning of the Act of Congress.

Moreover, it was generally asserted that the exercise of the elective franchise debarred British subjects from claiming exemption.

Mr. Anderson, in his communications with the Governors, contended that "if an alien had exer- "cised any of the exclusive privileges of a citizen, "he had rendered himself liable to the obligations "of citizenship; if he had exercised only those "privileges which an alien is entitled to exercise, "he was still entitled to the immunities of alien- "ship."

There was some difference of opinion on this point. The Governor of Indiana was anxious to claim all voters, while the Governor of Illinois concurred in the views thus expressed, and believed they would be adopted in all the Western States.

Another point on which there appeared to be a diversity of opinion was with regard to the status of the sons of naturalized citizens.

"1. Those born in the country. Respecting these there is no difficulty.

"2. Those not in the country at the time of the naturalization of their parents. These, I understand, are not claimed by the United States Government.

"3. Those in the country at the time of the naturalization of their parents. When under age, it is claimed that they follow the nationality of their parents, and this, it appears, is also the law of Great Britain."

(On these points see the case of Hoy and others, ante.)

The question with regard to persons who had "declared their intention," was set at rest by the publication of the following letter from Mr. Seward to Mr. Stuart:—

"Department of State, Washington,
"Sir, August 20, 1862.

"Having informally understood from you that British subjects who had merely declared their intention to become citizens of the United States had expressed apprehensions that they might be drafted into the Militia, under the late requisition of the War Department, I have the honour to acquaint you, for their information, that none but citizens are liable to Militia duty in this country, and that this Department has never regarded an alien, who may have merely declared his intention to become a citizen, as entitled to a passport, and consequently has always withheld from persons of that character any such certificate of citizenship.

"I have, &c.
"(Signed) W. H. Seward.

"The Hon. W. Stuart,
"Her Britannic Majesty's
"Chargé d'Affaires, &c."

Southern Conscription.—Domicil.

To Mr. Stuart, No. 144; October 10, 1862.

In October, Mr. Consul Coppell made some further inquiries as to the course which he should pursue in certain cases arising out of disputed points of international law relative to property and domicile, and Mr. Stuart was furnished with the following instructions:—"That a domicil estab- "lished by length of residence only, without "naturalization or any other formal act whereby "the domiciled person has, so to speak, incorpo- "rated himself into the state in which he resides, "does not 'for the time convert him into a subject "'of the domicil in all respects save the allegiance "'he owes his native Sovereign.' Such a domi- "ciled person is not a civis, but a temporary "subject subditus temporarius of the State in "which he is resident. He cannot lawfully be "compelled to serve in the military forces of that "State against any other State, or be compelled "to enrol himself in the militia of the State: "though it would be his duty to co-operate with "native citizens when called upon to do so by the "proper authorities, in keeping the peace and "preserving good order in the particular place in "which he resides, as, for instance, against thieves "or pirates."

In accordance with the instruction thus conveyed to Mr. Stuart, Lord Russell addressed a Circular Despatch to Her Majesty's Consuls in the Southern States on the 11th of October 1862, directing them to remonstrate strongly against the forced enlistment of British subjects, pointing out that "British "subjects domiciled only by residence in the so- "called Confederate States cannot be forcibly "enlisted in the military service of those States "by virtue of an ex post facto law, when no muni- "cipal law existed at the time of the establishment "of their domicile, rendering them liable to such "service.

Parliamentary Papers, "North America," No. 13, 1864, p. 34.

"It may be competent to a State in which a domiciled foreigner may reside to pass such an ex post facto law, if at the same time option is offered to foreigners affected by it to quit after a reasonable period the territory, if they object to serve in the armies of the State: but without this option such a law would violate the principles of international law; and, even with such an option, the comity hitherto observed between independent States would not be very scrupulously observed."

Lord Russell at the same time desired the Consuls to urge the anomaly of British subjects being forced to engage in a war which their own Sovereign had forbidden them under heavy penalties to take part in.

Mr. Shaver's Case.

A case which had occurred in 1861, of the arrest of a British subject, Mr. Shaver, led to a rather curious correspondence with the United States Government on the question of domicil, and it may be useful to notice it in connexion with the pretensions of the Confederates to enlist domiciled aliens.

"North America," No. 7. 1862.

Mr. Shaver was a travelling agent of the Grand Trunk Railway, whose wife and family resided in Canada. He was arrested in the United States, and taken to Fort Warren, where the oath of allegiance was tendered to him, which he refused to take, and he was eventually released on taking an oath of neutrality.

The United States Government refused all compensation (though it was apparently admitted that there was no charge against Mr. Shaver) and raised the point of his domicil.

Mr. Shaver's claim is one of those which are still waiting for adjustment.

Mr. Sellers' Case.

Mr. Sellers, a British subject, who had announced his intention to become naturalized, applied on the 7th of October 1862, to be informed whether he could claim the protection of Her Majesty's Government.

He was told, October 20, that as he had so acted without consulting Her Majesty's Government, he must "not expect that, until a case shall arise, in "which their interference may be requested, Her "Majesty's Government will give any opinion of "the view which they may take of such a case."

Forced Military Labour.

To Mr. Stuart, No. 190; November 15, 1862.

In November complaints were made of British subjects being forced to work in the trenches in the military operations in the Western States, and Mr. Stuart was informed that, as a general principle of international law, neutral aliens ought not to be compelled to perform any military service, but that allowance must be made for the conduct of authorities in cities under martial law, and in daily peril of attack from the enemy.

Status of Widows.

The state of affairs at New Orleans made British protection eagerly sought after, and Mr. Coppell had several applications addressed to him by widows who laid claim to it.

To Mr. Stuart, No. 189; November 15, 1862.

Mr. Stuart was informed that, in the case of American-born widows of British subjects, if the American law was at variance with that of this country (conferring upon the wives of British subjects the privileges of natural-born British subjects), and the United States desired to put the American law in force, the American law must prevail, and that American-born widows being resident in America would not be entitled to the certificate of being British subjects.

In the cases of British-born subjects, the widows of American or foreign husbands, Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that if, after the dissolution of their coverture, they should elect to claim the benefit of their British character, they would be at liberty to do so, and must be treated and protected as British subjects.

Southern Conscription.

To Lord Lyons, No. 293; November 27, 1862.

The passing of a new Conscript Act in the so-called Confederate States having caused fresh complaints from British subjects of ill-treatment under its provisions, Lord Lyons was informed on the 27th of November that Her Majesty's Government considered "it was competent to the so-styled "Confederate Government to include in the con-"scription British subjects permanently resident "in those States, if they refuse the option duly "tendered to them of leaving the country within "a reasonable time, and with reasonable opportu-"nities of compliance, but not otherwise.

"It is, of course, to be understood that foreigners permanently residing, but not naturalized in a State, are entitled to the option of leaving that State in the event of new laws being passed in it which affect their status and alter the obligation which they contracted at the time when they became domiciled in it."

Liability of Voters to Conscription.

Besides the difficulties arising out of the status of "intended" citizens, a further question was raised as to the right to British protection of British subjects, not naturalized, who had voted at the State Elections or otherwise exercised the privileges of citizenship.

From Mr. Stuart, No. 99; July 25, 1862.

In July 1862, Mr. Stuart had issued a circular to Her Majesty's Consuls directing them "to ascer-"tain in each instance of an application for a "certificate of British nationality, whether the "applicant has ever voted at elections in the "United States, or has in any other way exercised "any of the exclusive privileges of a citizen, as, "should it be proved that he has done so, he "would thereby forfeit his claim to protection, "even though he should not have formally re-"nounced his allegiance to Her Majesty the "Queen."

Mr. Stuart, No. 123; August 3, 1862.

At a subsequent interview with Mr. Seward Mr. Stuart told him, in reply to an observation he had made, that Her Majesty's Government had no desire to protect such persons.

Numerous representations having been addressed to Mr. Stuart by persons who had voted in States where electors could vote as State citizens without being national citizens, and who pleaded that they did not come within the terms of the Act of Congress which confined the draft to citizens, Mr. Stuart applied to Mr. Seward to be informed of the views of the State Department.

Mr. Seward replied in the following letter:—

"Department of State, Washington,

"Sir, October 24, 1862.

United States' Executive Documents 1863-64, vol. i. p. 456.

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, and, so far as it relates to the liability of aliens who may have exercised the right of suffrage to military duty in this country, to state, in reply, that no doubt is entertained upon that point by this Department. Aliens who exercise that right are considered as citizens of the States where they reside, and as such are within the purview of the law, which requires all such citizens between the ages of 18 and 45, with certain specific exemptions, as liable to be drafted into the militia. A person may be a citizen of a State, and, as such, entitled to vote therein without being a citizen of the United States.

"I am, &c.

"(Signed) William H. Seward.

"Hon. W. Stuart,

"&c. &c. &c."

Ibid. p. 468.

In November 1862, Lord Lyons forwarded a petition from certain native-born British subjects in Wisconsin, alleging that, although they had voted at elections, they had done so under the State law as aliens, and had not thereby forfeited their British nationality.

Ibid. p. 474.

Mr. Seward replied that so far as the executive authority of the United States was concerned, no foreigner who had not been naturalized, or who had not exercised the right of suffrage, had hitherto been required to serve in the militia.

Lord Lyons, No. 536; December 22, 1862.

In December 1862 Lord Lyons reported that he had been informed by M. Mercier (the French Minister) that some time ago he had written a circular " to the French consuls, in which he said " that Frenchmen who had voted illegally in this " country had no doubt rendered themselves liable " to legal penalties here, but that they had not " forfeited their French nationality, or their right " as aliens to be exempt from compulsory military " service . . . In elucidation of this point " M. Mercier especially referred to the laws of " some of the States which admit aliens to the " exercise of the elective franchise."

It appears that Mr. Seward, to whom M. Mercier communicated this circular, declined to express any opinion upon it, alleging that he should prefer to deal with individual cases if any should arise.

To Lord Lyons, No. 79; February 12, 1863.

The matter was now referred by Lord Lyons for the consideration of the Home Government, and eventually it was decided to instruct Lord Lyons to abide by the decision of the American Law Courts, and to advise all persons who had voted or exercised the privileges of citizenship, and who claimed exemption from military service, to resort to those Courts for the establishment of their claim.

Attorney-General Bates' Opinion.

With reference to this subject, Lord Lyons forwarded to Lord Russell a copy of an opinion recently delivered by Mr. Attorney-General Bates.

This opinion was delivered upon a question put to Mr. Bates, whether coloured men could be citizens of the United States.

Mr. Bates, in opposition to what had hitherto been the generally received doctrine, decided that they could; and, in order to arrive at this conclusion, entered at some length into a disquisition on " Citizenship."

Lord Lyons, No. 11; January 5, 1863.

As this opinion may be interesting with regard to the general question of allegiance, and is not readily accessible for consultation in this country, extracts of so much of it as relate to the practical operation of the United States' laws are annexed (Addenda E).

Intended Citizens included in Northern Conscription, 1863.

The pressure of the conscription had been severely felt by the native Americans in 1862, who looked with jealousy on the exemption from it obtained by their British neighbours, who, having declared their intention to become citizens for the advantages of citizenship, now managed by pleading alienship to evade its obligations.

The exigencies of the war also demanded all the resources of the country to meet the heavy losses in battle; and on the 3rd of March 1863 an Act of Congress was passed authorizing a further enrolment of the militia, specially including " intended " citizens.

The 1st clause of this Act is as follows:—

United States " Statutes at Large," vol. xii. p. 731.

" Be it enacted, &c., that all able-bodied male citizens of the United States, and persons of foreign birth who shall have declared on oath their intention to become citizens under and in pursuance of the laws thereof, between the ages of 20 and 45 years, except as herein-after excepted, are hereby declared to constitute the national forces, and shall be liable to perform military duty in the service of the United States, when called out by the President for that purpose."

Although the powers conferred upon the United States' Government by this Act were not put in force for some time after its having been passed, numerous applications were received by Lord Lyons from persons who were apprehensive of being forcibly enlisted under its provisions, and on the 3rd of April he was instructed to state to Mr. Seward that Her Majesty's Government considered that British subjects who had simply declared on oath their intention to become at a future time citizens of the United States, and who had not as yet exercised the right of suffrage or any other political franchise in consequence of such declaration, ought to be allowed a reasonable period after the passing of the Act in question to exercise their option whether they would leave the United States, or continue resident therein upon the condition of liability to military service under this Conscription Act.

To Lord Lyons, No. 173; April 3, 1863.

President's Proclamation allowing Sixty-five days for intended Citizens to leave the States.

Lord Lyons having addressed a representation to the United States' Government in the sense of this instruction, the President at his instance issued a Proclamation on the 8th of May, reciting the first clause of the Act, and proceeding as follows:—

Lord Lyons, No. 415; May 11, 1863.

" And whereas it is claimed by and in behalf of persons of foreign birth within the ages specified in the said Act who have heretofore declared on oath their intentions to become citizens under and in pursuance of the laws of the United States, and who have not exercised the right of suffrage or any other political franchise under the laws of the United States, or of any of the States thereof, are not absolutely concluded* by their aforesaid declaration of intention from renouncing their purpose to become citizens, and that, on the contrary, such persons, under treaties or the law of nations, retain a right to renounce that purpose and to forego the privileges of citizenship and residence within the United States, under the obligations imposed by the aforesaid Act of Congress:

" Now, therefore, to avoid all misapprehensions concerning the liability of persons concerned to perform the service required by such enactment and to give it full effect, I do hereby order and proclaim that no plea of alienage will be received or allowed to exempt from the obligations imposed by the aforesaid Act of Congress any person of foreign birth who shall have declared on oath his intention to become a citizen of the United States under the laws thereof, and who shall be found within the United States at any time during the continuance of the present insurrection and rebellion, at or after the expiration of the period of sixty-five days from the date of this Proclamation, nor shall any such plea of alienage be allowed in favour of any such person who has so, as aforesaid, declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and shall have exercised at any time the right of suffrage, or any other political franchise, within the United States, under the laws thereof, or under the laws of any of the several States."

This Proclamation was considered to afford a reasonable period to allow for the departure of " intended " citizens, and the question of their liability to military service was thus practically set at rest; and Her Majesty's Government subsequently refused to interfere on behalf of those " intended " citizens who had not taken advantage of the opportunity thus afforded to them of leaving the country.

To Lord Lyons, No. 337; June 6, 1863.

To Lord Lyons, No. 485; August 31, 1863.

Mr. Scott's Case—Ownership of Land.

In July 1863 a Mr. Scott applied to Her Majesty's Consul at New York for protection.

To Lord Lyons, No. 445; August 10, 1863.

It appeared from his own account that this gentleman had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time of the " Trent" affair when war between the two countries was imminent, and that if such a war had actually broken out it was his intention to adhere to the United States' Government against his own Sovereign.

Under these circumstances Lord Lyons was informed that Her Majesty's Government could not interfere on Mr. Scott's behalf.

* Sic. in original.

To Lord Lyons, No. 455; August 17, 1863.

In this despatch Lord Lyons was also told that it was not unreasonable for a nation to require military service from those who had become owners of land by virtue of their declared intention to become its citizens.

Status of Sons of Naturalized Citizens.

Two cases now arose at Baltimore and Philadelphia.

The first case was that of a son born in England but of a British father, subsequently naturalized in the United States, which son had attained his majority according to the lex loci, but had not exercised any of the rights of a citizen.

It was decided that, having regard to the principles of international law that a minor child follows the domicil of the father, and to the facts that in this case the father was naturalized by the law of the United States, and that the child after attaining majority had continued his domicil in the United States and was considered as naturalized by the law of the United States, the son must be considered as a naturalized American citizen and not entitled to claim, as against the Government of the United States, the protection of Her Majesty's Government.

The second case was that of a son attaining his majority in the United States, born therein of a British father, living in the United States, but not naturalized, neither father nor son having made any declaration of intention to become citizens.

Having regard to the law of England as to persons born in Her Majesty's dominions, Lord Lyons was instructed that Her Majesty's Government could not insist, as against the United States' Government, that such a person should be considered by them as a British subject and exempt from the liabilities incident to the status of a United States' citizen.

Cases of Captain Sherwin, Messrs. Matchett and Hamilton.

Case of Captain Sherwin's arrest. MS. volume.

Captain Sherwin (a natural-born British subject) having been imprisoned on a charge that he had been aiding and abetting the Confederates by taking on board his ship certain officers of the enemy, the United States' Government, among other reasons for Captain Sherwin's imprisonment, pleaded that he was a United States' citizen, and that his nationality was proved by his having commanded a United States' ship, which only United States' citizens could do.

To Lord Lyons, No. 612; December 7, 1863.

It turned out that this allegation was not correct, but the case is mentioned to show the principle maintained by the United States in this instance.

Mr. Matchett, a natural-born British subject, who had not been naturalized, having been arrested at Wilmington, applied for redress.

To Mr. Hamilton; December 3, 1863.

It was shown that he had voted at elections, and Her Majesty's Government refused to do anything for him.

Mr. Hamilton, an Irish gentleman who had been naturalized in the United States, and who had returned to Ireland, being about to go back to the United States, requested to know whether he could resume his British nationality previously to doing so, and was told that Her Majesty's Government could not promise to afford him protection against any obligations which the laws of the United States might impose upon persons who had been naturalized in that country.

Confederate Conscription.—Expulsion of British Consuls.

An Act of the Confederate Congress passed in April 1862, provided that "all white men who are "residents of the Confederate States between the "ages of 18 and 35 should be liable to be called "out and enrolled in the Confederate army."

This led to numerous remonstrances on the part of Her Majesty's Consuls against the forced enlistment of British subjects.

Acting under the instructions of October 1862, (already referred to) they urged that option ought to be given to aliens to quit the country, and that although aliens might be fairly expected to perform police or militia duly, they ought not to be employed on active warlike service.

The correspondence continued until October 1863, when the Confederate Government refused to receive any further communications from Her Majesty's Consuls, and ordered them to quit the country.

As the arbitrary measures of the Confederate Government were the result of a "necessity which knows no law," and can have no practical bearing on the discussion of questions at the present day, it seems unnecessary to do more than refer to the Parliamentary papers, North America, No. 13, 1864, and North America No. 14, 1864, for any further information which may be required on this part of the subject.

1864.

The general principles by which Her Majesty's Government had determined to be guided in affording protection to British subjects in the United States were by this time practically settled; and, during the remainder of the war in 1864 and 1865, although there were numerous cases in which those principles were appealed to, there were but few in which any novel application of them was called for.

It may be convenient to notice some of these cases cursorily, without entering into details, which would involve a repetition of arguments and instructions already cited in previous similar instances.

Forced Confederate Conscripts taken Prisoners by United States.

In January 1864 Her Majesty's Government had brought before them the case of British subjects serving by compulsion in the Confederate armies, and taken prisoners by the United States' forces.

To Lord Lyons, No. 36; January 29, 1864.

Lord Lyons was instructed that an application for their release could not be put on the ground of strict right, nor could Her Majesty's Government consent to be a party to such persons being discharged on taking an oath of allegiance to the United States, but that there could be no objection to their being called upon to take an oath of neutrality.

Cases of Hansard, Crutchett, and Gray.

To Mr. Hansard, January 20, 1864.

Mr. Joseph Hansard, a British subject, who had been for twenty-five years a resident in Georgia, having applied to Lord Russell for protection, was told that if he chose to return to the United States he must do so at his own risk.

To Mr. Crutchett; January 21, 1864.

Mr. Crutchett, a British subject, married and settled at Washington, having applied to Her Majesty's Government to procure redress for injuries inflicted on his property by the United States' forces, was informed that he must have recourse to the same remedies as any other resident in the United States.

To Lord Lyons, No. 138; March 24, 1868.

Mr. Gray, a British subject, having been taken in a blockade-runner, was tried by court-martial and condemned to two years' imprisonment.

As he had been for many years a resident in the Southern States, and had taken an active part on behalf of the Confederates, Her Majesty's Government declined to interfere.

Conscription Act, 1864.

Lord Lyons, No. 137; February 29, 1864.

On the 24th of February 1864 an Act of Congress was passed for a further military enrolment.

This Act contains the following provisions:

Section 6.—"Boards of enrolment shall enrol . . . all aliens who shall declare their intention to become citizens."

Section 18.—"And be it further enacted, That no person of foreign birth shall, on account of alienage, be exempted from enrolment or draft under the provisions of this Act or the Act of which it is an amendment, who has at any time assumed the rights of a citizen by voting at any election held under authority of the laws of any state or territory, or of the United States, or who has held any office under such laws or any of them; but the fact that any such person has voted or held, or shall hold any office as aforesaid, shall be taken as conclusive evidence that he is not entitled to exemption from military service on account of alienage."

Her Majesty's Government did not consider it necessary to give Lord Lyons any instructions with regard to this Act.

Status of Sons of Americans born in British Territory.

To Lord Lyons, No. 200; April 27, 1864.

In the case of a person named Charles Cole it was decided that the children of American citizens born in British territory, but being in American territory could not claim the protection of Her Majesty's Government, to exempt them from American military service.

Prisoners captured in Blockade Runners.

Parliamentary Papers, "North America," No. 17, 1864, p. 56.

On the 9th of May certain instructions were issued by the United States Secretary of the Navy, respecting persons taken in blockade-runners, which provide that "when there is no reason to doubt "that those who claim to be foreign subjects are "in reality such, they will be required to state "under oath that they have never been naturalized "in this country, have never exercised the privi- "leges of a citizen thereof, by voting or otherwise, "and have never been in the pay or employment "of the insurgent or so-called Confederate Govern- "ment."

Residents in Places under Martial Law.

To Lord Lyons, No. 363; August 5, 1864.

In July a question was raised as to the position of British subjects residing at Memphis, then under martial law; and Lord Lyons was instructed to inform them that Great Britain could not interfere with the operation of that law in a foreign State, and that British subjects who wished to secure British protection must discontinue their residence in places under such military control.

Enrolment in New Orleans Police.

Lord Lyons, No. 614; September 1864.

A general order was issued at New Orleans on the 30th July 1864, directing "neutral foreigners, not being subject to compulsory military service," to be enrolled as a local police; but Her Majesty's Government did not see any reason to interfere.

Case of Heslop, Boyle, Miss Hill, Jenkins, and Dr. Benson.

To Mr. Burnley, No. 507; November 10, 1864.

Mr. Heslop, a British subject holding landed property in Virginia, and who had been arrested at Baltimore, having requested British protection, Mr. Burnley, then Chargé d'Affaires, was informed, that as the circumstances of the case showed Mr. Heslop's active connexion with the Confederates it was not a case for interference.

To Mr. Burnley, No. 508; November 10, 1864.

Ibid. No. 509; November 10, 1864.

To Mr. Jenkins December 13, 1864.

A similar decision was arrived at in regard to David Boyle, and to a Miss Hill, arrested at New Orleans.

A Mr. Jenkins, a British subject, resident in Texas, was told that Her Majesty's Government could not protect him against the conscription if he persisted in remaining in the Confederate States.

To Mr. Burnley, No. 106; March 22, 1865.

A Dr. Benson, a Canadian, applied for protection against being tried by court-martial.

As it appeared that he was domiciled in Kentucky and was an army contractor, Her Majesty's Government left him to the operation of the American law.

Proclamation of Penalties on Aliens concerned in Blockade Running.

To Sir F. Bruce, No. 141; April 8, 1865.

In March 1865 the President issued a Proclamation imposing the penalty of confinement as prisoners of war upon domiciled aliens and non-resident foreigners, who had been or should have been engaged in violating the blockade, and making the continuance of any person (who might afterwards be decided by martial law to fall within this category) for twelve days in the United States a ground for his detention in military custody until the end of the war.

Lord Lyons was directed to remonstrate strongly against British subjects being thus imprisoned.

It does not appear that the Proclamation was enforced.

Mr. Foden's Case.

Mr. Foden; March 11, 1865.

Mr. Foden, a British-born subject, the son of a naturalized American, was refused British protection in April 1865, in accordance with the principle already adopted by Her Majesty's Government as was an Irishman, Mr. Noonan, a naturalized American, and a Mr. Hutton, who alleged that he had come to England in order to resume his British nationality.

To Mr. Noonan; April 21, 1865.

Mr. Hutton; September 7, 1865.

End of the War.

The Civil War ended, as officially announced by a Proclamation of the President, on the 10th of May 1865.

Besides the cases mentioned, a long correspondence took place between the British Government and the Government of the United States, respecting the treatment of British subjects captured in blockade-runners; but as that correspondence concerned the rights and duties of neutrals rather than any questions of nationality or allegiance, it has not been considered necessary to include it.

Throughout this part of the Paper reference has been made, for the sake of brevity, principally to the instructions given to Her Majesty's Representative at Washington; but those instructions were all or nearly all communicated to the American Government, who, as will have been seen, were greatly influenced by them in their legislation with regard to the conscription of aliens, &c.; and it is hoped that such a summary will be sufficient to show the general tenor of the correspondence.*

Fenian Arrests.

The suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland in February 1866 brought the controversy back again into its former groove, and the United States became again the complainants as protectors of their naturalized citizens.

Inclosure in Mr. Ford's No. 44; November 18, 1867.

The principal correspondence is contained in the Papers relating to Foreign Affairs accompanying the President's Message to the Second Session of the Thirty-ninth Congress (1867).

"Papers relating to Foreign Affairs," Part i., p. 69.

The first effect of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act "was an appeal to the Acting Consul "at Dublin, Mr. West, from a number not only of "those actually arrested, but also of others feeling "themselves liable at any moment to be taken with

* I have to acknowledge the assistance I have derived from the Index to the Law Officers' Reports, 1861–66, prepared by the Sub-Librarian. Such an Index is of the greatest service in tracing any particular subject through this most voluminous correspondence.

"equal suddenness, for protection as being naturalized citizens of the United States."

"Papers relating to Foreign Affairs," Part i., p. 37.

Mr. Adams advised the Consuls "to secure a "proper share of protection for innocent persons, "who are citizens of the United States, without "attempting to interfere on behalf of those who "have justly subjected themselves to suspicion "of complicity with treasonable projects."

Ibid. p. 69.

Mr. Adams, in reporting to Mr. Seward the passing of the Act of Parliament, in February 1866, observes, "One of the gravest difficulties presented "to me in this proceeding grows out of the conflicting views of allegiance entertained in the two "countries. Here the Courts adhere to the old "doctrine generally held in Europe, that it is "indefeasible. We, on the other hand, maintain "the absolute right of expatriation. . . . . "There is some reason to believe that many of "these people now under arrest are really more or "less implicated in the organization. . . They "are also astute enough to be capable of contriving "means of raising a complication between the two "nations, out of the questions that may follow "from any abuse of the extraordinary means of "repression now resorted to here."

Ibid. p. 74.

On the 2nd of March 1866 Mr. Adams writes: "No answer has yet been given by the authorities "to the requests for reasons to justify their "confinement. Neither has any distinction been "attempted between native Americans and naturalized Irishmen. . . Since the above was written, "I have received from Mr. West* a letter, inclosing "the final answer of the authorities in regard to "naturalized citizens, which goes the whole length "of claiming the allegiance." And March 8th— "It is thus far made clear that the Government "claims the right of dealing as it pleases with "native Irishmen, no regard whatever being paid "to the fact of their naturalization in the United "States."

Mr. Seward furnished Mr. Adams with instructions on the 10th of March.

Ibid. p. 78.

After speaking of Fenianism as an Irish and not an American movement, he says, "It may be expected that some of our Irish-born naturalized "citizens who are now sojourning or travelling in "Ireland will be arrested. . . . Americans "whether native-born or naturalized, owe submission to the same laws in Great Britain as British "subjects, while residing there and enjoying the "protection of that Government. We applied the converse of this principle to British subjects who "were sojourning or travelling in the United "States during the late rebellion."

Ibid. p. 83.

Shortly afterwards (March 15) Mr. Adams had an interview with Lord Clarendon, at which he told him that only a small number of cases had ocurred in which satisfactory evidence of naturalization had been produced by the complainants, and that, in all the admitted cases, if the Government had in its hands the proofs of complicity with treasonable designs, he should feel obliged, on being informed of them, to desist from further interference, and that his appeals to the Government "would be confined to those cases in which there "was mere suspicion, or at most feeble evidence, "of actual evil and intent."

In such cases he suggested that the Government might allow the persons arrested to be set free on condition of their leaving the country.

It appears that in March a report was received by the United States' Government from Mr. Consul West, that he had been allowed to visit native Americans in prison, but not naturalized citizens, although he was permitted to write to the latter.

Ibid. p. 86.

Ibid. p 136.

Mr. Seward desired Mr. Adams to remonstrate against such a distinction being made, and he accordingly did so on the 12th of April.

The affair was settled by the distinction being waived.

Mr. Seward, in a despatch of the 31st of March, says:— "Papers relating to Foreign Affairs," Part i., p. 95.

"First. I continue under the conviction that the United States cannot be expected to modify the views which they have heretofore expressed.

"Second. That any parties who may wish to disturb the peace of Great Britain, either at home or in the Provinces, might be expected to build high hopes largely upon any difficulties which should incidentally arise between that country and the United States, upon, first, the Naturalization question, and, second, upon questions of trade between the United States and the British American Provinces, including among those questions the subject of the Fisheries.

"Third. Delay in coming to a reasonable and friendly understanding in regard to such incidental matters would probably be unpropitious."

Ibid. p. 104.

On the 14th of April, John Cavesford, whose case Mr. Adams had been directed to support, was released on condition of leaving the country, as was also a naturalized citizen, John Healey, under similar circumstances. Ibid. p. 103.

On the 21st of April Mr. Seward forwarded to Mr. Adams a petition from Mr. Clark, of New York, in favour of his son-in-law, Colonel Burke, a naturalized citizen.

Ibid. p. 109.

On the 28th of April Mr. Adams was desired to intervene on behalf of Colonel M. Kirwan, a naturalized citizen.

Ibid. p. 125.

At an interview on the 29th of May, Lord Clarendon informed Mr. Adams that instructions had been given to remove all unnecessary distinctions between United States' native and naturalized prisoners, though of course the point of allegiance could not be conceded, and that the Government were desirous to get rid of those who had been imprisoned as quickly as they could consistently with the public safety.

Ibid. p. 134.

Mr. Seward, on the 9th of June, instructed Mr. Adams "to suggest to Lord Clarendon the "expediency of the exercise of clemency to the "extent at least, of releasing all of the American "citizens, native or naturalized, who are in "confinement, upon the condition of their returning to the United States."

Ibid. p. 137.

On the 16th of June Mr. Adams was directed to interfere on behalf of Thomas Blackwell and T. I. Hynes, naturalized citizens.

Ibid. p. 153.

On the 7th of July Burke was liberated.

Ibid. p. 168.

On the 23rd of July Mr. Adams' attention was called to the cases of T. O'Connell and M. Hasson. On the 2nd of August Mr. Adams reports that releases were being steadily granted, and that of those who had been arrested there was little doubt in his own mind that nearly all were more or less privy to the "Fenian organization, and came out to further its designs;" and on the 23rd of August "no person proved to be a native or a naturalized "citizen of the United States now remains in "Dublin under the Act for suspending the habeas "corpus:" and on the 29th of September 1866, "There is now no case before this Legation of a "proved American citizen being in custody in "Ireland on suspicion of being concerned in "treasonable practices there."

Ibid. p. 175.

Ibid. p. 204.

This concludes the correspondence of 1866 so far as arrests for Fenianism in Ireland are concerned.

Imprisonment of Fenians in Canada.

In June 1866 the Fenian raid on Canada occurred, and several of the raiders were made prisoners, among whom were many naturalized citizens.

* Mr. West's correspondence is not published.

Diplomatic Correspondence," part i., p. 237.

On the 11th of June Mr. Seward addressed a representation to Sir F. Bruce, respecting a rumour that prisoners had been taken on the United States' territory and conveyed to Canada, and that Canadian Agents had threatened that these prisoners, together with any stragglers who might be found within the Canadian lines would be immediately executed without legal trial.

Mr. Seward adds that the United States' "Government could not look without serious "concern upon the practice of any unnecessary "severity, and especially upon the exercise of "retaliation or other illegal proceeding, upon the "persons of such of the offenders as have fallen, "or shall hereafter fall, into the hands of the "Canadian authorities. I respectfully invite your "attention to this subject in a confident expecta- "tion that no proceedings that shall not be autho- "rized by and be in conformity with law will be "taken against persons of that class, and in the "hope that even the customary administration of Diplomatic Correspondence," part i., p. 239.

"the law will be tempered with special forbear- "ance and clemency."

On the 21st of June, Mr. Seward forwarded to Sir F. Bruce a petition from the wife of Patrick

Ibid. p. 241.

O'Malia, a naturalized Irishman, and recommended it to the "clemency of Her Majesty's authorities."

Ibid. p. 246.

On the 30th, Mr. Seward called attention to the case of the Rev. J. McMahon (apparently a native American).

Ibid. p. 249.

On the 16th of July, Mr. Seward wrote in behalf of James Diamond and Patrick O'Mally (both naturalized).

On the 26th, Mr. Seward forwarded to Sir F. Bruce an extract of a despatch from the United States' Consul at Toronto, respecting the arrest of Ellis, Dillon, and Carney. The Consul states that there are several other parties, claiming to be "American citizens, in prison here, for whom I "have transmitted certain evidence of their inno- "cence of any complicity with the Fenian raid. "The proof submitted to the Government, however, "is not full and complete, and I am waiting

Ibid. p. 167.

"further evidence to enable me to press their "claims for discharge or immediate trial."

On the 23rd of July, the House of Representatives passed the following Resolutions:

"Resolved, that the House of Representatives respectfully request the President of the United States to urge upon the Canadian authorities, and also the British Government, the release of the Fenian prisoners recently captured in Canada.

"Resolved, that this House respectfully request the President to cause the prosecutions instituted in the United States' Courts against the Fenians to be discontinued if compatible with the public interests."

On the 26th, the President communicated to the House the note which had been addressed to Sir F. Bruce on the 11th, mentioning at the same time that the rumours therein referred to had been proved to be erroneous, and that the representations of the United States' Government had been received by the British Government in a friendly spirit.

Ibid. p. 260.

The President added that the second Resolution should be taken into consideration.

A correspondence then ensued between Mr. Seward and Sir F. Bruce, respecting the capital sentence passed in Canada on the Rev. J. McMahon and Robert B. Lynch, two of the principal raiders.

Mr. Seward requested Sir F. Bruce to cause copies of the Judgments and Depositions to be given to the United States' Consul, and that the execution of the sentences might be deferred.

Sir F. Bruce replied that the matter had been referred for the decision of the Home Government, and on the 27th of November informed him that the sentences had been commuted.

The series of published documents terminate with this despatch.

Cases of Burke and McCafferty.

Mr. Adams; May 25, 1867.

On the 25th of May 1867 Mr. Adams addressed a note to Lord Stanley interceding for an Irishman, Burke, and a native American, McCafferty, who had been sentenced to death for complicity in the Tallaght affair.

Mr. Adams remarks, "No evidence has been "received at this Legation satisfactorily to show "that the prisoner Burke has ever been naturalized "as a citizen of the United States."

To Mr. Adams; May 26, 1867.

Her Majesty's Government had, however, come to the determination previously to the receipt of Mr. Adams' letter, to recommend to the Queen that the sentence of death should not be carried out, and Mr. Adams was informed accordingly on the 26th of May.

Refusal of Mixed Jury.—Warren and Costello.

At the trial of John Warren, one of the leaders of the "Jacmel" expedition, before Chief Baron Pigott and Mr. Justice Keogh, at Dublin, on the 30th of October 1867, Counsel applied to the Court for a mixed Jury, on the plea that, although born in Ireland, Warren was an alien, having been formally naturalized in the United States.

The application was refused, the Chief Baron ruling that "according to the law of England, a law "which has been administered without any vari- "ation or doubt from the earliest times—he who "once is under the allegiance of the English "Sovereign remains so for ever."

As this authoritative declaration of the present law has been frequently referred to subsequently, an extract from the Crown Report of the trial, containing the Chief Baron's ruling, is annexed in the Addenda.

Addenda F.

On the 7th of November 1867 a similar application was refused in the case of Augustine Costello, by Mr. Justice Keogh.

Proceedings in Congress.

Mr. Ford, No. 64; December 4, 1867.

On the 25th of November, Mr. Robinson, a naturalized Irishman, member for New York, moved a resolution in the House of Representatives, that the Committee for Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into Mr. Adams' conduct, with regard to the protection of naturalized citizens in Great Britain, that Mr. Adams be recalled, and that all correspondence for the last two years between the English and American Governments be at once submitted to the House.

Mr. Robinson made a speech, in which he quoted an opinion of Judge Sherman, of Connecticut, to the effect that the American and English law of allegiance was the same:—

"Mr. Justice Story in giving the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States says, on page 246, 'that the general doctrine is, that no person 'can by any act of their own, without the consent 'of the Goverment, put off their allegiance and 'become aliens.' I consider this as the law of the United States; and whether it be considered as grounded on national rights or as a rule of policy, it is a just and necessary rule of law."

Mr. Robinson concluded—

"And now, Sir, what do we demand from our Goverment or from England? Nothing that is unreasonable. I do not claim that naturalized citizens may invade England, and there commit crimes with impunity. What we do demand may be summed up in three sentences:—

"1. No American citizen travelling in Great Britain or elsewhere, on business or pleasure, shall be imprisoned without proper charges or sworn information being made against him, and upon these charges or information, even under the suspension of habeas corpus, a fair and speedy trial shall be secured to him.

"2. That no American thus travelling shall be ordered to quit the country where he may be, or be escorted to ships going thence, or be placed in any position compelling or inducing him to accept that degrading alternative."

"3. That the benefit of English law shall be fully accorded to all American citizens, whether native or adopted, the same as to aliens or strangers from other countries."

Mr. Banks moved the previous question on referring the resolutions, and it was referred accordingly.

On the 2nd of December Mr. Robinson brought on another resolution in similar terms respecting the conduct of Mr. West, the United States' Consul at Dublin. He was supported on this occasion by Mr. Judd, of Illinois, who spoke of the conscription of naturalized Americans in the Prussian army.

This motion was also referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee.

On the 20th of December, Mr. Price, of Iowa, read to the House a petition from W. J. Nagle, a native American, imprisoned on account of the "Jacmel" landing, and moved a resolution that

" The representatives of the people of the United " States do hereby declare it to be our determination
" to submit to no such oppression of our citizens by " any Power, and that we will, with as little delay
" as possible, adopt such measures as will make it
" safe for an American citizen free from crimes to " travel in any part of the civilized world."

"Resolved, That the Committee of Foreign Affairs be, and it is hereby instructed, to give this matter immediate attention, and report to this House, by will or otherwise, such measures as in the judgment of the said Committee will be best calculated to accomplish the object desired."

On the same day Mr. Robinson read a petition on behalf of Warren and Nagle, and moved a resolution that the President be requested to take immediate steps on their behalf.

This was objected to by Mr. Benjamin, and apparently fell through.

Mr. Ford, No. 8; December 24, 1867.

On the 19th of December a debate took place in the Senate on the occasion of the presentation by Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, of a Memorial from Cincinnati, praying that Congress may take measures to secure the rights of Americans abroad.

The Memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Special reference was made in the course of the debate to the case of Warren.

On the same day resolutions were presented in the House of Representatives by Mr. Eggeston, of Ohio, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, protesting against the treatment of adopted American citizens by foreign nations.

Mr. Ford, No. 14; January 14, 1868.

On the 9th of January two resolutions were passed unanimously in the House of Representatives, one requesting the President to intercede with the Queen of England for the release of the Canadian prisoners, McMahon and Lynch; and the other requesting the President to intercede with a view of obtaining the release of Warren and Nagle, and any other American citizens who have been arrested in Ireland or elsewhere, and who are now imprisoned without sufficient grounds to charge them with the commission of any offence against the laws of Great Britain.

Mr. Thornton, No. 7; February 3, 1868.

On the 27th of January the Committee of the House of Representatives sent in their Report.

This Report (Appendix VIII.) contains the usual arguments respecting the theory of perpetual allegiance, maintains that by permitting emigration foreign countries tacitly consent to expatriation, and endeavours to explain away the conflict of doctrine between the Executive and Judiciary referred to in the President's last Message.* (On this latter point see Mr. Cushing's opinion.

Annexed to the Report was the following Bill:

"A Bill concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States.

" Section 1. Be it enacted, &c., That all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign States shall be entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances. And the President is empowered to employ all the resources of the Government in just efforts to secure the recognition by other Governments of the principles of public law which have been insisted upon and maintained by the Government of the United States in regard to the rights of naturalized citizens: Provided always, that no citizen of the United States who is guilty of crime against the laws of any foreign State committed within its jurisdiction, or of desertion from actual service in the army or navy of such State, or who shall have acquired naturalization by misrepresentation or fraud in regard to residence or otherwise, or who by treason or other crime against the United States shall have forfeited, or who shall have renounced his rights as a citizen, or who shall establish a continuous residence beyond the limits of the United States for a term exceeding five years, shall be entitled to the protection contemplated by this Act.

" Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any naturalized citizen of the United States has been arrested and is detained by any foreign Government in contravention of the intent and purposes of this Act, upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native Sovereign, or if any citizen shall have been so arrested and detained whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall be, and hereby is empowered to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States; and the President shall, without unreasonable delay, give information to Congress of any such proceedings under this Act.

" Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any naturalized citizen of the United States shall return to his native country with intent to resume his domicil therein, or if any citizen shall leave the United States with the intention of permanent residence in any foreign State, or shall fail to make annual return of his property in the United States for taxation to the assessor of internal revenue of the district of the United States in which such citizen last resided, or shall engage as an army or navy belligerent in any foreign war or service, such citizen shall not be entitled to the interposition of the Government in his behalf under the Provisions of this Act.

---

* " The attention of Congress is respectfully called to a singular and embarrassing conflict of laws. The Executive Department of this Government has hitherto uniformly held, as it now holds, that naturalization in conformity with the constitution and laws of the United States absolves the recipient from his native allegiance. The Courts of Great Britain hold that allegiance to the British Crown is indefeasible, and is not absolved by our laws of naturalization. British judges cite courts and law authorities of the United States in support of that theory against the position held by the Executive authority of the United States. This conflict perplexes the public mind concerning the rights of naturalized citizens, and impairs the national authority abroad. I called attention to this subject in my last annual message, and now again respectfully appeal to Congress to declare the national will unmistakeably upon this important question."

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the term 'domicil' in the preceding section shall be construed to mean a continuous residence of more than five years in the native country of the naturalized citizen, or establishing himself in any business which denotes an intention to resume a permanent residence."

This Bill was subsequently introduced by General Banks, the President of the Committee of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, at once objected to the first section, and gave notice that he should move to strike out the second clause, because "the Govern-" ment of the United States has never insisted " upon and maintained the doctrine of the right of " expatriation."

General Banks, in explaining the intentions of the Bill, said, "It does not relate to special ques-" tions which have been presented, and will be " continued to be presented to the house by its " members as well as to the Executive Department " of the Government in regard to the arrest of " American citizens in Great Britain or elsewhere; " inasmuch as we have not received official infor-" mation on that subject some time since called " for, the Committee have not passed judgment " upon it."

In reply to a question from Mr. Maynard, whether the Bill would apply to persons who had declared their intention to become citizens, General Banks stated that the Committee "do not propose to define naturalization."

Mr. Ward, of New York, pointed out that the words "the President is empowered to employ all " the resources of the Government in just efforts, " &c.," would enable him to declare war without consulting Congress.

Mr. Woodward proposed to insert a clause providing for the expatriation of Americans becoming domiciled abroad, on the ground that "when we " are asking foreign Governments to make pro-" vision in our behalf for the expatriation of their " citizens, it is quite indispensable that we should " begin by providing for the expatriation of our " own citizens."

General Banks interrupted Mr. Woodward, saying that such an enactment would debar any naturalized citizen of the United States up to that date from claiming United States' protection. "It is impos-" sible to legislate upon this subject and give now " the right of expatriation without by that very " act enabling foreign Governments to say that up " to this date our citizens had no right to expatriate " themselves."

Mr. Woodward rejoined that "the difficulty " suggested by the gentleman is imaginary, but if " it is not, a proviso saving the rights of all " naturalized citizens from the effects of this " legislation would obviate the objection."

Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, followed, and recommended caution combined with firmness in dealing with this question. "We are not now dealing with a mere " question of elections, nor playing a pleasing game " for the votes of naturalized citizens." He objected also to the first section of the Bill, as not declaring sufficiently plainly the intentions of the Government, and reiterated his argument that although the doctrine of indefeasible allegiance was unreasonable and unjust, "this Government has not insisted on " and maintained an opposite doctrine. There is " not to be found among all our Statutes a single " affirmative challenge to this old feudalism of " England. The implied negation sought to be " drawn from our naturalization laws has no sub-" stantial foundation upon which to rest; for " England has a system of naturalization also. " Our Judicial Department of Government has in " no case asserted a different rule; and the Execu-" tive Department has not advanced beyond an " attempt, by negotiation, to induce foreign States " to consent to the adoption of a new rule of public " or international law in this regard."

Mr. Pile also urged the adoption of a "distinct " statutory declaration of the right of any citizen " of this or any other Government to remove from " the territory and renounce his allegiance to the " Government where he was born," and proposed an amendment to that effect, together with another amendment, empowering the President to resort to suspension of commercial relations and blockade, before proceeding to reprisals in cases of illegal arrest of native or naturalized Americans in foreign countries.

The debate was then adjourned; and on the 6th of February, Mr. Chanler made a speech, advocating the assembly of an International Congress to consider the whole question of expatriation and allegiance. "Daily Globe," February 7, 1868.

Mr. Boyer then proposed as a substitute for the Bill recommended by the Committee, a Resolution declaring that all naturalized citizens are entitled to the same protection in foreign countries as native citizens, and calling for a Report from the President whether any citizens, native or naturalized, are imprisoned in foreign countries, in contravention of their rights to such protection.

Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, also proposed a substitute for General Banks' Bill; and that Bill, with the proposed substitutes and amendments, was then relegated back for the further consideration of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

On the 11th of March the Bill was reported to the House of Representatives by the Foreign Affairs Committee in an amended shape, and, after much discussion on the reprisal clause, passed on the 21st of April, by a majority of 101 to 5, as follows:— "Daily Globe," March 11, 1868. "Daily Globe," April 21, 1868.

"A Bill concerning the rights of American Citizens in Foreign States.

"Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, for the protection of which the Government of the United States was established; and whereas in the recognition of this principle this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations and invested them with the rights of citizenship; and whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants, are subjects of foreign States, owing allegiance to the Governments thereof; and whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and finally disavowed; therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled: That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign States shall be entitled to, and shall receive from this Government, the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested and is detained by any foreign Government in contravention of the intent and purposes of this Act, upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign; or if any citizen shall have been arrested and detained, whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to suspend, in part or wholly, commercial relations with the said Government, or, in case no other remedy is available, order the arrest, and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, except Ambassadors or other public Ministers and their domestics and domestic servants, and who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and the President shall without delay give information to Congress of any such proceedings under this Act."

On the 23rd of June, in the Senate, Mr. Sumner, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the Bill to the house, with an amendment, striking out that portion of the third section which provided for retaliatory measures in case of illegal imprisonment of American citizens, and inserting a new provision, so as to make the section read:

"And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested and is detained by any foreign Government, in contravention of the intent and purposes of this Act, upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign; or if any citizen shall have been arrested and detained whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to report to Congress all the circumstances of any such arrest or detention, and any proceedings for the release of the citizen so arrested and detained, that Congress may take prompt action to secure to every citizen of the United States his just rights."

Mr. Thornton, No. 251, July 27, 1868.

Mr. Conness proposed to restore the clause as it stood in the Bill passed by the Lower House; but after many debates the reprisal clause was finally rejected and the bill considerably modified. It was passed in the Senate, by a majority of 39 to 7, on the 25th of July and returned to the House of Representatives who concurred in the amendments.

The following is a copy of the Act as passed by both houses:—

"Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and whereas in the recognition of this principle this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations and vested them with the rights of citizenship; and whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants, are subjects of foreign States, owing allegiance to the Governments thereof; and whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and fully disavowed: therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign States, shall be entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that Government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen; and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall, as soon as practicable, be communicated by the President to Congress."

PART V.—Correspondence between the United States and other Countries.

PRUSSIA.

The principal correspondence has been with Prussia.

This correspondence is commenced in the United States' Senate Documents, 1859–60 (1st Session, 36th Congress) vol. ii., containing the papers laid before the Senate in compliance with a resolution of that House of the 2nd of February, requesting information respecting the compulsory enlistment of American citizens in the army of Prussia.

The first paper of importance is a letter from Mr. Wheaton (the well-known jurist, who was at that time United States' Minister at Berlin) to Johann Knocke, a naturalized American, born in Prussia, who claimed exemption from military service on his return to that country.

"United States' Senate Documents, 1859–60," vol. ii. p. 6.

"Sir, Berlin, July 24, 1840.

"I have received your application, stating that you are a native-born subject of His Majesty the King of Prussia; that you emigrated to the United States in the year 1834, being then 21 years old, where you became naturalized as a citizen: that you have since returned to your native country, where you have been required to perform military duty, and desiring my official interference for your relief.

"In reply, I have to state that it is not in my power to interfere in the manner you desire. Had you remained in the United States, or visited any other foreign country (except Prussia), on your lawful business, you would have been protected by the American authorities, at home and abroad, in the enjoyment of all your rights and privileges as a naturalized citizen of the United States. But, having returned to the country of your birth, your native domicil and natural character revert (so long as you remain in the Prussian dominions), and you are bound in all respects to obey the laws exactly as if you had never emigrated.

"I am, &c.

"(Signed) Henry Wheaton.

"Mr. Johann P. Knocke."

The correspondence now passes to the year 1851, when Mr. Barnard was United States' Minister at Berlin.

The first case is that of H. V. de Sandt, a Prussian by birth, who, after declaring his intention to become a United States citizen, had returned to Prussia, and whom the authorities at Cleves had ordered to leave that country.

In reply to a representation from Mr. Barnard, M. le Coq explained on behalf of the Prussian Government that Sandt had left with the object of evading military service; that the proofs of his naturalization in the United States were incomplete, and that the Order of the Cleves authorities would not be revoked.

'United States' Senate Documents, 1859–60," vol. ii. p. 9.

Upon this, Mr. Barnard wrote to Sandt (June 17, 1851):—

Ibid. p. 13.

"When you ceased to be a citizen of Prussia by your permit of emigration, and became a resident in the United States, the laws and Government of that country became your protection so long as that residence continued. When, however, you quitted your residence there before perfecting your naturalization and again took up your abode in Prussia, for your own purposes, your position was a peculiar one, and required from you a peculiar and very discreet line of conduct. It was impossible for the American Legation here to claim you as an American citizen."

Several other cases occurred in 1851–52, which it seems unnecessary to give a detailed account of:—

Ibid. p. 14. Mr. Brand arrested at Coblenz on the ground of being an Emigration Agent;

Mr. Dale, an American, imprisoned at Aix-la-Chapelle for having an informal passport;

Ibid. p. 18. Mr. Behne summoned to military service;

Ibid. p. 23. Dr. Gutowski, a Pole, of Posen, naturalized in the United States, who had returned to Prussia.

Ibid. p. 13. Mr. Barnard informed Dr. Gutowski (August 3, 1852,) that, "having voluntarily returned to the "country of your birth, where you have purchased "a farm and taken up your residence, the Prussian "Government has a right to regard you as its "subject, and so treat you in all respects."

Mr. B. Meyer, a native of Padeborn, fined 50 dollars on returning to Prussia, for having evaded military service by emigrating without a licence.

Ibid. p. 41. It appears from a despatch from Mr. Barnard to Mr. Webster that the Prussian Government were always at this time on the look-out for the German Democratic Propaganda and its Agents, and that naturalized German citizens gave rise to suspicion by the ostentatious manner in which they flaunted their Americanism in the face of the authorities; Mr. Born, one of the most respectable of these persons, having demanded 20,000 rix-dollars for a detention of six or eight hours.

Ibid. p. 44. On the 29th October 1852 Mr. Barnard called the attention of Baron Manteuffel to the case of John Joseph Kracke, who had been forced into the army for three years' service.

Ibid. p. 53. On the 14th of January 1853 Mr. Everett furnished Mr. Barnard with instructions, of which the following is an extract:—

"The doctrine of inalienable allegiance is, no doubt, attended with great practical difficulties. It has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and by more than one of the State Courts; but the naturalization laws of the United States certainly assume that a person can, by his own acts divest himself of the allegiance under which he was born and contract a new allegiance to a foreign power. But, until this new allegiance is contracted, he must be considered as bound by his allegiance to the Government under which he was born, and subject to its laws; and this undoubted principle seems to have its direct application in the present cases. . . . If, then, a Prussian subject, born and living under this state of the law (of military service) chooses to emigrate to a foreign country without obtaining the 'certificate' which alone can discharge him from the obligation of military service, he does so at his own risk. . . . For these reasons, and without entering into any discussion of the question of perpetual allegiance, the President is of opinion, that if a subject of Prussia lying under a legal obligation in that country to perform a certain amount of military duty, leaves his native land, and without performing that duty or obtaining the prescribed 'certificate of emigration,' comes to the United States and is naturalized, and afterwards, for any purposes whatever, goes back to Prussia, it is not competent for the United States to protect him from the operation of the Prussian law."

The doctrine thus laid down by Mr. Everett was communicated by Mr. Barnard to Baron Manteuffel on the 15th of February 1853:—

"The Government of the United States considers that the laws of Prussia, which require a certain amount of military service of its subjects, and which prescribe the conditions in reference to this military service on which emigration is permitted, are a matter of domestic policy, in which no foreign Government has a right to interfere. It considers also that, if a Prussian subject, born and living under this state of the law, emigrates to a foreign country without a compliance with those conditions, which alone can discharge him from the obligation of military service, he does so at his own personal risk. Going abroad under the burden of a duty still due to his native Sovereign, his unauthorized emigration is in the nature of an escape from that duty and from the laws which prescribe and enforce it, and he remains liable, in spite of any contract he may enter into in the meantime of new allegiance to a foreign Power, to have these laws executed against him whenever he returns within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of his native country."

"United States' Senate Documents, 1859–60," vol. ii. p. 57.

Baron Manteuffel, in his reply of the 28th of February, says: "As, however, the Government "of the United States considers that it is not for "its interest to make the admission of an emigrant, "as citizen, dependent on the exhibition of a "document proving that he had dissolved the ties "by which he was attached to his old country, it "is much to be feared that difficulties will still "occasionally rise.

Ibid. p. 1364.

"Rarely will the Prussian Government refuse the subsidiary issue of an emigration permit to individuals who, in their infancy, were taken from His Majesty's territory by their parents, except in cases when there had been a judgment of a Prussian Court against the applicant.

"At the close of your note of the 15th instant, you still quote Section 23 of the Law of the 21st of December 1842. I permit myself to request you will notice, Sir, that the term of 10 years fixed for the return to Prussia of a subject of His Majesty, only runs from the 1st of January 1843; and that if said paragraph authorizes the Government to consider an uninterrupted absence of more than 10 years as importing the loss of the quality of a Prussian subject, it does not, nevertheless, dispense the absentee from duties which he ought to discharge while he was a Prussian."

Several more conscription cases are given in the Senate documents, but the next document of importance is a dispatch from Mr. Wright (who had succeeded Mr. Barnard), dated September 28, 1858, in which he states, "No American Consul or "Minister can shield from impressment a United "States' citizen born in Prussia. Is it possible "that there is no remedy for this state of things? "My opinion is that, if a decided and firm stand "be taken by our Government during the present "peculiar position of affairs in Prussia, it will "lead to good results. It is certainly worthy of a "trial."

Mr. Wright having furnished the United States' Government with information which he had procured from the Prussian Government respecting the laws of enlistment and expatriation (see Laws of Prussia) continued to urge the necessity of steps being taken to protect the interests of United States' naturalized citizens; and on the 8th of July 1859 Mr. Cass furnished him with instructions asserting the right of the United States to carry to much greater lengths than they had hitherto done the doctrine of the immunity from native allegiance and its duties conferred by foreign naturalization.

"United States' Senate Documents, 1859–60," vol. ii., p. 133.

"The right of expatriation cannot at this day be doubted or denied in the United States. The idea has been repudiated ever since the origin of our Government, that a man is bound to remain for ever in the country of his birth, and that he has no right to exercise his free will and consult his own happiness by selecting a new home. The most eminent writers on public law recognized the right of expatriation. This can only be contested by those who, in the nineteenth century, are still devoted to the ancient feudal law with all its oppression. The doctrine of perpetual allegiance is a relic of barbarism, which has been gradually disappearing from Christendom during the last century."

Mr. Cass then argues that the United States expressly recognize the right of expatriation by requiring applicants for naturalization to take an oath renouncing their native allegiance :—

"The moment a foreigner becomes naturalized, his allegiance to his native country is severed for ever. He experiences a new political birth. A broad and impassable line separates him from his native country. He is no more responsible for anything he may say or do, or omit to say or do, after assuming his new character than if he had been born in the United States. Should he return to his native country he returns as an American citizen, and in no other character. In order to entitle his original Government to punish him for an offence, this must have been committed while he was a subject and owed allegiance to that Government. The offence must have been complete before his expatriation. It much have been of such a character that he might have been tried and punished for it at the moment of his departure. A future liability to serve in the army will not be sufficient, because before the time can arrive for such service he has changed his allegiance, and become a citizen of the United States. . . . . In my letter to Mr. Hofer of the 14th ultimo I confine the foreign jurisdiction, in regard to our naturalized citizens, to such of them as 'were in the army or actually called into it' at the time they left Prussia, that is, to the case of actual desertion or a refusal to enter the army after having been regularly drafted and called into it by the Government to which at the time they owed allegiance."

There is another despatch from Mr. Cass to Mr. Wright, of the 12th of May 1859, in the same sense, in which he remonstrates against a declaration of Baron Manteuffel "that from the existing laws "of Prussia no former subject of the King, what-"ever his condition may be, has the right of "claiming his re-admission into Prussia," as inconsistent with the rights of United States' citizens under treaty with Prussia.

Ibid. p. 241.

"Under our Treaty with Prussia there can be no doubt that American citizens who owe no service to Prussia and have broken no Prussian law, have a right to visit and reside in Prussian territories without being in any way molested by the Government."

The note from Baron Manteuffel here referred to is not published.

Parliamentary Paper, "North America, No. 2, 1862."

United States' Papers relating to Foreign Affairs, 1861–62.

There is no further mention of the conscription of naturalized Americans in Prussia in the published correspondence until May 6, 1862, when Mr. Seward writes to Mr. Judd that the question must be postponed until the United States and Prussia have been relieved from present anxieties.

This despatch was called forth by the release from the army, as an act of comity, of two naturalized Americans, for which Mr. Seward instructs Mr. Judd to thank the Prussian Government.

In March 1863 Mr. Seward wrote to Mr. Judd: "Instances have occurred where Europeans who "have become naturalized citizens of the United "States have left the country when their services "were required, and returned to Europe to avoid "needful military duty here, and then have in-"voked the protection of the United States to "screen them from military duty there. Hence-"forth you will make no further applications in "these military cases without specific instructions."

United States' Papers relating to Foreign Affairs, 1862–63, vol. ii. p. 1029.

Nor does anything on the subject appear in the papers relating to Foreign Affairs for 1864–65.

"United States' Executive Documents," 3rd Sess., 38th Congress, vol. iv.

Mr. Judd revived the controversy by calling Mr. Seward's attention, on the 9th of August 1865, to the position of naturalized Americans, many of whom, having acquired the rights of United States' citizenship under Act of Congress by service in the United States' army, had returned to Prussia at the conclusion of the civil war, and were now threatened with compulsory conscription.

"United States' Diplomatic Correspondence, 1865," vol. iii p. 60.

Mr. Wright was re-appointed Minister in September 1865, and shortly afterwards recommenced an agitation on behalf of naturalized Americans.

He reported to Mr. Seward that during that year at least 500 naturalized Americans had returned to Prussia, liable to military duty according to Prussian law; but that the Prussian authorities did not succeed in placing in the army one in a hundred.

Ibid. p. 64.

As an instance he forwarded to Mr. Seward a copy of a note from Baron Thile, stating that one Breiger, a naturalized American, had been condemned to a fine of 50 thalers, or one month's imprisonment, for having left the country with intention of avoiding military duty; but that the Prussian Government would allow him to make a short stay in Prussia, on submitting to the judgment and paying costs.

In November Mr. Wright had an interview with Count Bismarck, who said that "it would be almost "impossible to change by legislation the Prussian "laws in view of the prejudice among the German "peasants, that as all Prussians are subject to "military duty, the returning adopted citizens "would be exempt," and added "that the subject "could only be adjusted by some treaty arrange-"ment with the United States."

Ibid. p. 66.

As a basis for such an arrangement Count Bismarck suggested "exemption to all Prussian "subjects returning to their native land who had "left before their seventeenth year, and exemption "also to all other persons who were not in the "army or notified to enter at the time of leaving, "and who shall have been out of the country for "years."

Count Bismarck further suggested that such a Treaty might be brought about by a Prussian proposal for a re-consideration of the Extradition Treaty of 1838 especially with regard to deserters; upon which the United States might make a counter proposal for a Convention on the subject of their naturalized citizens.

On the 2nd of December Mr. Seward furnished Mr. Wright with the following instructions :—

Ibid. p. 68.

"Considerations of ease and policy prevailed with "this Department to allow the subject to rest "during the continuance of the war. We became "even less anxious upon the subject when it "was seen that worthless naturalized citizens fled "before the requirement of military service by "their adopted Government here, and not only took "refuge from such service in their native land, "but impertinently demanded that the United "States should interpose to procure their ex-"emption from military service exacted here.

"Those circumstances, however, have passed away "and the question presents itself in its original "form. The United States have accepted and "established a Government upon the principle of "the rights of men who have committed no crime "to choose the State in which they will live, and to "incorporate themselves as members of that State, "and to enjoy henceforth its privileges and bene- "fits, among which is included protection. This "principle is recommended by sentiments of "humanity and abstract justice. It is a principle "which we cannot waive. It is not believed that "the military service which can be procured by "any foreign State in denial of this principle can "be important or even useful to that State. The "President desires that you will present the "subject to the serious consideration of Count "Bismarck. In doing so, you will assure him. . "that we shall be ready to receive and consider "with candour any opinions upon the subject that "the Prussian Government may think fit to com- "municate, and any suggestions . . . relative "to the Extradition Laws of the two countries."

'United States' Diplomatic Correspondence, 1866," p. 2.

On the 16th of December Mr. Wright transmitted to Mr. Seward a Memorandum with which he had been furnished by Baron Thile, showing the amendments which the Prussian Government considered might be made in the Extradition Treaty and adding,

"Advantages respecting the legislation on the nationality of Prussian subjects which could eventually be conceded to Prussian subjects who are or wish to become citizens of America:

"1. It would be granted that, after an absence of 10 years from Prussia, not only the rights, but also the duties and obligations of a Prussian subject towards his native country cease to prevail. This is a principle which till now has been followed by Prussian authorities only in some isolated cases, but which has not been generalized nor is law in the country.

"2. The Article 110 of the Prussian code says: Whosoever leaves Prussia with a view to avoid his enlistment in the Royal army will be punished, either by a fine of 50 or 100 thalers, or by imprisonment from one month to one year.

Ibid. p. 4. "An exemption from this general rule might be introduced in favour of such individuals who leave Prussia before the age of seventeen years."

Ibid. p. 6. On the 15th of January 1866 the sentence on Breiger was annulled.

Ibid. p. 10. In February Mr. Seward sent to Mr. Wright two letters from naturalized Americans in the Prussian army, and directed him to request their release as an act of favour.

At an interview in March, Count Bismarck suggested, as a compromise, that seven years should be the term of absence to constitute expatriation, instead of 10, "and remarked upon the impossi- "bility of Prussia changing her laws on the sub- "ject of military duty. To abolish these laws, he "said, would be plainly impracticable for a country "situated like Prussia; while to relax their strin- "gency in favour of American emigrants beyond "the concessions (as he termed them, alluding to "his protocol proposals) would not only amount to "the practical abrogation of said statutes in case "of all that had emigrated to the United States, "or intended to do so in the future, but would be "actually offering a sort of emigration premium to Ibid. p. 12. "all able-bodied men who had attained the age "when they might be called out for active service "in the army."

Mr. Wright urged upon Mr. Seward to accept Count Bismarck's proposal.

Mr. Seward replied, April 9, 1866, that he would be happy to discuss the matter with Count Bismarck, but it must be in direct communication with the Prussian Government, and not at second-hand; that he could not give a formal answer to an argument presented not in writing, but orally, and made known only by Mr. Wright's report.

The Austro-Prussian war gave rise to a great number of conscription cases. In most instances the offenders were either pardoned or let off with a fine. "United States' Diplomatic Correspondence, 1866," p. 47.

On the 24th of September 1866 Mr. Wright reports, "There is some doubt whether the amnesty "will embrace the cases of our adopted citizens "who have been fined, during their absence, for "neglect of military duty. Baron Roon, Minister "of War, will be adverse to our view of its con- "struction. Count Bismarck will, if possible, Ibid. p. 46. "extend its provisions to all such cases."

On the same date Mr. Seward instructed Mr. Wright to "suggest to Count Bismarck the inquiry, "whether it would not be deemed consistent now "with the dignity and greatness of Prussia to re- "cognize the principle of naturalization as a natural "and inherent right of manhood. In reflecting "upon the subject, I am not able to believe that "Prussia, any more than the United States, can "or need to rely upon compulsory military service "by subjects who have incorporated themselves as "members of foreign States.

"Secondly, I know of no circumstances which "would tend to place Prussia on an elevation so "high among the modern nations as the adoption "of that principle which lies at the basis of the "American Republic."

This closes the published correspondence with Prussia on this subject. Lord A. Loftus, No. 108; February 22, 1868.

On the 22nd of February 1868 a Treaty was signed at Berlin between the North German Confederation and the United States of America, consisting of six Articles, of which the following are the most important:—

1. Every subject of the North German Confederation naturalized in the United States of America, and having resided there during five years, shall be considered by the North German Confederation as an American subject, and treated as such. Every American citizen naturalized in the North German Confederation as an American subject, and having resided there five years, shall be considered by the Government of the United States of America as a German subject, and treated as such.

2. Every naturalized subject of either State, who may return to the land of his birth, cannot be prosecuted for any criminal offences unless they shall have been committed by him previously to his expatriation.

4. Every naturalized subject, who, having no intention of returning to the country of his adoption, resides continuously during two years in his former country, is presumed to have renounced his naturalization.

For this and other similar treaties, see p. 149.

GERMAN STATES.

As the minor German States are now for the most part incorporated in the North German Confederation, it will probably be sufficient to refer to the correspondence without giving a summary of it:—

Oldenburg, Senate Documents, 1st Session, 36th Congress, vol. ii. pp. 129, 221; Hanover, ditto, p. 143; Frankfort, pp. 231, 235; Hamburg, p. 171. It appears from these latter papers that a system existed by which a citizen of Hamburg who wished to expatriate himself was required to procure a discharge ("austritt") from the "nexus," a law bureau appointed for the purpose.

This discharge was only given on proof being afforded that the applicant had fulfilled his military obligations. (Letter from Syndic of Hamburg, June 18, 1850.)

Bremen, ditto, pp. 191, 195, 211. In a despatch to Mr. Schleiden, of the 9th of April 1859, Mr. Cass thus explains himself: "It is undoubtedly "true that this Government has acquiesced in the "opinion expressed by Mr. Wheaton that, when a "citizen who has been liable to military duty "leaves his own country without permission and "without having performed this duty, and is "naturalized in another country, he may be held "to discharge his liability whenever he is found "again in his native State. This opinion, how-"ever, is regarded by this Government as apply-"ing not to cases of inchoate liability, but to cases "only where the liability has been complete."

This correspondence turned upon the question of the right of Bremen to surrender to another German State a naturalized American owing military duty to such State. The United States contended that such a surrender could not be acquiesced in; and Bremen maintained that there was a double duty to do it,—1st, in virtue of the existing arrangements on the subject with the other States; and 2nd, because a defaulter from military service in another State was a defaulter from the Federal Army of which the Bremen contingent formed a part.

AUSTRIA.

The laws of Austria regarding expatriation seem to have been sufficient to prevent any questions arising with regard to the conscription of naturalized Americans in the Austrian army; at all events no correspondence on the subject is published in the United States' Congress Papers.

There are, however, two cases in which the rights of subjects of the Austrian Empire naturalized in the United States have been discussed.

"Hertslet's State Papers," Vol. xliv. p. 925-1042. Dana's Edition of "Wheaton," Note p. 146.

The first and best known is that of Martin Kotza.

Martin Kozta, a Hungarian was one of the refugees of 1848–9. He went to Turkey, where he was arrested and imprisoned at Kutahieh, but released on condition of leaving the country.

He came to the United States and made the usual declaration of intention to become naturalized.

He then returned to Turkey in 1853, and went to Smyrna, on commercial business, where he obtained from the United States' Consul a teskereh (or travelling pass), stating that he was entitled to American protection.

On the 21st of June 1853 Kozta was seized by some persons in the pay of the Austrian Consulate and taken out into the harbour in a boat; they then threw him into the sea, and he was picked up by a boat from the Austrian man-of-war "Hussar."

The United States' Consul went on board to remonstrate, but the Captain of the "Hussar" persisted in retaining Kozta.

"State Papers," vol. xliv. p. 935.

On being informed of the circumstances, the United States' Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople requested the Captain of the United States' ship of war "St. Louis" to demand Kozta's release, and, if necessary, to have recourse to force.

The "St. Louis" then went down to Smyrna, and the Captain, in pursuance of his instructions, stated to the Commander of the "Hussar" that unless Kozta was at once delivered to him he should take him by force of arms.

As such a conflict would have led to the destruction of the greater part of the shipping, and probably of the town, the French Consul offered his mediation, and Kozta was then given over to his care to be kept until the decision of the respective Governments was ascertained.

The matter was eventually compromised by an arrangement being come to between the Austrian Internuncio and the United States' Minister at Constantinople that Kozta should be shipped off back to the United States, the Austrians reserving the right to proceed against him in case he returned to Turkey.

"Le Gouvernement Impérial se réserve cependant de procéder contre cet individu conformément à ses droits, dès qu'il serait surpris une autre fois sur le territoire Ottoman." "State Papers," vol. xliv. p. 1015.

It is to be remarked that the Turkish Government had protested against the invasion of their territorial jurisdiction by the Austrian Consul and Captain. Ibid. p. 971.

On the 29th of August 1853 the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires at Washington presented a formal remonstrance to the United States Government, protesting against the claim of the United States to afford protection to Kozta, and urging them to disavow the conduct of their Agents and to grant reparation for the insult offered to the Austria flag. Ibid. p. 972.

Mr. Marcy replied on the 26th of September 1853. Ibid. p. 984.

In this note, which is of great length, Mr. Marcy gives a full account of the affair, and maintains the propriety of the course adopted by the United States' Minister, Consul, and Captain, pointing out that, independently of the question whether Kozta was or was not entitled to American protection, the Austrians could have no right to seize him upon Turkish soil.

The following are some of the principal passages in which Mr. Marcy deals with the right of Kozta to United States' protection:—

"There is great diversity and much confusion of opinion as to the nature and obligations of allegiance. By some it is held to be an indestructible political tie, and though resulting from the mere accident of birth, yet for ever binding the subject to the Sovereign; by others it is considered a political connexion in the nature of a civil contract, indissoluble by mutual consent, but not so at the option of either party. The sounder and more prevalent doctrine, however, is, that the citizen or subject, having faithfully performed the past and present duties resulting from this relation to the Sovereign Power, may at any time release himself from the obligation of allegiance, freely quit the land of his birth and adoption, seek through all countries a home, or select anywhere that which offers him the fairest prospect of happiness for himself and his posterity. . . . The proposition that Kozta at Smyrna was not an Austrian subject can be sustained on another ground. By a decree of the Emperor of Austria of the 24th of March 1832, Austrian subjects leaving the dominions of the Emperor without permission of the magistrate, and a release of Austrian citizenship, and with an intention never to return, become 'unlawful emigrants,' and lose all their civil and political rights at home." Ibid. p. 987.

"Mr. Hulsemann, as the undersigned believes, falls into a great error, an error fatal to some of his most important conclusions, by assuming that a nation can properly extend its protection only to native-born or naturalized citizens. This is not the doctrine of international law, nor is the practice of nations circumscribed within such narrow limits. This law does not, as has been before remarked, complicate questions of this nature by respect for municipal codes. In relation to this subject it has clear and distinct rules of its own. It gives the national character of the country, not only to native-born and naturalized citizens, but to all residents in it who are there with, or even without, an intention to become citizens, provided they have a domicil therein. Foreigners may, and often do, acquire a domicil in a country, even though they have entered it with the avowed intention not to become naturalized citizens, but to return to "State Papers," vol. xliv. p. 996.

their native land at some remote and uncertain period, and whenever they acquire a domicil, international law at once impresses upon them the national character of the country of that domicil. It is a maxim of international law that domicil confers a national character; it does not allow anyone who has a domicil to decline the national character thus conferred; it forces it upon him often very much against his will, and to his great detriment. International law looks only to the national character in determining what country has the right to protect. If a person goes from this country abroad, with the nationality of the United States, this law enjoins upon other nations to respect him, in regard to protection, as an American citizen. It concedes to every country the right to protect any and all who may be clothed with its nationality."

Mr. Marcy then quotes several authorities to show what constitutes domicil:—

State Papers," ol. xliv. p. 998.

"As the national character, according to the law of nations, depends upon the domicil, it remains as long as the domicil is retained, and is changed with it. Kozta was therefore vested with the nationality of an American citizen at Smyrna, if he, in contemplation of law, had a domicil in the United States." . . "There may be a reluctance in some quarters to adopt the views herein presented relative to the doctrine of domicil and consequent nationality, lest the practical assertion of it might in some instances give a right of protection to those who do not deserve it. Fears are entertained that this doctrine offers a facility for acquiring a national character which will lead to alarming abuses; that under the shadow of it political agitators, intent upon disturbing the repose of their own or other countries might come to the United States with a view to acquire a claim to their protection, and then to return to their former scenes of action, to carry on, under a changed national character, their ulterior designs with greater security and better success. This apprehension is believed to be wholly unfounded. The first distinct act done by them towards the accomplishment of these designs would disclose their fraudulent purpose in coming to and seeking a domicil in this country. Such a development would effectually disprove the fact that they acquired a domicil here and with it our nationality."

Ibid. p. 1000.

Simon Tousig.

This case further elucidates and explains the doctrine of domicil advocated by the United States in the affair of Martin Kozta.

Tousig, a subject of Austria, had acquired a domicil in the United States, but was not naturalized, and voluntarily returned to Austria with a passport from the American Department of State. He was arrested on charge of offences committed before leaving Austria. He appealed to the United States Minister for protection, who laid the case before the State Department. Mr. Marcy replied on the 10th of January 1854:—

Lawrence's Appendix to "Wheaton," Ed. 1863, p. 929. Cong. Doc., 33rd Congress, 1st Sess. H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 41.*

"I have carefully examined your despatches relating to the case of Simon Tousig, and regret to find that it is one which will not authorize a more effective interference than that which you have already made in his behalf. It is true he left this country with a passport issued from this Department; but as he was neither a native-born nor naturalized citizen, he was not entitled to it. It is only to citizens that passports are issued.

"Assuming all that could possibly belong to Tousig's case—that he had a domicil here, and was actually clothed with the nationality of the United States—there is a feature in it which distinguishes it from that of Kozta. Tousig voluntarily returned to Austria and placed himself within the reach of her municipal laws. He went by his free act under their jurisdiction, and thereby subjected himself to them. If he had incurred penalties or assumed duties while under these laws, he might have expected they would have been enforced against him, and should have known that the new political relation he had acquired, if indeed he had acquired any, could not operate as a release from these penalties. Having been once subject to the municipal laws of Austria, and while under her jurisdiction violated those laws, his withdrawal from that jurisdiction, and acquiring a different national character, would not exempt him from their operation whenever he again choose to place himself under them."

* This volume is unfortunately missing from the Foreign Office Library.

BAVARIA.

Mr. Attorney-General Black, in the case of Amthor, a Bavarian, naturalized in the United States, who returned to Bavaria, gave an opinion,† in 1857, admitting the right to renounce the citizenship of naturalization and resume that of birth, by an actual and bonâ fide return with family and property and a change of permanent domicil. Mr. Black said that no mode of renunciation was prescribed; but, as the right was admitted, if the fact and intent coincided and were sufficient to satisfy the Government of the United States, and Bavaria treated Amthor as a citizen, he could not claim the rights of a citizen of the United States or invoke its protection.

Dana's "Wheaton," sec. 5. p. 144.

† There is no copy of this in the Foreign Office Library.

FRANCE.

The first of the papers in this correspondence presents another phase of the American doctrine.

"Department of State, Washington,

"SIR, June 1, 1852.

"I HAVE to acknowledge the receipt of your letter to Mr. Reddall, of the 28th ultimo, inquiring whether M. Victor B. Delpierre, a native of France, but a naturalized citizen of the United States, can expect the protection of this Government in that country when proceeding thither with a passport from this Department. In reply, I have to inform you that if, as is understood to be the fact, the Government of France does not acknowledge the right of natives of that country to renounce their allegiance, it may lawfully claim their services when found within French jurisdiction.

Senate Documents, 1859-60 vol. ii. p. 55.

"I am, &c.

"J. B. Nines, Esq., DANIEL WEBSTER.
"New York."

Lucian Alibert.

This case has already been referred to in M. Treitt's Report. Ibid. p. 176.

Alibert was a native of Digne, Basses Alpes. He went to the United States in 1838 at the age of 18, and, after going through the usual formalities, was naturalized in 1846. In 1852 he returned to France and was arrested while on a visit to Dignes as an "insoumis" of 1839, and pleaded his naturalization as exempting him from service. The United States Consul at Marseilles applied to the General commanding the district, who informed him that Alibert's claim was founded in right, if his naturalization was really dated in 1846, as his naturalization would incapacitate him from serving in the French army and the date of it would prove that more than three years had elapsed since the offence was committed (that being the period of limitation required by the Penal Code), and that he could not consequently be proceeded against for insubordination. Nevertheless Alibert was brought before a "Conseil de Guerre" at Marseilles, and condemned to a month's imprisonment.

The cause was then brought by appeal before a superior Military Court at Toulon and the sentence quashed, thereby establishing Alibert's immunity from conscription.

Michel Zeiter.

Senate Documents, 1859—60, vol. ii. p. 198.

In 1859 Mr. Cass directed the United States Minister at Paris to procure information on the French Law of naturalization, &c., and at the same time instructed him as follows: "This Government maintains the right of expatriation and naturalization, and maintains also that if a foreign-born citizen, naturalized here, returns to his native country, he is not liable to military duty, except such as was actually due and which he had been called upon to perform before his emigration. In any communication you may have with the Minister for Foreign Affairs you will make known to him these views of the United States."

Lawrence's Appendix to "Wheaton," p. 928.

Accordingly, when the case of Michel Zeiter arose in 1860, Mr. Faulkner made a communication in this sense to M. Thouvenel: "Our doctrine is that the naturalized emigrant cannot be held responsible upon his return to his native country for any military duty, the performance of which has not been actually demanded of him prior to his emigration. A prospective liability to service in the army is not sufficient. The obligation of contingent duties depending upon time, sortition, or events thereafter to occur, is not recognized. To subject him to such responsibility, it should be a case of actual desertion or refusal to enter the army, after having been actually drafted into the service of the Government to which he, at the time, owed allegiance."

The case of Michel Zeiter is so fully explained in M. Treitt's Report and in the copy of the Judgment of the Provincial Court in Addenda F., that it is unnecessary to say anything more about it here.

President Buchanan referred to these cases in his Message to Congress of the 3rd of December 1860:—

"With France, our ancient and powerful ally, our relations continue to be of the most friendly character. A decision has recently been made by a French judicial tribunal, with the approbation of the Imperial government, which cannot fail to foster the sentiments of mutual regard that have so long existed between the two countries. Under the French law, no person can serve in the armies of France, unless he be a French citizen. The law of France recognizing the natural right of expatriation, it follows as a necessary consequence, that a Frenchman by the fact of having become a citizen of the United States has changed his allegiance, and has lost his native character. He cannot therefore be compelled to serve in the French armies, in case he should return to his native country. These principles were announced in 1852 by the French Minister of War; and in two late cases have been confirmed by the French judiciary. In these, two natives of France have been discharged from the French army, because they had become American citizens. To employ the language of our present Minister to France, who has rendered good service on this occasion, 'I do not think our French naturalized fellow-citizens will hereafter experience much annoyance on this subject.' I venture to predict that the time is not far distant when the other Continental Powers will adopt the same wise and just policy which has done so much honour to the enlightened government of the Emperor. In any event, our government is bound to protect the rights of our naturalized citizens everywhere, to the same extent as though they had drawn their first breath in this country. We can recognize no distinction between our native and naturalized citizens."

United States' Diplomatic Correspondence, 1866, Part I. p. 291.

The next published correspondence is in 1866 respecting the cases of MM. Schneider, Cochener, Todry, and Pierre.

These persons were all naturalized in the United States, and had returned to France with American passports.

The cases were all alike. The men were severally arrested as "insoumis" on their arrival within their native communes, and detained for some time in prison, with more or less rough usage, until the local tribunals decided on their claims for exemption.

They were all eventually discharged.

The United States' Minister at Paris, Mr. Bigelow, remonstrated in strong terms against these proceedings, and M. Drouyn de Lhuys in each case replied that the complainants must prove their claims to exemption in the usual manner, citing the case of Zeiter to show the impartiality with which such applications was dealt with. If François Pierre had been an American by birth, or a citizen of the United States under other circumstances, his passport would certainly have protected him from prosecution for the offence in question; but when a person "returns to his native country with foreign naturalization papers, it is not just to lay aside his nativity and admit his new nationality as protecting him by retroactive effect, contrary to every principle of law, against former acts, and particularly against offences of which he was guilty, a Frenchman, as in the present case. His presence in his native country obliges him to explain his case by the laws of the land, and as long as he has not done that, he is considered to have preserved his primitive citizenship."

United States' Senate Documents, vol. ii. p. 302.

M. Drouyn de Lhuys, however, suggested at an interview on the 28th of April 1866, that naturalized Americans should be directed to proceed at once on returning to France to the mairie where their names were enrolled, and to claim exemption from the conscription, and get their names removed from the list.

Ibid. p. 299.

Mr. Seward, on the 7th of May 1866, instructed Mr. Bigelow to urge on the French Government that an American passport should be considered sufficient proof of nationality, and that if a person representing himself to be an alien were conscribed, the military tribunals should decide summarily on his claims to exemption; and if they decided against him, the matter should be at once submitted to the Government for diplomatic discussion.

Ibid. p. 304.

SPAIN.

President's Message, December 23, 1851. Executive Documents, 1 Sess., 32nd Congress, vol. iii. No. 10.

In communicating to Congress the papers respecting the imprisonment, in Cuba, of Mr. John S. Thrasher, a native American, domiciled in that island, who had been condemned to eight years imprisonment for assisting Lopez' expedition, Mr. Webster stated, "The first general question then is, as to his right to exemption from Spanish law and authority on the ground of his being a native-born citizen of the United States.

"The general rule of the public law is that every person of full age has a right to change his domicil; and it follows, that when he removes to another place, with the intention to make that place his permanent residence, or his residence for an indefinite period, it becomes instantly his place of domicil; and this is so, notwithstanding he may entertain a floating intention of returning to his original residence or citizenship at some future period. . . . . .

"In questions on this subject, the chief point to be considered is the animus manendi, or intention of continued residence; and this must be decided by reasonable rules, and the general principles of evidence.

"If it sufficiently appear that the intention of removing was to make a permanent settlement, or a residence for an indefinite time, the right of domicil is acquired by a residence even of a few days. . . . . .

"It is undoubtedly true that an American citizen who goes into a foreign country, although he owes local and temporary allegiance to that country, is yet, if he performs no other act changing his condition, entitled to the protection of his own Government; and if without the violation of any municipal law, he should be treated unjustly, he would have a right to claim that protection. . . . But his situation is completely changed when, by his own act, he has made himself the subject of a foreign Power. . . . . .

"But, independently of a residence with intention to continue such residence; independently of any domiciliation; independently of the taking of any oath of allegiance or of renouncing any former allegiance; it is well known that, by the public law, an alien, or a stranger born, for so long a time as he continues within the dominions of a foreign Government, owes obedience to the laws of that Government, and may be punished for treason or other crimes, as a native-born subject might be unless his case is varied by some treaty stipulations; but this duty of obedience to the laws, arising from local and temporary allegiance, ceases, of course, the moment he transfers himself back to his original country. . . . . Our citizens who resort to countries where trial by jury is not known, and who may there be charged with crime, frequently imagine, when the laws of those countries are administered in the forms customary therein, that they are deprived of rights to which they are entitled, and therefore may expect the interference of their own Government. . . . . They have chosen to settle themselves in a country where jury trials are not known, where the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is unheard of, and where judicial proceedings in criminal cases are brief and summary. Having made this election they must abide its consequences.

"No man can carry the ægis of his national American liberty into a foreign country, and expect to hold it up for his exemption from the dominion and authority of the laws, and the sovereign power of that country, unless he be authorized so to do by the virtue of treaty stipulations."

Halleck's "International Law," chap. xxix. p. 698.

In the case of Ignacio Tolen, a native of Spain, but naturalized in the United States, Mr. Webster (June 25, 1852,) said, "If that Government (Spain) "recognizes the right of its subjects to denationalize themselves and assimilate with the citizens "of other countries, the usual passport will be a "sufficient safeguard to you; but if allegiance to "the Crown of Spain may not legally be renounced "by its subjects, you must expect to be liable to the "obligations of a Spanish subject, if you voluntarily "place yourself within the jurisdiction of that "Government."

Senate Documents, 1859–60, vol. ii, p. 224.

In 1860 a case occurred at Havana, of Sabino de Liaño, a native of Spain naturalized in the United States, being arrested as a conscript.

In reply to the representations of the United States' Consul, the Captain-General informed him that by a Royal Decree of the 17th of November 1852, "the foreigner obtaining naturalization in "Spain, as well as the Spaniard obtaining it "within the territory of another Power, without "the knowledge and authorization of his respective Government, shall not exempt himself from "the obligations which were consequent to his "primitive nationality, although the subject of "Spain may in other respects lose the quality of "Spaniard, conformably to what is prescribed in "Article 1 of the Constitution of the Monarchy."

United States' Senate Documents, vol. ii. p. 228.

Eventually, the proceedings taken against Mr. Liaño were suspended, and a bond which he had entered into to provide a substitute cancelled by the Governor-General.

DENMARK.

Ibid. p. 203.

A Dane named Boie Smidt, who had visited the United States and declared his intention of naturalizing, having on his return to Copenhagen, in September 1859, been arrested and impressed into the Danish navy, the United States' Minister demanded his release.

United States' Senate Documents, vol. ii. p. 204.

The Danish Government replied, that "if it "should turn out, upon an investigation, that the "said Mr. Smidt, when he signified his intention "to be naturalized in the United States, was, "under the laws of the country, bound afterwards "to perform his military service in his native "country," the laws then in force would not admit of his release.

Ibid. p. 205.

The United States' Minister rejoined that "it is "a settled doctrine of the Government which I "have the honour here to represent, as I understand it, that a naturalized citizen of the United "States, from and after the date of his naturalization both at home and abroad, is placed on the "very same footing with a native citizen, with "the exception that none but a native citizen can "occupy the office of President or Vice-President "of the United States; and the Government will "be disposed to extend to the one class of citizens the same protection which justly belongs to "the other at all times and in all places."

Mr. Smidt got tired of performing military duty in a fortress while his case was being discussed, and procured a substitute.

The United States' Minister than asked either for the discharge of the substitute or the refund of the money paid by Mr. Smidt for engaging him.

It does not appear how the matter ended.

RUSSIA.

Executive Documents of the House of Representatives, 1864–65, vol. iii. part iii. p. 301.

In July 1864 the Russian Minister at Washington informed Mr. Seward that, "according to "existing laws of Russia, every foreigner who "becomes a subject of Russia, and at a later time "renounces this character, is obliged to pay before "his departure the equivalent for the taxes for "three years, and some other imposts, to obtain "the right to export his property.

"The Imperial Government has stated to me that under a new regulation the subjects and citizens of powers by whom the dues above-mentioned are not enforced, will be exonerated therefrom."

Mr. Seward replied that no such impost was levied in the United States.

Diplomatic Correspondence, 1866, part i. p. 391.

On the 31st of January 1866 Mr. Seward directed Mr. C. M. Clay, the United States' Minister at St. Petersburg, to do what he could, should it be deemed advisable to procure the release of a Russian Pole, Benjamin Goldberg, a naturalized citizen of the United States, who was said to have been arrested and forced into the Russian army.

No further papers respecting this case are published.

Ibid. p. 416.

On the 14th of July 1866 Mr. Clay reports:—

"I am informed that Stanislaus Pongoski, a Russian Pole and naturalized citizen of the United States, has been proved to have become our fellow-citizen without leave of the Emperor of Russia, and by the Article 367 of the Penal Code he has been deprived of all the rights of Russian citizenship and banished for ever from the Russian empire, and this sentence has been put into execution. I don't see that we can complain, as it settles the question of denaturalization virtually in our favour, and avoids unpleasant issues."

Mr. Seward, in reply, says that he is "glad to "see that the Russian Government has accepted "that important principle definitively. Certainly "there is no cause of complaint to the proceeding "on our part, provided that Pongoski does not "feel himself aggrieved.

"The case may perhaps demand careful examination if it shall turn out that the decree of perpetual exclusion thus pronounced against an admitted American citizen was based upon no other ground than his having voluntarily accepted that character under the Constitution and laws of the United States. In the meantime we may presume that political or other offences entered into the merits of the decree."

COSTA RICA.

United States' Diplomatic Correspondence, 1866, vol. ii. p. 430.

In December 1865, Mr. Riotte reported to Mr. Seward that "young men from this Republic go to "the United States, remain there for a short time, "obtain, by means of hard swearing and an inexcusable levity on the part of the Court, letters of "naturalization, upon which they return for good "to their native country, or leave the United "States for other parts; and all this for the sole "purpose of making this citizenship a bar against "the enforcement of whatever obligation by their "native or any other Government. . . I think "it bad that Clerks of Courts, too, are authorized "to grant such papers, and that it is not made the "exclusive duty and privilege of Courts in open "session, which would certainly prevent a good "deal of false swearing. But the main difficulty "is, in our large cities two witnesses can be got, "at any moment, and very cheap, to swear to anything; that the persons hunting up such witnesses have, as a matter of course, made up their "minds beforehand to commit perjury; that there "is no officer bound to look after the interest of "the United States in such cases, and that the "Judges or Clerks, instead of requiring two good "substantial witnesses (they ought to know them "personally), seem to be satisfied with almost any "class of witnesses."

Messrs. Francisco and Juan Quezada, who had obtained naturalization under such circumstances, appealed to their American citizenship to protect them from the Costa Rica conscription.

Ibid, p. 431.

The Costa Rican authorities could not, "even "for a moment, admit that a Costa Rican naturalized in a foreign country continues that character after having returned to the country with "the implicit intention to live in it;" but agreed to consult Mr. Riotte.

Mr. Riotte refused to interfere, first, because Messrs. Quezada had become re-domiciled in Costa Rica, and, secondly, as he stated to them, "even "assuming, for argument's sake, that you were "still citizens of the United States, there is another "consideration which is not to be lost sight of in "deciding upon your second request. A Law of "Costa Rica (of December 2, 1850) imposes upon "every citizen the obligation to serve in the army. "You had not complied with that duty previous to "your adoption as American citizens: and it is the "enforcement of that very duty which has brought "out your claim to the United States' citizenship. "Now, I know well that the claim of an adopted "citizen's native country to the fulfilment of his "military duty towards that country, and the extent of that claim, was, and is at this moment, a "mooted question between the Government of the "United States and several European monarchies. "Until that question is decided, however, I can "scarcely fail if I adopt the view of one of our "greatest statesmen, when he answered an adopted "citizen in a case perfectly the same as yours:— "'But having returned to the country of your "'birth, your native domicil and national charac"'ter revert, and you are bound to obey the laws "'exactly as if you had not emigrated.'"

On the 16th of February 1866 Mr. Seward wrote to Mr. Riotte, "The proceedings you have adopted, "and the decision you have arrived at in the premises, are approved."

The irregular proceedings by which Costa Ricans and others obtain certificates of naturalization in the United States, without any intention of residing there, to which Mr. Riotte thus called attention, are referred to in the recent report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

PART VI.—Correspondence between Great Britain and other Countries.

It would be manifestly impossible to give an abstract in this memorandum of all the correspondence which has taken place between Great Britain and other countries, as the preliminary search through the official registers and MS. volumes, even if the inquiry were restricted to the last thirty years, would probably occupy several weeks, if not months.

There are, however, certain standard cases which are frequently referred to as precedents, and which are consequently more readily accessible.

An effort will be made to give a résumé of these, as well as to examine cursorily the correspondence of the last few years.

The principal subject of correspondence has been the claim to British protection of the sons and grandsons of British subjects both in foreign countries.

By the Act 4 Geo. II. cap. 21. (explaining 7 Anne, cap 5) all children of natural-born British subjects born out of the legiance of the Crown of England are "adjudged and taken to be, and all Statutes at Large vol. v. p. 113.

"such children are hereby declared to be, natural, "born subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, to "all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever."

The Act 13 George III. cap. 21. extended the provisions of this statute to the grandchildren of native British subjects (vide ante, "Laws of Great Britain.")

On the other hand, as previously explained, the common law of England considers all persons born within British territory to be British subjects, without regard to their parentage.

A conflict hence arises between the principle of the British doctrine of native allegiance, and the statutory enactments extending that allegiance to the sons and grandsons of British subjects born within the legiance of other countries.

Such persons, finding that they are declared by statute to be subjects of the British Sovereign, naturally look to that Sovereign for protection in return.

The manner in which this claim is practically dealt with is shown by the following instructions to Consul Dale of the 20th December 1842, based upon an opinion delivered by Her Majesty's Advocate-General, and which forms the model on which all subsequent instructions to Her Majesty's Representatives or Consuls abroad upon this subject have been framed:—

"By the statute law of this country, all children born out of the allegiance of the King, whose fathers or grandfathers by the father's side were natural-born subjects, are themselves deemed to be natural-born subjects, and are therefore entitled to enjoy British rights and privileges while they are within British territory; but the effect of British statute law cannot extend so far as to take away from the Government of the country in which those persons may have been born, the right to claim them as natural-born subjects, at least, so long as they remain in that country.

"By the common law of England, all persons born within the King's allegiance, whether the children of British subjects or of foreigners, are deemed to be natural-born subjects of the Crown of England, and if the law of any foreign State be the same, by equally admitting to its rights as subjects, persons born within its own territory, that country has the right to exact the service of a subject from such person, even if he be the child of a foreigner, at least whilst such child remains in the country of his birth.

"Therefore the children or grandchildren, by the father's side, of natural-born British subjects born in any other country than Monte Video are entitled to be protected in that country as natural-born subjects of the Crown of Great Britain. But as regards the children of British fathers born in Monte Video, such children cannot be protected against the operations of the laws affecting the subjects of that country, unless the laws of that country do not admit the child of a foreigner to the rights of a subject."

ARGENTINE REPUBLIC—BUENOS AYRES.

Hansard, vol. xix. p. 177.

The struggle between Monte Video (Argentine Republic) and Buenos Ayres led to a variety of questions respecting the position of British subjects in the countries bordering on the River Plate.

In reply to an inquiry from Mr. Ewart in the House of Commons on the 4th of April, 1845, Sir Robert Peel stated "It appeared that the general "law was this: That the son or grandson of a "British subject born abroad was also a British "subject. But he could not deny that children born "in a foreign State were not also subjects of that "State. Such was the law in this country; for "the children of foreigners born in Her Majesty's "dominions were British subjects. If the children "of British residents at Buenos Ayres were born "out of that State, the authorities there had no "right to make them Buenos Ayrean subjects. If, "however, the children of British subjects were "born at Buenos Ayres and continued to reside "there, they obtained the rights of citizenship in "that place; but with those rights they also had "imposed upon them the burdens and duties of "citizens, and were liable to the law of Buenos "Ayres."

MS. Volume Nationality Cases. Mr. Hood, No. 48; December 16, 1850. To Mr. Hood, No. 7; March 24, 1851.

In December, 1850, Mr. Hood, Her Majesty's Consul at Buenos Ayres, requested instructions respecting the renewal of certificates of British nationality to natives of Hanover, and to British subjects who, from their occupation or business, were compelled by the local enactments to wear the red waistcoat, hatband, and ribbon, distinctive of Buenos Ayrean nationality.

Lord Palmerston replied, "that if there is a "Hanoverian Minister or Consul at Buenos Ayres "he should, of course, take charge of Hanoverian "subjects; but if there is no such officer, then "Hanoverian subjects may still continue to remain "under British protection, but it does not appear "to me to be necessary that fresh certificates of "British nationality should be granted to such "Hanoverians.

"I have further to state to you that a subject of Her Majesty cannot divest himself of his allegiance by submitting to any local enactment compelling him to wear any particular uniform or badge in a foreign country in which he may think proper to reside, and that he does not thereby forfeit his right to be protected by his own Government."

Mr. Christie, No. 125; October 23, 1857.

In October 1857 Mr. Christie reported that the Argentine National Congress had passed a law enabling the sons of aliens born within Argentine territory to choose between Argentine citizenship, and that of their fathers.

Mr. Christie added that he had advised the Buenos Ayrean Government, who were forcing the sons of aliens into their service, to make a similar law.

At the close of 1857 a large number of British residents at Buenos Ayres having addressed a Memorial to the British Government complaining of the forced enlistment of the sons of foreigners in the local militia, Lord Palmerston wrote a despatch to Mr. Christie acknowledging that Her Majesty's Government could not claim such persons as British subjects; but, pointing out the various reasons which could be urged, both on grounds of policy and comity, against such a rigid exercise of military law.

To Mr. Christie, No. 1; January 4, 1858.

This despatch is too long for insertion here, but it well deserves attention in case of an occasion arising in which similar arguments might be called for.

The result of this representation was that the Government of Buenos Ayres issued a Decree on the 12th of April 1858. "The Government has "resolved to admit substitutes for all the acts of "the service of the National Guard on the part of "the sons of foreigners born in the country (and "who by our laws, are citizens of it,) who may wish "to have them, subject to the regulations which "may be necessary and conducive to the good ser-"vice of the same, it being understood that the "substitutes must be foreigners and that their "principals will remain subject to all responsibility "consequent on all culpable default in the service."

Mr. Christie, No. 13; April 15, 1858.

Some communications took place from 1854 to 1857 between the English and French Governments as to the rights of the sons of aliens born in Buenos Ayres to the protection of the country of their fathers' birth.

In November 1857, Count Walewski informed Lord Cowley that the French Consuls had been instructed to contend that the sons of Frenchmen so situated were entitled to French protection, but that he had carefully considered the whole subject, and "that he must confess he considered the claim "untenable. The claim had been originally put "forward under the 10th Article of the 1st Book "of the Code Napoléon, which declares 'que tout "'enfant né d'un Français en pays étranger est "'Français,' and had always been insisted on until "now. On the other hand, his Excellency found "that by the 17th Article of the same Book and "Code it is declared, 'que la qualité de Français "se perdra par tout établissement fait en pays "étranger sans esprit de retour.' There was there-"fore an apparent contradiction in the Code itself, "to remedy which the interference of the Legisla-"ture would probably be required."

Lord Cowley, No. 625; November 28, 1857.

At a subsequent interview, Lord Cowley urged Count Walewski to send to the French Consuls the same instructions as had been sent to Mr. Christie. The Count replied, "that at this moment he was "not in a position to send any instructions what-"ever upon the subject, for that he was still "under the pressure of the interpretation put by "former Governments on the law of France. In "stating to me, as he had done some time back, "that he considered the position until now taken "by France on this question to be untenable, he "had only given his own private opinion—an "opinion, indeed, which he had expressed officially "in Council; and he had asked me for the English "practice in cases of this nature with the inten-"tion of employing it as a further argument with "the Minister of Justice for the necessity of chang-"ing the terms of the French law. Until this, how-"ever, should be accomplished, he had no choice "but to insist, as had his predecessors, that all "children born of French subjects abroad are "to all intents and purposes French subjects also.

Lord Cowley, No. 1,745; December 29, 1857.

"Count Walewski, however, said that as the law would without doubt be altered, he had recommended the Buenos Ayres Government to let the matter rest for the present."

The French law never has been altered.

On the 3rd of March 1860 Mr. Thornton forwarded a copy of a Treaty concluded between Spain and the Argentine Confederation, containing, among other provisions, an Article stipulating that the sons of Argentines and Spaniards, born in those respective countries, should be allowed to choose the nationality they may prefer, and suggested that England might claim for the sons of her subjects any exemption from military duty which this Treaty might confer on the sons of Spaniards.

Mr. Thornton, No. 25; March 1860.

To Mr. Thornton, No. 42; July 7, 1860.

Lord John Russell replied that it did not appear that any special privilege was secured to Spain by this Treaty, which merely adopted, as between the contracting parties, the existing law of each country as to nationality; and that even if any privileges had been given by this treaty to Spaniards, there was no most-favoured-nation clause on this particular point in the British Treaty of 1825, which entitled British subjects to claim the benefit of them.

To Mr. Thornton, No. 54; November 27, 1861.

On the 27th of November 1861 Lord Russell instructed Mr. Thornton that, if the sons of British subjects wished exemption from military service, they should exercise the option given to them by Argentine law, between Argentine and British nationality.

In 1862 Mr. Thornton raised the question whether, as the Argentine Provinces and the State of Buenos Ayres were recognized as separate belligerents, the sons of British subjects born within the provinces might not claim exemption from service in Buenos Ayres, and vice versâ.

To Mr. Thornton, No. 22; May 28, 1862.

Mr. Thornton was informed that, in the absence of any treaty stipulation, even aliens may under certain circumstances be rendered liable to military service in the country of their domicil, without any violation of international law, and that it must be remembered that the persons in question were not aliens in the Argentine Confederation.

Moreover, the law of September 29, 1857, seemed to extend to the sons of aliens, wheresoever born; and the provinces might therefore contend that those who had omitted to take advantage of its provisions had thereby constituted themselves Argentines by default.

Mr. Doria, No. 84; August 28, 1863, To Mr. Doria, No. 38; November 4, 1863.

In August 1863 Mr. Doria reported that it was proposed to pass a new law by which all persons born within the Argentine Confederation should be declared to be Argentine citizens, irrespective of the nationality of their parents.

Mr. Doria was approved for having protested against a retrospective application being given to this law, in regard to the children of British parents; as, although it appeared that there were no adult persons of this class who had availed themselves of the option given by the Law of 1857, to elect to be deemed British subjects, yet there might be others still in their minority whose time for making their election had not yet arrived.

At the same time, such a Law would not be ultra vires of the Argentine Confederation. It was quite competent to the Confederation to pass such a new Law, though, as an act of comity, it would be preferable to retain the previous one.

AUSTRIA.

Consul-General Dawkins, No. 117; August 26, 1848. To Consul-General Dawkins No. 36; November 28, 1848.

During the Venetian insurrection in 1848 the Provisional Government claimed a right to exact payment to a forced loan from certain British and Ionian subjects, on the ground that, by an Austrian Decree of the 15th of May 1833 they had acquired Austrian (and therefore Venetian) citizenship. (See "Laws of Austria," and Addenda H.)

This Decree provided that all foreigners who, at the date of its publication in those provinces, should have completed an uninterrupted residence of 10 years were allowed to free themselves from the Austrian citizenship acquired by such residence, on giving proof that they never had an intention of becoming Austrian citizens. Such proof was to be given within six months from the date of the Decree, in default of which it would no longer be admitted.

The Venetians maintained that under this law British subjects who had resided uninterruptedly for 10 years in Venice became Venetian citizens, unless they expressly renounced that citizenship.

Mr. Consul-General Dawkins remonstrated against the interpretation put upon this law, and his having done so was approved by Her Majesty's Government.

It appeared, however, that some of the persons thus pleading their quality of British subjects as exempting them from the forced loan had taken office under the Venetian Government.

Lord Palmerston instructed Mr. Dawkins that such persons were, by the 29th Article of the Austrian Civil Code, liable to be considered as subjects of the Venetian Government, and consequently not entitled to exemption. Lord Palmerston did not, however, disapprove of Mr. Dawkins having endeavoured to preserve them from the severe effect of the forced contribution imposed by the Provisional Government.

BELGIUM.

Lord Howard de Walden, No. 151; December 3, 1860, Lord Howard de Walden, No. 152; December 3, 1860. To Lord Howard de Walden, January 1861.

In December 1860 a case occurred at Brussels (that of M. Ignatius Téleki), in which various questions were put to Her Majesty's Government by Lord Howard de Walden, as to the status of naturalized British subjects.

Under the advice of the Law Officers the following instructions were furnished for his guidance:

"The first question is, whether a person who was naturalized as a British subject previously to the 24th of August 1850 is entitled to a permanent passport; and the answer to it is, that as the rule in regard to the limitation of time in passports granted to naturalized British subjects applies only to those naturalized subsequently to the above-mentioned date, there can be no question as to the right of a person naturalized previously to that date to receive, like any natural-born British subject, a passport not limited in regard to time."

"The second question is, whether a woman, either by birth a British subject, or a naturalized British subject, or an alien, is entitled, on being married abroad to a naturalized subject, to receive a passport in her new character of a married woman. The answer is, that if the woman is a natural-born British subject, she does not lose that character by marrying a naturalized British subject, and that consequently she is entitled to a fresh passport as a British subject in her married name; but if the woman is a naturalized British subject, or an alien, then, as the woman cannot in her married state travel under her maiden name, and as whatever may have been her nationality before marriage, she acquires upon marriage the nationality of her husband, she is entitled to be placed in regard to a passport on the same footing as her husband; and, consequently, in such a case, Her Majesty's Ministers or Consuls would be authorized to act exceptionally, and to grant to the woman an original passport, subject to the same conditions as the passport held by her husband, that is to say, to a passport not limited in point of time, if her husband's passport is not limited, or limited so as to correspond with the limit of time at which her husband's passport will expire, if her husband's passport is limited. But in no case must the wife's name be inserted in the passport held by the husband previously to the marriage; for no Minister or Consul is authorized under any circumstances to insert an additional name in a passport, whatever number of names such passport, when originally granted, was stated to include."

"Your Lordship asks three further questions:—

"1st. As regards the character of the children of a British naturalized subject born abroad; the answer is, that such children share the character of their father, and are to be considered as naturalized British subjects, so long at least as they are under age and living with their father.

"But this is, of course, subject to the local law which may rightly deal with children born in the country, whatever may be the circumstances of their father, as natural-born subjects of the country in which they were born.

"2nd. Whether naturalized subjects are entitled to be married at Her Majesty's Legations or Consulates. The answer is that they are so entitled.

"3rd. Whether naturalized subjects are to be presented at Court by Her Majesty's Diplomatic servants; and to this I reply that I see no ground on which a general rule excluding them from such presentations should be laid down; and I consider that Her Majesty's Representative may properly use in regard to the presentation of naturalized British subjects the same discretion as they are in the habit of using in regard to natural-born."

BRAZIL.

onsul Hesketh, o. 16; March , 1845.

In March 1845 Mr. Hesketh, Her Majesty's Consul at Rio de Janeiro, forwarded to Lord Aberdeen a copy of a Representation which he, in conjunction with the French and other Consuls, had addressed to the Brazilian Government, remonstrating against the interpretation given to the 6th Article of the Constitution of Brazil, namely, that excepting those foreigners who may be in Brazil in the service of their own States, the offspring of all other foreigners born in Brazil must necessarily be Brazilians.

o Consul Hesth, No. ; ugust 30, 1845.

Lord Aberdeen replied that "inasmuch as by the "law of the United Kingdom, all persons born "within the allegiance of the British Crown are "deemed to be British subjects, you would have "acted more prudently if you had refrained from "signing the Representation made to the Brazilian "Government respecting the nationality of the "children of foreigners born in Brazil."

onsul Ryan; anuary 17, 1849.

In 1849 Her Majesty's Consul at Peru asked whether the children of British subjects born in Portugal were to be considered as British subjects in Brazil, and was informed that children of British subjects born elsewhere than in Brazil, and whether in a British territory or in a foreign country, are to be regarded in the light of British subjects and to be entitled to protection as such.

r. Jerningham, o. 20; April 2, 53.

On the 2nd of April 1853 Mr. Jerningham reported that he had been in communication with the Brazilian Government respecting the forced conscription of the sons of British subjects born in Brazil, and that the Brazilian Minister had stated to him that it was proposed to bring forward a law in the Brazilian Chambers providing that up to the age of 21 years, sons born in Brazil of British residents should remain under the control of their parents, and that on attaining their majority they should be allowed to choose between British and Brazilian nationality.

Mr. Jerningham remarks in this despatch that the French claimed complete exemption for the sons of French subjects thus situated, and that though the Brazilian Government did not acknowledge the claim they did not attempt to force such Frenchmen into their army.

o Mr. Jerningam, No. 22; ly 8, 1853.

Lord Clarendon instructed Mr. Jerningham to say that Her Majesty's Government agreed to the proposed clause, but that they hoped that "either "by legislative enactments or by the course "hitherto adopted by the Brazilian Government, "no British subject will be called upon to perform "military service."

o Mr. Jerning- . No. 30; st 8, 1853. r. Jerningham, 55; September 53, 1853. Mr. Howard, 11 tober 31, 1853.

It appeared subsequently that there had been some misunderstanding between Mr. Jerningham and the Brazilian Minister, and that the proposed clause was intended to apply reciprocally to the subjects of those States the laws of which acknowledged the children of Brazilians born within their territories to be Brazilians, and would not, therefore, affect British subjects.

Lord Clarendon then directed Her Majesty's Minister to inquire whether the Brazilian Government really intended to carry out the principle of reciprocity, and to place children born of British subjects in Brazil on exactly the same footing with regard to military service as that in which the children of Brazilian subjects were placed in England; as the imposition on them of forced military service would be plainly inconsistent with such a principle, "for although a power does exist in this "country in certain contingencies, very unlikely "to occur, of resorting to the ballot for raising "militia (in which case, however, substitutes would "be allowed), yet in point of fact both the regular "army and the militia are recruited entirely by "volunteers, and there is therefore, practically, no "forced military service in England."

To Mr. Howard, No. 14; October 31, 1853.

At the close of 1853 there was a change of Ministry in Brazil, and in April 1854 Mr. Howard (who had succeeded Mr. Jerningham) called the attention of the new Government to this subject, but without receiving any reply.

Mr. Howard, No. 82; April 25, 1854.

He again pressed it on their attention in August, when the Foreign Secretary Senhor Limpo de Abreo, promised to look into the matter, but "gave no hope of an alteration in the laws of "nationality, saying that he thought they could "not constitutionally be interpreted in the manner "which the late Minister for Foreign Affairs, "Senhor Paulino, had in view; that such an "alteration would meet with considerable oppo- "sition in the Chambers, and that he himself "doubted its expediency."

Mr. Howard, No. 162; August 11, 1854.

Being urged to take some steps to bring the question to a conclusion in October 1854, Senhor de Abreo repeated that it presented great constitutional difficulties, and could not be solved without the concurrence of the Legislature.

Mr. Howard, No. 199; October 13, 1854.

This closed the correspondence.

It is to be observed that neither in 1852 nor 1854 do there appear to have been any particular cases reported in which the sons of British subjects were forced into the Brazilian service, and it may, therefore, be presumed that the Brazilian authorities continued to act upon an unofficial arrangement come to with Mr. Jerningham in 1853, by which such persons were practically exempted from the conscription.

Mr. Jerningham No. 20; April 2, 1853.

In December 1865 Mr. Spence, a member of the English bar, who had been born in Brazil, applied for the appointment of Law Adviser and Translator to Her Majesty's Mission at Rio de Janeiro.

Mr. Spence (in reply to an observation respecting the inconvenience which might be occasioned by a person whom the Brazilian Government could claim as their subject being employed in such a capacity), stated "that although there "can be no question, according to Article 6 of "the Brazilian Constitution, that from having "been born in Brazil, though of British parents, "I became a Brazilian subject, I respectfully "submit that from having (when called to "the bar in 1858) sworn allegiance to Her "Majesty, I lost my Brazilian nationality "according to Article 7 of the same Constitution. "It is true that the words of Article 7 are "'naturalization,' but the taking of the oath of "allegiance would, no doubt, be held equivalent "to naturalization. But even if that were not "o, the acceptance by a Brazilian subject (with- "out the licence of the Emperor) of any office "from a foreign Government would cause the loss "of Brazilian nationality, as may be seen on refe- "rence to clause 2 of Article 7 of the same Con- "stitution."

To Mr. Spence, December 20, 1865. Mr. Spence; December 26, 1865.

Mr. Spence forwarded translations of the Articles of the Constitution referred to:—

Who are Brazilian Citizens?

"Article 6.—1. Those born in Brazil, either free or freedmen, although the father be a foreigner, if not resident in the service of his nation.

"2. Children of a Brazilian father and the natural children of a Brazilian mother born in a foreign country who may come to have a domicil in this country.

"3. The children of a Brazilian father who may be in a foreign country in the service of the Emperor, although they do not acquire a domicil in Brazil.

"4. All those who, born in Portugal and her possessions, were resident in Brazil at the time when the Independence was proclaimed in the Provinces where they lived, and shall have expressly adhered to the said Independence, or impliedly by continuing their residence in Brazil.

"5. Foreigners naturalized, whatever may be their religion.

* * * * *

"Those who are deprived of such rights."

"Article 7.—1. Those who have become naturalized in a foreign country.

"2. Those who, without the Emperor's licence, accept any employment, pension, or decoration, from any foreign Government.

"3. Those sentenced to banishment."

CHINA.

Difficulties having arisen with regard to the claims to British protection of British born subjects of Chinese origin within the Chinese empire, it has been arranged that they should wear a distinctive dress, and a government notification to that effect has accordingly been published at Hong Kong.

"THE following circular from His Excellency Sir Rutherford Alcock, K.C.B., with its enclosure, relative to British subjects of Chinese descent residing or being in Chinese territory, is published for general information.

"J. GARDINER AUSTIN,
"Colonial Secretary administering the "Government.

"Government Offices,
"Hong Kong, Nov. 2, 1868."

"Circular No. 10.

"SIR, Pekin, October 7, 1868.

"PURSUANT to instructions from Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I have issued the enclosed notification regulating the conditions under which persons of Chinese descent, who are British subjects, may reside or travel in China under British protection.

"You will observe that it is left entirely optional to such persons to claim the status of British subjects within the Chinese territories or not, as they may see fit. But in the event of their electing to sink their British nationality, and reside or travel as Chinese among Chinese, they cannot claim any exemption from the jurisdiction and laws of the country they adopt of their own free will, and after due notice of the consequences.

"You will give all due publicity and effect within your jurisdiction to the enclosed, in conformity with the provisions of the Queen's Order in Council of 1865.

"Your obedient servant,
"RUTHERFORD ALCOCK.

"To Her Majesty's Consul,
"&c., &c., &c.,
"Shanghai."

"Notification.

"WHEREAS many persons of Chinese descent, who are or claim to be British subjects, go to reside or travel in the dominions of the Emperor of China, and whereas serious difficulty exists in distinguishing such British subjects from natives amenable to Chinese laws only, and accordingly great practical inconvenience frequently results to the parties themselves and to the authorities of both countries; and whereas it is desirable, with a view to the maintenance of order and good government of British subjects of Chinese descent resorting to China, and for the maintenance of friendly relations between British subjects and Chinese subjects and authorities, that a remedy should be provided for such inconvenience: Therefore, by the authority and power vested in me by the 85th section of the China and Japan Order in Council, 1865, I do declare and order that all British subjects of Chinese descent shall, while residing or being in Chinese territory, discard the Chinese costume and adopt some other dress or costume whereby they may readily be distinguished from the native population. And I do further warn all British subjects of Chinese descent so residing or being in the Chinese dominions as aforesaid that in the event of their infringing or not observing this order and regulation, they shall not be entitled to claim British protection or interference on their behalf in any court of justice or elsewhere in the Chinese dominions.

"And I do further order that every British subject of Chinese descent who shall sue in any Chinese court of justice, or appear in public before the authorities of the empire, shall be and is hereby required to pay all due respect to the Chinese authorities according to the custom and usage of the country, save and except that such British subject shall not be bound or required to observe any custom or ceremony whereby he would admit that he is a subject of His Imperial Majesty.

"Given under my hand at Pekin this sixth day of October one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight.

"RUTHERFORD ALCOCK,
"Her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary, Minister Plenipotentiary, and Chief Superintendent of Trade."

COLOMBIA—NEW GRANADA.

A correspondence took place in 1847–8–9 respecting the laws affecting aliens in New Granada. This was renewed in 1855.

Mr. O'Leary, No. 11; March 31, 1847.

The principal subjects treated of were the law as to intestate estates and a decree which had been issued respecting claims for losses suffered during the civil war.

To Mr. O'Leary, No. 17; July 16, 1847.

*Mr. O'Leary, No. 25, 1848.

To Mr. O'Leary, No. 13, 1848.

*Mr. O'Leary, No. 49, 1848.

To Mr. O'Leary, No. 3, 1849.

*Mr. O'Leary, No. 26, 1855.

*Mr. O'Leary, No. 36, 1855.

*To Mr. O'Leary, No. 15, 1855.

[* These papers are missing from the volumes.]

In 1861 Mr. Griffith requested to be informed whether Mr. Bransby, a British subject, residing in New Granada, and who had accepted an appointment as interpreter in the New Granadian Civil Service, was to be considered a British subject.

Mr. Griffith, No. 80; September 2, 1861.

Mr. Griffith was instructed that Mr. Bransby had not, by accepting such employment, forfeited his allegiance, or ceased to be a British subject; and it was not suggested that he had formally renounced his British allegiance, or taken any oath of allegiance to the Republic of New Granada.

To Mr. Griffith, No. 68; November 16, 1861.

His rights, therefore, to protection as a British subject, in all matters not immediately connected with his employment as interpreter, were unimpaired, and excepting as to such matters he was as much entitled to British protection as he was before he accepted that employment.

In May 1862 Mr. Griffith reported that the United States' Minister had communicated to him confidentially the instructions which he had received from Mr. Seward respecting the protection to be afforded to United States' citizens domiciled in New Granada.

Mr. Griffith, No. 38; May 15, 1862.

These instructions were to the following effect:

Citizens temporarily visiting New Granada, but retaining their domicil in the United States were to be afforded protection against any impositions of the Government there for its support and maintenance.

Citizens of the United States, no matter how they acquired that title, who have gone to New Granada, become domiciliated there, and are pursuing business or otherwise living there, without definite and manifest intentions of returning to the United States, are subject to all the laws of New Granada affecting property or material rights exactly the same as the citizens of New Granada.

Mr. Griffith adds that he has been informed that the New York Commission for the liquidation of United States' claims arising out of the collision at Panama in 1856, acting upon those principles, had ignored all the claims brought forward by United States' citizens who were domiciled on the Isthmus at the time of the collision.

Mr. Griffith, No. 46; June 20, 1862.

In June 1862 Mr. Griffith forwarded a copy of an official Decree declaring that foreigners domiciled "in the Republic are to be allowed to acquire real property in the same manner as natives."

This decree further provided that foreigners or "immigrants" should be naturalized from the moment they enter the Republic, and were to be entitled to all the rights, and be subjected to all the obligations, of native citizens. For the space of 20 years, however, they were to be exempted from military service, except in the case of foreign war, from all direct or extraordinary contributions, and from all public employment, save that which might be imposed on them in the municipal district where they happened to reside.

To Mr. Griffith, No. 29; September 30, 1862.

Mr. Griffith was instructed that "although such "a law was unusual, it was competent for a "country to make and enforce it, without furnishing any ground of complaint to foreign States. "The distinction drawn by it between commorant "and resident foreigners seemed, on the whole, "reasonable and just. The foreigner who, by the "relations of property, marriage, profession, or "business, and length of residence, had incorporated himself into a State, certainly owed a "qualified allegiance to it, and it would be entitled "to extend its protection to him with reference to "all other States but that of his origin or birth. "Such foreigners are truly and practically citizens "of the State which they have adopted, and cannot complain that they are liable to the obligations of native citizens, with whom they are "placed on an equality in every other respect."

Mr. O'Leary, No. 27; May 10, 1865.

On the 19th of April 1865 a law was passsed defining the condition of foreigners in the United States of Colombia.

Article 2 classifies foreigners into domiciled and transient residents.

3. Domiciled foreigners are those who establish themselves permanently, or publicly declare their intention of so establishing themselves, or have resided two years.

Temporary residents are exempted from military service or office.

Domiciled aliens are exempted from military service, forced loans, and all personal employment or office of a permanent character.

5. Repudiates any responsibility for damages suffered by aliens in time of war, they in such cases being placed on the same footing as natives.

6. Aliens interferring in civil or international contests to become subject to all the penalties and duties of Colombians.

7. This law not to interfere with Treaty stipulations.

Mr. O'Leary, on this law being communicated to him, immediately remonstrated against Article 5, the practical inutility of which had indeed been remarked on by the Colombian President, who had opposed its being passed.

To Mr. O'Leary, No. 11; March 21, 1847.

Mr. O'Leary's remonstrance was framed on the instructions forwarded to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires when a similar law was enacted in 1847, and was approved by Her Majesty's Government.

To Mr. O'Leary, No. 28; July 28, 1865.

Mr. O'Leary, No. 65; October 20, 1865.

In October 1865 Mr. O'Leary requested to be informed whether the children, born in England, of Mr. Montoya, a native Colombian naturalized in England, were entitled to exemption from the Colombian military service as British subjects.

Mr. O'Leary added that, by the Colombian Constitution, the offspring of Colombian parents born abroad were to be considered as citizens "when domiciled in Colombia."

To Mr. O'Leary No. 6; December 21, 1865.

Mr. O'Leary was instructed that "this is a "question of Colombian Municipal Law; but upon "the statement contained in your despatch, it appears that the children of Señor Montoya, who is a "native Colombian, are domiciled in Colombia, and "that they are subject to the obligations of Colombian citizenship. The fact that Señor Montoya "is a naturalized British subject does not exempt "him from the operation of the law of the State of "his birth and natural allegiance while he resides "in that state."

DENMARK.

The case of Mr. Rainals, British Vice-Consul at Copenhagen, which led to a long correspondence in 1863, illustrates the operation of the Danish laws with regard to the claim of the Danish Crown to the allegiance of aliens domiciled in Denmark.

Sir A. Paget, No. 132; June 2, 1863.

The correspondence commenced with a demand made upon Mr. Rainals for the payment of a dog tax in 1860. Mr. Rainals pleaded exemption as an alien. The Danish Government declared that he was a Danish subject, but offered to remit the tax as an act of comity; but Mr. Rainals refused such a compromise, and insisted upon being acknowledged to be a British subject.

Upon this the Danish Government declared that their view of his nationality was borne out—

1. By the fact of his having sworn allegiance to the King of Denmark on obtaining a "borgerbrev" in 1848.

2. By his having been born in Denmark.

With regard to the "borgerbrev," it appeared that in 1848 Mr. Rainals had settled as a broker at Elsinore, and in order to obtain permission to carry on his profession had applied to the Mayor of that town for a "borgerbrev" or freedom of the city.

When this was issued to him, the Elsinore authorities alleged that he had signed the following paper.

"In the year 1848, on the 11th of May, appeared before the magistracy, Harry Thomas Alfred Rainals, born at Copenhagen, aged 31 years of age, and demanded to obtain borgherskab (rights of a burgher) as clearer and agent for payment of sound dues.

"As he has satisfactorily proved his earlier respectability, and, in accordance with evidence produced, has been appointed Consular Agent for the United States of North America, whereby he is free from serving in the Militia, nothing could be said against the said demand, and the said H. T. Rainals was, after having taken the usual burgher oath* [thus worded:—

'I promise and swear to be true and faithful to His Majesty our Most Gracious Hereditary Lord and King Frederick VII, to defend with my utmost power and ability his realm and land from harm, as well as to be dutiful and obedient to the Burgermaster and Council which are now in power and to those who come after them, and finally to act towards my fellow-citizens as it becomes and befits an honest man to do. So help me God and His Holy Word.'] furnished with the rights of a burgher (Borgherskab) as clearer and agent for payment of sound dues in Elsinore.

(Signed) "H. T. A. Rainals.
"Rogert."

Mr. Rainals asserted that he had never taken any oath such as is here inserted; that the copy of the entry given to him did not include the part between brackets; and that in order to take an oath he must have held up three fingers, which he distinctly recollected he had not done. He further showed that he had resigned his "borgerbrev" in 1859.

* This oath has been since modified, see Sir A. Paget's Despatch, p. 116.

Sir A. Paget then requested the Danish Government to explain whether they considered the mere fact of obtaining a "borgerbrev" constituted a person a Danish subject.

The Foreign Secretary replied (May 28, 1863): "Quant à la question positive à savoir si un sujet Britannique en prêtant le serment de bourgeois devient sujet Danois, il est de fait qu'en prêtant le serment il se fixe dans ce pays, et en se fixant et en prenant domicile en Danemark il devient sujet Danois et entre dans tous les droits et tous les devoirs civils et sociaux d'un sujet Danois. Pour ce qui regarde les droits et les devoirs politiques, ceux-ci n'appartiennent qu'à ceux qui sont en possession de l'indigénat qui, s'il n'est pas acquis par le fait même de la naissance dans ce pay, ne peut être obtenu qu'en vertu d'une loi. Quant au côté négatif, à savoir, si un sujet Britannique en acquérant les droits et en se soumettant aux devoirs d'un sujet Danois perd sa qualité de sujet Britannique, c'est là une question dont la solution paraît dépendre le plus spécialement de la législation Britannique. Pour ce qui est de notre législation relativement à ce point, celle-ci ne s'oppose pas à ce que la coexistance de deux nationalités puisse être admise dans la personne du même individu; seulement, dans le principe, sa qualité de sujet étranger ne doit porter aucune atteinte à l'accomplissement des devoirs qui lui incombent comme sujet Danois."

With regard to his having been born in Denmark, Mr. Rainals cited an opinion given by the Attorney-General of Denmark on a recent occasion when a Bill respecting the naturalization of certain foreigners had been discussed in the Chambers.

A decree of January 15, 1776, provided that children of foreigners, born in Denmark, can claim the rights of Danish citizenship after a permanent residence in that country up to their eighteeth year.

The Attorney-General gave it as his opinion, though other lawyers differed on the subject, that by the terms of this Decree the children of aliens born in Denmark were capable of being admitted to the rights of natural-born Danish subjects; and Mr. Rainals accordingly argued that this was conclusive proof that they were not considered to be natural-born subjects. Moreover, one of the persons for whose naturalization the Act under discussion made provision was stated to have been born in Denmark.

Sir Augustus Paget now referred the question for the consideration of Lord Russell; and, after further information on the points of law raised in it had been procured from Copenhagen, Lord Russell, under the advice of the Queen's Advocate, instructed him that "it is not denied that Mr. Rainals "was born in Denmark, and the opinion of the "Danish laywers so far coincides with that expressed by M. Hall that the renunciation by Mr. "Rainals of his rights as a citizen of Elsinore does "not relieve him from the obligations of allegiance "to the Crown of Denmark.

To Sir A. Paget, No. 141; August 26, 1863.

"It is admitted that he obtained the 'borgerbrev,' and he must under these circumstances be deemed to have taken the usual preliminary oath.

"I infer also that he obtained this 'borgerbrev,' on the footing of a Danish subject and without the delay of five years which would have been necessary for a foreigner. It appears that, though by returning the 'borgerbrev,' he is replaced in his former position, he nevertheless remains subject to whatever obligations attach to a person born in Denmark and subsequently resident there."

Consul Rainals; June 9. 1864.

In 1864, a case occurred at St. Croix in which the Danish authorities claimed to administer to the estate of a deceased British subject who had taken out a "borgerbrev" in that island.

As the person in question had been domiciled at St. Croix at the time of his death, Her Majesty's Consul was not instructed to contest the interpretations put by the authorities on the effect of taking out such a burgher licence; but it was considered that some arrangement should be made with them, whereby the absent heirs and next of kin of a British subject so situated should be apprized by notice in the "London Gazette" of the intended distribution of such property by Danish Tribunals.

FRANCE.

The registers of the correspondence between England and France for the last five-and-twenty years have been searched; but they do not present many cases of interest.

Lord Cowley, No. 1,188; September 7, 1855.

Lord Cowley forwarded in 1855 a Report by M. Treitt on a question between the French and Brazilian Governments respecting the administration to the intestate estate of a naturalized Brazilian subject named Braga.

Señor Braga died at Paris, leaving a son, born in Brazil, of a Brazilian mother, and a second wife a Frenchwoman, with two sons born in France.

The Brazilian Consul first proceeded to administer to the estate on behalf of the eldest son, who was absent in Brazil, and then on behalf of the two younger sons, "enfants mineurs nés en France, "mais sujets Brésiliens aux termes de la loi Fran-"caise."

The widow opposed the Consul's interference in regard to the younger sons, and appealed to the "Tribunal Civil de Première Instance," which, by two summary judgments, confirmed the Consul's powers. The matter was then referred to the Brazilian Government, who instructed the Consul to abstain from taking any further proceedings on behalf of the minor children, as by a recent Brazilian Decree, the administration to the intestate property of aliens was vested in the local authorities and not in the Consul of the alien's country when the widow was a Brazilian, and the children born in Brazil.

This case rather concerns Brazilian than French Law; but it is worthy of remark, as illustrative of the French doctrine as to the nationality of the minor children of aliens born in France.

Baron de Malaret; August 21, 1856.

In August 1856, the French Chargé d'Affaires in London recommended to the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government a petition from the French residents in British Guiana, praying for exemption from the local militia.

To Count de Persigny; October 10, 1856.

The French Embassy was informed (October 10, 1856), that "to hold out to the French resi-"dents in British Guiana, in general terms, that "they are specially favoured, would, in the opinion "of Her Majesty's Government, place them in a "false position, and would raise expectations that "could not be fulfilled, inasmuch as they cannot be "exempted from militia service, which is the "particular favour that they solicit.

"As the French settlers appear to make this application from the fact that the Portuguese are exempted from militia service, I have the honour to acquaint your Excellency that this exemption is owing to certain provisions of a Treaty*, which

* The treaty referred to is the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation of July 3, 1842. Article I. "They shall be "exempt from forced loans or any other extraordinary con-"tributions not general or not by law established, and from "all military service by sea or by land."

Similar provisions are inserted in most treaties of this description, and are of essential service to protect British subjects from conscription. See Treaties with Russia, Italy, &c., and the recent Treaty with Colombia, February 16, 1866: Article XVI. "The subjects and citizens of each of "the contracting parties in the dominions and possessions "of the other shall be exempted from all compulsory mili-"tary service whatever, whether in the army, navy, or "national guard or militia." There is no such general treaty with France.

appear to Her Majesty's Government to be so manifestly inexpedient and objectionable in principle that they have now under consideration the propriety of opening negotiations for an alteration of that Treaty in this respect."

Colonial Office; December 23, 1857.

In December 1857, the Colonial Office forwarded copies of a correspondence with the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor of British Guiana on this subject, and asked whether any communication should be addressed to the French Government, or whether the claim of the French residents to exemption should be directly negatived.

To Colonial Office; January 11, 1858.

Lord Clarendon, in reply, stated that he considered that the note to the French Ambassador of the 10th of October, 1857, was "a sufficient "announcement of the intentions of Her Ma- "jesty's Government with regard to this ques- "tion."

Lord Cowley, No. 1,691; December 19, 1857.

To Lord Cowley, No. 1,813; December 31, 1857.

In December 1857, Lord Cowley requested to be informed whether a gentleman named Julien Colonna Walewski, born in London of Polish parents, was to be considered and protected as a British subject in France.

Law Officers; December 26, 1857.

Under the advice of the Law Officers, Lord Cowley was instructed that, under the circumstances stated, M. Walewski was entitled to be so considered.

The correspondence previously referred to ("Argentine Republic—Buenos Ayres,") arose about this time respecting the protection to be afforded to the children born of British and French parents in Buenos Ayres, in the course of which the French Government requested to be informed of the state of the British law with regard to the children of aliens born within British territory.

To Lord Cowley, No. 1,780; December 24, 1857.

In reply to the inquiries thus made by the French Government, Lord Clarendon directed Lord Cowley to state to them, "With reference to the questions "put to you by Count Walewski, as reported in "your despatch No. 1,625, I am not aware of any "Treaty between this country and a foreign state "which would give to children born of British "parents in those states the rights of British sub- "jects; and in reply to his Excellency's inquiry "as to what is the law of England in such matters, "I have to observe that the general law of Eng- "land in the matter is that all children of what- "soever parentage born in the Queen's dominions "are British subjects by birth, and are in England "entitled to the privileges and liable to the obli- "gations of that status.

"The children of British subjects, although born abroad, if their fathers or their grandfathers by the father's side were natural-born subjects, are by certain British statutes to be deemed natural-born subjects themselves to all intents and purposes in England; but neither these statutes nor the general principles of English or international law, or of reciprocity or comity so far as Great Britain is concerned, would justify her in maintaining that such persons are 'British subjects' within the true intent and meaning of a Treaty with a foreign nation in which their case is not specially provided for, or in contending that they are, whilst residing in such foreign country, exempt from the obligations incident to their status as natural-born subjects or citizens of such foreign country, of their actual birth and residence. Great Britain may confer upon them any privileges as far as her own territories are concerned, but no such privileges can avail as against or in derogation of their antecedent natural and legal obligations to the country of their birth."

Earl of Malmesbury to the Earl Cowley.

"Foreign Office,

"My Lord, March 13, 1858.

To Lord Cowley, No. 78; March 13, 1858.

"Your Excellency recently requested to be informed how the decisions could be reconciled which had been come to by Her Majesty's Government upon two cases of nationality which had been under their consideration.

"The first of the two cases was that of a gentleman named Julien Colonna Walewski, who had claimed from your Excellency to be considered a British subject on the ground that his father (a Polish immigrant) had gone to England in 1824, where he had married an English lady, and had resided in England up to the time of his death in 1854, during which period Mr. J. C. Walewski had been born in London. In this case it was the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that M. Walewski having been born in London was under the circumstances entitled to be considered a British subject in France.

"The second case had been raised with regard to the law of this country on the question of the nationality of children of British subjects born in foreign countries, as bearing upon the general question at issue with regard to compulsory enlistment by the Government of Buenos Ayres. The opinion given by Her Majesty's Government upon this case was that all children of whatever parentage born in the Queen's dominions, are British subjects by birth, and are in England entitled to the privileges and liable to the obligations of that status.

"Your Excellency pointed out with reference to these two decisions, that it appeared to you that according to the latter it is only in England that foreigners born in England enjoy the rights of British subjects; whereas according to the former, M. Walewski was to be treated as a British subject in France.

"I have now to inform your Excellency that Her Majesty's Government having carefully considered the difficulty suggested by you, do not see that there exists any contradiction between the two decisions.

"If M. Julien Colonna Walewski had been born in France, (although of British parents,) and had voluntarily returned to France, he would have been a British subject in England, but he would not have been entitled to British privileges or protection in France as against the country of his actual birth and domicil.

"And this, as it appears to Her Majesty's Government, is precisely the case of the children of British subjects who are born and resident in Buenos Ayres. They are British subjects in England, but this cannot prevent their being considered and treated as Buenos Ayreans in Buenos Ayres; but M. Walewski was born in England, and as such is a natural-born subject of Her Majesty, and the circumstance that his father was a Pole cannot disentitle him to British privileges in France.

"It is competent to any country to confer by general or special legislation the privileges of nationality upon those who are born out of its own territory, but it cannot confer such privileges upon such persons as against the country of their birth, when they voluntarily return to and reside therein. Those born in the territory of a nation are (as a general principle) liable when actually therein to the obligations incident to their status by birth. Great Britain considers and treats such persons as natural-born subjects, and cannot therefore deny the right of other nations (as Buenos Ayres) to do the same.

"But Great Britain cannot permit the nationality of the children of foreign parents born within her territory to be questioned. The expression, 'in England,' found by your Excellency in the decision given by Her Majesty's Government in the Buenos Ayres case, referred to the inquiry of Count Walewski, as reported by you, 'What is the law of England in such matters?'

"I am, &c.

(Signed) "Malmesbury."

To M. Julien, July 11, 1859.

In reply to an inquiry addressed to the Foreign Office in July 1859, Lord John Russell stated to M. Julien that, "independently of any disabling "clause which they may contain, British letters of " naturalization do not give the holders of them " any right to British protection in the country of " their birth."

A case occurred in 1861 in which a M. Casaubon claimed protection from the British Embassy at Paris to procure his exemption from the conscription on the ground that he was born in the Mauritius.

Lord Cowley, No. 426. Lord Cowley, No. 364; March 20, 1861. To Lord Cowley, No. 347; March 20, 1861.

It appeared that his father was a Frenchman, and the French Government accordingly claimed him as a French subject.

Lord Cowley was instructed to request the French Government to state the reasons upon which " M. Casaubon had been subjected to the con- " scription notwithstanding his certificate of British " nationality, and the fact of his having been born " in the Queen's dominions, and having resided " there until he was of age."

The result of Lord Cowley's application to the French Government was not reported.

Lord Cowley, No. 194; February 4, 1861.

A question arose in February 1861 as to the right of a naturalized British subject Mr. Zwinger, a Swiss by birth, to be married at the British Embassy.

Queen's Advocate; February 27, 1861. To Lord Cowley, February 24, 1861.

Lord Cowley was instructed to allow the marriage in question to be solemnized at the British Embassy, taking care that the bride was previously informed that Mr. Zwinger may be considered legally as a Swiss citizen, as well as a naturalized British subject; and that the validity of the marriage might be open to doubt in Switzerland, France, and elsewhere out of England, and recommending her to be previously married in the French civil form.

GERMANY.—FRANKFORT.

Sir A. Malet, No. 81; June 2, 1863. To Mr. Corbett, No. 2; June 19, 1863.

Sir Alexander Malet having requested to be informed, in June 1863, whether a naturalized British subject is entitled to claim in the land of his birth British protection against any penalties which he may have incurred by the act of withdrawing himself from his native land, Lord Russell replied, " that a foreigner who has become a natu- " ralized British subject cannot claim British pro- " tection against the operation of the law of his " native country, so as to exempt himself from any " penalties which the law of his native country " may inflict upon him when he returns to it."

Sir A. Malet, No. 129; April 30, 1864. Sir A. Malet, No. 136; May 13, 1864. Sir A. Malet, No. 139; May 24, 1864. Sir A. Malet, No. 140; May 28, 1864. To Sir A. Malet, No. 36; May 9, 1864.

In April 1864 a Mr. Grimm applied to Sir A. Malet for protection as a British subject on the ground that he had received a " Denization " Act issued by a Judge of the Supreme Court of New South Wales in 1856, though he had been domiciled in Germany since 1859.

Mr. Grimm had been convicted of an assault on a railway guard in the Grand Duchy of Hesse, and he requested Sir A. Malet to get the sentence of imprisonment passed on him reversed.

Sir A. Malet was instructed that if the country of Mr. Grimm's birth was the same as the one whose court had tried and condemned him, Her Majesty's Minister ought not to interfere on his behalf, on the ground of the alleged Act of Denization; but if Mr. Grimm had been tried in the Court of a third country, i.e., not the country of his original allegiance, then Sir A. Malet should use his good offices in whatever manner might be expedient and discreet.

It turned out that Mr. Grimm was a Prussian by birth, and Sir A. Malet accordingly entered into an official communication with the authorities, and Mr. Grimm's sentence appears to have been eventually commuted for a fine on his petitioning the Grand Duke.

HANSE TOWNS.

James Terry having applied to Colonel Hodges for exemption from service in the Civil Guard, in 1851, Lord Palmerston furnished Colonel Hodges with the following instructions:—

To Colonel Hodges; March 7, 1851.

"It appears that James Terry, the person whose case you quote, was born in Hamburgh, and must therefore be considered, while within the State of Hamburgh, as a Hamburgh subject; and it appears, moreover, that his father was admitted a citizen before the son attained his twelfth year, and that by the law of Hamburgh the son would on that account also be deemed a Hamburgh subject. Under those circumstances there can be no reason to question the liability of James Terry to serve in the Civic Guard, or in the Federal Contingent, precisely the same as any other native of Hamburgh.

" With respect to the general liability of British subjects resident in Hamburgh to perform either or both of these kinds of service, I have to authorise you to give way to the liability of British subjects to serve in the Civic Guard for the protection of the city in which they reside, if you should find it necessary to do so; but you should strenuously resist any pretension to require British-born subjects, whether admitted or not to the rights of citizenship, to serve in the Hamburgh contingent, because that contingent is not a force raised and embodied for the maintenance of order within the City and State of Hamburgh, nor even solely for the defence of the Hamburgh State, but is a portion of the army of Germany, and is organized for the purposes of foreign war, beyond and out of the Hamburgh territory, to be waged not merely for the Hamburgh interests, but possibly for the interests of any one of the other States of Germany; and the making of such a war would not depend upon the will and decision of the Government of Hamburgh, but upon the will and decision of the Central Diet.

" It thus might happen not only that British subjects might be brought without, and even against, their will, into conflict with the troops of States in amity or alliance with England, but that they might actually be compelled to take the field against the troops of their own country and Sovereign."

A similar case occurred in 1863.

Mr. Ward, No. 54; September 4, 1863. To Mr. Ward, No. 14; September 30, 1863.

Mr. Charles James Bosdet claimed exemption from military service as a British subject.

He was the eldest son of a Mr. Bosdet, a British subject, who caused himself to be made a citizen of Hamburgh in 1843, who had ever since resided there and was then residing there with all his family but his eldest son. Mr. C. J. Bosdet was born in Hamburgh and resided there till he was twenty-two years of age.

Mr. C. J. Bosdet having quitted Hamburgh, the Senate published his name in the list of deserters, thereby subjecting him to certain penal consequences should he return within the Hamburgh territory.

It was decided that the enforcement of the Decree of the Senate within their jurisdiction, should Mr. Bosdet place himself within it, would not constitute any ground for the official interference of Her Majesty's Government, and instructions in this sense were accordingly furnished to Her Majesty's Chargè d'Affaires.

Another case occurred in 1866, in which Mr. C. Dodgshun, born in Hamburgh of a British father, who had become a burgher of that city, claimed exemption from the conscription as a British subject.

Mr. S. William- January 15, 186

It was decided " that Her Majesty's Government " cannot gainsay the right of the Hamburgh autho- " rities to treat him, so far as their jurisdiction is " concerned, as a citizen, or to sequestrate his pro- " perty in Hamburgh, though they can have no " right to touch the property of his brother and " sister."

In August 1866 another of the Bosdet family appeared as a claimant to British protection.

In this instance the applicant, A. Bosdet, had been born in Jersey, and was resident in Scotland.

To Mr. Ward, No. 6; August 1866.

Mr. Ward was instructed " that Alfred Bosdet " seems to be the son of a native citizen of Ham-

" burgh, now a domiciled merchant in that town. " The municipal laws of Hamburgh treat the son " of such a citizen as a subject, and place him, so " far as their jurisdiction extends, under the obli- " gations of a citizen, one of which is to serve in " Hamburgh military force. The fact that Alfred " Bosdet was born in England confers on him, " according to the law of this country, the cha- " racter of an English subject; and there arises, or " may arise, in these cases a conflict of jurisdiction; " but as the law of England also considers the " son of a native subject, wherever he is born, " as an English citizen, the English Government " cannot fairly complain of the law of Hamburgh, " which in this respect is the same; nor can it " interfere with the execution of that law within " the town of Hamburgh. You may accordingly " represent to the Hamburgh authorities that " Alfred Bosdet has become an English subject, " and ask, as a matter of comity, that his name " may, therefore, be taken off the military list. " Mr. Ward cannot be properly instructed to insist " as a matter of right upon this being done."

SAXONY.

To Mr. Murray, No. 7; April 26, 1865.

In 1865 Mr. Murray asked what was the nationality of a child of foreign parents born on board a British vessel, and of a child born without the British dominions, of foreigners naturalized as British subjects.

To Mr. Murray, No. 7; April 26, 1865.

Lord Russell replied, "I am of opinion that a " child of foreign parents born on board one of " Her Majesty's ships of war would be a British " subject, wherever the ship might be; and that " a child born on board a British merchant or " private unprivileged vessel on the high seas " would also be entitled to be considered a British " subject. It is more doubtful whether such a " child born on board such a vessel in the port " or waters of a foreign State would be entitled " to be considered as a British subject.

" A child born without the British dominions of foreign parents, naturalized as British subjects, would be entitled to be considered as a British subject with reference to all other States but that to which his parents owed an original allegiance, unless indeed that State had, by its own law, allowed its subject to divest himself of his allegiance."

GREECE.

A question arose at Corfu in 1866, relative to the liability of British subjects domiciled as Ionian citizens in that island to be drawn for the conscription, and whether they could evade it by renouncing the Ionian naturalization acquired by themselves or their fathers during the British protectorate of the island.

To Mr. Erskine, No. 31; November 15, 1866.

Her Majesty's Government thought it would be a reasonable and just concession on the part of the Greek Government to allow British subjects, naturalized during the protectorate of Great Britain, to have the option now of renouncing their Ionian and resuming their British nationality, provided this option be exercised without delay, and put on formal record as soon as possible.

But inasmuch as no stipulation to this effect was made in the treaty by which Great Britain renounced the Protectorate, they did not think that Her Majesty's Government could properly demand, as a matter of right, that such an option should be conceded to them by the Government of Greece.

As it has been stated in the House of Representatives that Don Pacifico, the hero of the 1847–48 claims, was a naturalized British subject, it may be as well to mention here that he was a native British subject, having been born at Gibraltar. (State Papers, vol. xxxix, p. 356.)

GUATEMALA.

In 1859 the attention of the Guatemala Government having been called to the arrangement which had been come to in Buenos Ayres for the exemption of the children of British Residents from military service, Sir Charles Wyke entered into communications with them with the view of securing a similar exemption for the children of British residents in Guatemala.

Sir C. Wyke, No. 1; January 20, 1859.

In a note dated the 17th of January, 1859 the Guatemala Minister stated, "This Government " acknowledges that the children of British subjects " born in this Republic, and as such subject by " our laws to fulfil the duty of Guatemalans, have " also obligations that bind them by the origin of " their parents to the country where said parents " were born. It acknowledges, likewise, that the " discharge of these duties in a new country, and " where the Government and Laws are also new, " and not sufficiently firm, must be grievous in " cases of civil war, and on account of the military " service might bring with it some insecurity that " might extend itself to the fathers of families and " and to the affairs of foreigners settled in the " country, and might give rise to complications, " or at all events to discussions that ought to be " avoided. . . . . Therefore, taking into con- " sideration all the circumstances of the case, the " Government judges it very expedient to obviate " by a resolution and a friendly understanding, all " the difficulties caused by this inequality of con- " ditions, and to remove for any future occurrence " all motives of discussion; and taking into con- " sideration that no serious difficulty presents itself " for the reasons already expressed in the making " some concession as regards the military service " in favour of the sons of British subjects born " in the Republic, and who as Guatemalans are " liable to perform their duties the same as the " natives, acceding to the wishes of Her Majesty, " is willing to consider them exempt from said " military service until they reach the age of 21 " years, and to agree that in all cases when they " may be required to perform this service they can " find a substitute."

Sir Charles Wyke in forwarding a copy of this note to Lord Malmesbury remarked that this arrangement was more favourable than the one arrived at with Buenos Ayres, as it did not require that the substitutes should be foreigners.

Costa Rica, Honduras, Salvador, and Nicaragua also acceded to this understanding.

Mr. Hall, No. 37; June 25, 1859. Mr. Hall, No. 48; August 19, 1859.

ITALY.

The following extract from a despatch addressed by Sir W. Temple to Mr. Vice-Consul Barker in 1837, explains the views of the Neapolitan Government in a case of disputed nationality which occurred at that date:—

Sir. W. Temple to Mr. Barker; September 16, 1837. (Inclosure in Vice-Consul Rickards' No. 14; March 1, 1865.)

" I have represented to Prince Cassaro the case of Mr. John and Mr. Benedict Stuart, and he is decidedly of opinion, as well as myself, that they are British subjects, and therefore not liable by Treaty to be called upon to serve in the Sanitary Cordon. Their father, Lieutenant Stuart, having been born in England, was a British subject, and his marrying a Messinese made no difference in the nationality of his sons, for, according to law, the wife follows the condition of the husband. Unless, therefore, the sons in coming of age had declared their intention of being naturalized, and had gone through the formalities prescribed by the law for that purpose, they remain British subjects. Prince Cassaro informed me that this question had been already decided in the case of a French subject, and he has promised me that, if it is necessary, he will apply to the Minister for the Affairs of Sicily for an order to secure these gentlemen from further molestation."

Sir R. Abercromby, No. 152; December 3, 1851.

A question was raised by the Sardinian Government in 1851 respecting the nationality of John Paul Baptiste Vertu, born at Halifax, Yorkshire, of Sardinian parents. The Turin Government contended that he was a Sardinian subject.

To Mr. Hudson, No. 9; March 23, 1852.

Lord Palmerston's instructions to Mr. Hudson were: "I have now to state to you that, as a "general principle, children of alien friends, born "in the British dominions, become de facto sub- "jects of Great Britain, although not absolutely, "and in all cases, to the entire cessation of all the "bonds, privileges, and duties which might attach "to them as children of the State to which their "parents might belong, particularly when they "themselves return to, and abide in, their parents' "country, and claim to be, and act as, subjects "thereof.

"The right to be considered as British subjects, if fully and completely acquired, and not abandoned or forfeited, may be lawfully extended to them in the foreign State of which their parents were subjects; and it is not necessary, in order to render his children British subjects, that an alien friend transferring his domicil to Great Britain should previously have obtained his legal liberation from his duties and obligations to the State to which he had originally belonged."

To M. Salteri; July 3, 1843.

In 1843 M. Salteri requested to be informed whether his son, who was born and then resident in England, was liable to the conscription in Tuscany.

Lord Aberdeen replied, that his son having been born and being resident within the dominions of the British Crown, cannot be liable to the Conscription Law of Italy, or of any other foreign country.

Marquis d'Azeglio; November 28, 1864.

In November 1864 the Marquis d'Azeglio requested information as to the nationality of Mr. R. E. Sofio, who had claimed exemption from the conscription at Messina as a British subject, although his brother was Counsel to the municipality, and as such undoubtedly an Italian.

To Marquis d'Azeglio; February 6, 1865.

After some inquiry, it proved that Mr. Sofio had been born at Messina, and the Marquis d'Azeglio was accordingly told that Her Majesty's Government could not protect him as a British subject.

Mr. Rickards, No. 15; March 1, 1865.

Mr. Sofio, who was a merchant at New York, in the meanwhile returned to the United States, having been only a short time in Sicily on commercial business.

Marquis d'Azeglio; February 16, 1865.

In February 1865 the Marquis d'Azeglio made a similar inquiry respecting MM. Carlo Hammet and Mariano Stuart (son of the gentleman whose case has been previously referred to), and Lord Russell then urged the Italian Government to abide by the doctrine laid down by the Neapolitan Government in 1837.

To Count Maffei; February 26, 1865.

Marquis d'Azeglio; April 4, 1865.

It seems unnecessary to enter into a detailed account of this correspondence, as the Sicilian law upon which this claim was founded, and which was then in force, has been superseded by the new Italian Code (see "Laws of Italy").

In January 1866 Mr. Elliot reported the case of Philip Smith, who had been drawn for the conscription at Bologna. General La Marmora refused to exempt him, on the ground that he came within the provisions of the Sardinian Code, his father having resided for 20 years in Italy, and the profession of coachman which the father exercised not being considered "comme un commerce ou une industrie."

The papers were referred to the Counsel to the Florence Legation, who pointed out that under the new Code Smith could declare himself a British subject on attaining his majority, and thus procure his discharge; but that in the meanwhile (he being 20 years of age) he must be considered as an Italian subject, and liable to military service.

This opinion is worth notice, as the age for conscription is generally 18; and in countries where a law similar to that of Italy prevails, it follows that the son of a British subject may be called upon to serve in the army from 18 to 21, when he can become a British subject and discharge himself.

It would certainly seem fairer that the youth should have the option of choosing his nationality when he is called upon to perform the duties of a native. It is obviously an anomaly that a man should be considered old enough to be a soldier, but not old enough to decide whether he would be a citizen.

This anomaly is obviated by the French law.

Messrs. Walton and Bubb; April 20, 1866.

In April 1866 M. Rosario Messina claimed British protection in Sicily as a naturalized Maltese. The Italian authorities denied his British nationality, asserting that his naturalization applied only to the island of Malta.

He was informed that his naturalization could not protect him against the law of his native country; the exception of this rule being found in cases in which the country of the original allegiance allows her subjects to put off their allegiance and become the subjects of another country, which was not alleged to be the law of Italy.

In May 1867 Mr. Elliot requested instructions as to the liability of Messrs. Hall and Hoare, and other British subjects, to contribute to a forced loan levied on mines, and other undertakings in which they were associated with Italians.

To Sir A. Paget, No. 3; September 5, 1867

Mr. Elliot was instructed that under the XVth Article of the Treaty of Commerce, British subjects could claim exemption from such loans being levied on dividends payable to them personally, but they could not claim exemption from loans assessed on the value of the mine or other concern in which they were collectively engaged with Italian subjects who were legally liable to it.

MEXICO.

Earl Russell to Mr. Scarlett.

To Mr. Scarlett, No. 43.

"SIR, Foreign Office, June 1, 1865.

"I HAVE received your despatch No. 29 of the 23rd of March, requesting to be furnished with instructions as to the nature and amount of protection which you should afford to naturalized British subjects in Mexico, and I have now to state to you, for your information and guidance, that the rule laid down in Lord Palmerston's Circular of January 8, 1851, is only applicable to persons holding certificates of naturalization granted after that date, and that persons holding such certificates are not to be held entitled to the same rights and capacities in Mexico as a natural-born British subject.

Home Office, May 17, 1865.

"The protection to be accorded in virtue of Lord Clarendon's Circular of May 1, 1854, applies merely to the right of sojourn and of locomotion, but not to protection generally in regard to business pursuits in which naturalized British subjects may be engaged.

"I am, &c.,

(Signed) "RUSSELL."

A question was raised in 1865 as to the liability of British subjects in Mexico to serve in the Police and National Guard.

Law Officers; May 22, 1865. Law Officers; June 20, 1865. To Mr. Scarlett, No. 50; June 26, 1865.

Under the advice of the Law Officers Mr. Scarlett was instructed that they could properly be called upon to serve in the police, or to pay a tax for exemption, but not in the National Guard, which might be used for active military service.

Queen's Advocate; June 9, 1865.

In May 1865 Mr. Scarlett forwarded a copy of a Decree recently published in Mexico, by which the illegitimate children born of foreigners and Mexican women, as well as those foreigners who may acquire landed property in Mexico, are to be considered as Mexican subjects.

To Mr. Scarlett, No. 51; June 26, 1865.

He was instructed that "the Decree respect- "ing illegitimate children seemed to furnish no "reason for remonstrance from foreign Govern-

" ments, except, perhaps, so far as it extended to " the illegitimate children born of Mexican women " in foreign States ('dentro ó fuera del territorio " del Impero'), a matter, however, of little practical " importance."

"The Decree as to foreigners acquiring landed property should be protested against in so far as it was made retrospective, and that time should be allowed to such aliens to determine whether they would retain their property, and to enable them to dispose of it without injury or loss accruing from this ex post facto law.

" With regard to its prospective operation, though it would be severe on foreigners, especially if the words 'propieded territoria' extend to shares in mines and leases of land and houses, yet it was within the competence of the Mexican Government to pass such a law."

o Mr. Scarlett, o. 83; ovember 1, 1865.

Mr. Benjamin Crowther, a British subject who had served in the army of the so-called Confederate States, having applied to Mr. Scarlett for protection, Lord Russell instructed Mr. Scarlett in November 1865, that "a British subject who has " neither been enrolled as a citizen nor naturalized " in America, ought not, on the ground of his " having served on either side during the civil war, " to be deprived in a third country like Mexico " of all British protection."

ueen's dvocate, ovember 7, 1865. o Mr. Scarlett, o. 2; ovember, 1865.

M. Saviñon, a Mexican by birth, having claimed British protection as a British naturalized subject, Mr. Scarlett's conduct in refusing it to him in Mexico was approved November 1865.

MONTE VIDEO.

See despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Vice-Consul Dale, December 20, 1842, previously cited.

NETHERLANDS.

ir A. Buchanan, os. 19, 23, 31, 32, nd 33.

In 1861 a case arose in which the Dutch Government claimed the military service of Daniel Swan, a British subject born in Scotland of British parents and subsequently domiciled in the Netherlands.

It appeared that the existing Dutch law was in favour of the claim of the Dutch Government; but a clause was proposed to be added to a Militia Bill then before the States General which, if liberally construed, would suffice to provide for the exemption thereafter of British subjects similarly situated.

o Sir A. uchanan, No. 4; July 13, 1861.

The Clause introduced into the Militia Bill by the Second Chamber of the States General was as follows: "A foreigner shall not be considered an " inhabitant if he belongs to a State where a Dutch " subject is not liable to compulsory military service, " or where the principle of reciprocity is received " with respect to liability for service."

Some doubt having been expressed whether, under this Clause, British subjects were exempt, the Dutch Goverment addressed a note to Sir A. Buchanan on the 26th of April, 1861: "Il " a été décidé qu'aussi longtemps que les sujets " Néerlandais établis dans la Grande Bretagne, qui " ne sont pas naturalisés sujets Britanniques, y " seront effectivement exempts du service militaire, " soit en vertu de la coûtume ou des dispositions " administratives, soit en vertu d'actes législatifs " spéciaux, les sujets de Sa Majesté Britannique " jouiront, également dans le Royaume des Pays Bas " à partir de la mise en vigueur de la dite nouvelle " loi, du bénéfice de la disposition de l'Article 15, " qui exempte, à titre de réciprocité, les étrangers " établis dans le Royaume de l'obligation de satis- " faire à la militaire."

ir A. Buchanan, No. 77; ugust 28, 1861.

A clause was at the same time introduced into the Militia Bill, exempting from the conscription the absent sons of residents who were not Netherlands subjects, thereby preventing the recurrence of a case like that of Swan.

In the instructions addressed to Sir A. Buchanan, Lord John Russell observed: "There is no practical " liability imposed on aliens in England to serve in " the militia, inasmuch as the militia ballot is not in " fact resorted to; even their theoretical liability " thereto is a matter not free from legal doubt; " and they are under no liability at all to com- " pulsory military service in the army."

Sir A. Buchanan, No. 34; July 13, 1861. To Sir A. Buchanan, No. 18; July 29, 1861.

NORWAY.

By the Norwegian military law of 1857 "foreigners who have acquired a fast domicilium " in the country" are rendered liable to military duty.

Mr. Crowe, Nos. 48 and 49; November 2, 1861. Mr. Crowe, No. 2; March 15, 1862.

A case occurred in 1861 in which Mr. Walter Foreman claimed British protection against the conscription, and he was advised to try the question before the Supreme Court as provided by the Law of 1857.

If a Convention existed British subjects would be exempt by the express terms of the Law; but in the absence of such a Convention they could only appeal to the principles of equity, and ask for exemption on the ground that Norwegians were not subjected to any such military service in England.

PERSIA.

Lord Palmerston to Mr. Sheil.

" September 4, 1850.

To Colonel Sheil, No. 82; September 4, 1850.

"The principles upon which, as stated in your despatch No. 87 of the 22nd of July, you are in the habit of acting, in regard to granting passports and affording protection to natives of India, appear to me to be correct. The only question would be whether children born in British India of parents subjects of the Shah, can properly be placed under British protection while resident in Persia.

"In Europe the international law would be against such an arrangement. Children born in England of parents subjects of a Foreign State would be entitled to be considered as British subjects everywhere but in the country to which their parents belong, always assuming that the law of that country considers children born to native subjects while out of the country, to be as much native subjects as if they had been born in the country.

"But though that would be the international rule in Europe, yet, considering the different and peculiar habits and practices of Asia, it seems to me that, considering that all persons born in British India, of whatever parents, are entitled to be regarded as British subjects, so far as concerns any privileges and advantages which attach to that character within the British dominions, it would be fair and right to extend to such persons, even in Persia, the benefits of being placed under British protection; and especially if they had resided in British India for any time, so as to have been practically domiciled therein."

Lord J. Russell to Mr. Alison.

" Sir, Foreign Office, August 25, 1860.

Mr. Alison, No. 64.

"I have had under my consideration Sir Henry Rawlinson's despatches No. 50 of the 29th of March and No. 57 of the 11th of April last, inclosing a register of persons enjoying, and claiming to enjoy, British protection in Persia, and requesting definite instructions for his guidance in regard to what constitutes the right of a person to be considered a British subject, and to claim British protection in Persia.

"It does not appear that the Persian Government has actually raised any objections, or that any case has arisen urgently calling for a decision as to the nationality or right to protection, of any individual or class of persons; but as Sir Henry Rawlinson appeared to apprehend that difficulties would arise, and desired to be instructed beforehand what course he was to adopt in each case, as and when it might occur, I have to observe.

"First, that I am ignorant as to what is the course adopted on the points in question by the other European Governments having diplomatic relations with Persia, more particularly France and Russia; and having regard to Articles IX, XI, and XII of the Treaty of March 4, 1857, as well as to the necessity of not conceding in practice to Persia more than is conceded to her by these Powers on the subject in question, it is impossible for me to furnish you with definite instructions on this head.

"Secondly, I have to point out to you the impracticability of following out strictly, in relation to Persia, or any other Mahometan Power, the principles of international law prevailing between Christian powers, so far as regards nationality and the right to protection. This impracticability is abundantly apparent from Sir Henry Rawlinson's despatch No. 57 of the 11th of April, in which, whilst insisting upon the propriety of conceding, as it were, a reciprocity in point of principle to Persia in the matter of national status, he nevertheless suggests, in particular instances, doubtless on strong grounds of policy, the propriety of entirely disregarding or departing from any such principle in actual practice, as, for instance, in the case of the Masulipatan Newal referred to at No. 10, Class VI., in the list inclosed in his beforementioned despatch.

"Thirdly, I have to state to you that no new rule or practice, as to the extending or limiting the application of the existing system as to British protection, ought to be adopted, unless it be made common to other powers, especially France and Russia; no such new rule or practice should be retrospective; and no person now enjoying British protection should be deprived thereof by the application or operation of any such new rule or practice.

"With respect, moreover, to the class of cases particularly adverted to by Sir Henry Rawlinson, namely, the children of Persian fathers born in the Queen's dominions, and afterwards returning to Persia, I have reason to believe that in Turkey such persons habitually enjoy British protection, unless, indeed, they act in such a manner as to forfeit the right thereto, and to show that they have 'elected' the Turkish nationality of their fathers; and I have to state to you, that I see no reason to depart from the instructions laid down on this head by Viscount Palmerston in his despatch No. 82 of the 14th of September 1850, to Lieutenant-Colonel Sheil.

"Subject to the above remarks, and considering the question apart from all considerations of usage, policy, or expediency, but exclusively and strictly with reference to the principles of international law prevailing amongst Christian nations, I have to state to you, that a child of a Persian father, born in the Queen's dominions and returning to Persia, will not, whilst in Persia, be entitled to British protection, if (as stated) the law of Persia considers him a Persian subject by reason of his Persian descent; and on this principle Syud Abdullah could not, whilst he remained in Persia, be claimed, or claim to be treated there, as a British subject. Although, therefore, this would be the correct rule of international law, yet, as it has not been hitherto acted on in Persia, I think it very inexpedient that it should now be made a rule of English procedure there, unless it is also made common to all other European nations, and especially France and Russia.

"You will be guided by what I have stated above, when called upon to interfere on behalf of persons having a claim to British protection.

"I am, &c.

"J. RUSSELL."

Mr. Alison, No. 184; October 26, 1862.

A correspondence took place in 1862 respecting the right of the British Consul-General at Bagdad to afford protection to the children of a person named Ali Agha, who was born in India, but was of Persian descent, the Persian Government having asserted that the children ought to be placed under the protection of the Persian Consul at Bagdad.

To Mr. Thomson, No. 4; December 31, 1862.

Mr. Alison was instructed that the British Consul-General was authorized upon the principle of the law and warranted by the usage applicable to the subject to take under his protection the sons of Ali Agha, while they continued resident at Bagdad.

In 1867, the British Resident at Bushire raised a question as to the nationality of the grandson of a British Indian subject born in Persia.

To Mr. Alison, No. 15; November 12, 1867.

Mr. Alison was instructed that such a person was a British subject by the British Statute law, and as such entitled to the good offices of British authorities, but in the case where the father had been domiciled, and the son resident in Persia, it was not reasonable to claim the latter as a British subject, so as to withdraw him from the operation of the laws of his parent state.

PERU.

In 1851, Mr. Vice-Consul Nugent requested to be informed whether he was to register as British subjects the children of British residents born in Peru, and whether children so registered, born of a Peruvian mother, were exempt from conscription.

Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires was directed to furnish Mr. Nugent with instructions on the latter point founded upon those addressed to him on the 17th of February 1848.

From Mr. Nugent; February 1, 1851. To Mr. Adams, No. 6; August 23, 1851.

These instructions were substantially the same as those given to Mr. Vice-Consul Dale (vide ante).

PORTUGAL.

"The Earl of Aberdeen to Lord Howard de Walden.

"Foreign Office,

"MY LORD, June 10, 1843.

"I HAVE received your Lordship's despatch No. 111 of the 25th of May, stating that you had informed the Portuguese Minister for Foreign Affairs that Her Majesty's Government cannot for an instant admit the right claimed by the Portuguese Government to consider as Portuguese subjects all persons born in Portugal, notwithstanding that they may be the issue of foreigners residing in that country.

"I think it necessary for your information to put you in possession of the opinion of the Queen's Advocate-General upon several cases which have arisen in foreign countries, and in which the right referred to in your despatch has been questioned.

"The substance of that opinion is, that although by the statute law of this country all children born out of the allegiance of the King, whose fathers or grandfathers, by the fathers's side, were natural-born subjects, are themselves entitled to enjoy British rights and privileges while they are within British territory, yet the effect of British statute law cannot extend so far as to take away from the Government of the country in which those persons may have been born, the right to claim them as natural-born subjects, at least so long as they remain in that country.

"By the common law of England, all persons born within the King's allegiance, whether the children of British subjects or of foreigners, are deemed to be natural-born subjects of the Crown of England; and if the law of any foreign state upon this point be the same as the English law, and if such foreign state places persons born within its territory upon the same footing as its own subjects or citizens, the Government of that state has the right to exact the service of a subject from such persons, even if they may have been the children of foreigners, at least whilst such children remain in the country of their birth.

"It may be necessary that I should add that the children or grandchildren by the father's side, of natural-born British subjects, born in any other country than Portugal, are entitled to be protected by you, in Portugal, as natural-born subjects of the Crown of Great Britain; but the children of British fathers born in Portugal cannot be protected by you against the operation of the laws affecting the subjects of Portugal, unless the laws of that country withhold from the child of a foreigner the rights of a Portuguese subject."

PRUSSIA.

To Lord Bloomfield, No. 249. August 11, 1865.

In reply to inquiries from Lord Bloomfield, Lord Clarendon furnished him with the following instructions in 1855:—

"1st. That a woman, a British-born subject, who has married a foreigner, puts on the status of her husband, and during the continuance of that coverture is not entitled to claim the protection of Her Majesty's legations abroad.

"2nd. The same woman, on becoming a widow, is entitled to re-assume the character of a natural-born British subject; but her children by her alien husband, if born abroad, follow the nationality of their father, except that by virtue of the 3rd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 66, they are made capable of taking any estate, real or personal, by devise or purchase or inheritance in England.

"3rd. As already stated the mother, whilst under coverture, follows the condition of her husband, and is an alien; but the children, as well during as after the coverture, are entitled to the privileges conferred by the 3rd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 66.

"4th. During coverture by an alien husband the mother cannot demand a British passport. When 'discouverte' she may demand one. The children, however, are aliens and cannot demand passports as British subjects either during or after coverture."

Law Officers; November 5, 1862.

In 1862, Mr. Crossthwaite, Her Majesty's Consul at Cologne, requested to be informed whether, he having been naturalized as a Prussian subject, his sons were liable to the Prussian conscription.

It was decided that the sons of a naturalized Prussian subject (owing allegiance to Her Majesty) who are between the ages of 17 and 25, and are resident in Prussia, would be compellable to serve in the Prussian army.

December 4, 1865.

In 1865 it was decided that a M. Renkewitz, a person born in the British Colony of Tobago, of a Saxon father and a Danish mother, and who had not resided in British territory since he was seven years of age, might properly receive a British passport from the Berlin Embassy.

In October 1867 the Prussian Chargé d'Affaires, with a view to the controversy between the Prussian and United States' Governments, made an inquiry as to the liability to serve in Her Majesty's army and navy of British subjects who, having emigrated to a foreign country and become naturalized citizens of that country, subsequently return to their native land.

To Count Bernstorff; November 13, 1867.

Count Bernstorff was informed "that no practice has prevailed in England since the Peace of 1815 which has any bearing on the question of the treatment in Prussia of these subjects of the King of Prussia, liable to military service, who, after they have emigrated to a foreign country, and been naturalized there, come back again to Prussia, inasmuch as the practice in England has always been, both before and since the Peace of 1815, to recruit the Royal Army by voluntary enlistment.

"On the other hand, the militia of the counties which used to be called out by ballot has ceased to be so called out since 1829, and on the last occasion when the militia was embodied, during the Russian war in 1854, the quota of each regiment was furnished by volunteers. There has thus been no opportunity for a tacit practice to grow up either in regard to the army or the militia, under which any privilege of exemption from the liability to military service should become established in Great Britain in favour of those subjects of the Queen who, after they have emigrated and been naturalized abroad, have returned to Great Britain.

"With regard to the Royal Navy, the same observations apply, as the practice of impressment has been allowed to fall into desuetude, and the Royal Navy has been for some time recruited by voluntary enrolment."

RUSSIA.

Lord Wodehouse, No. 12; January 3, 1857. Queen's Advocate; January 15 and 21, 1857. To Lord Wodehouse, No. 69; January 21, 1857.

In 1857 Madame von Essen applied to Lord Wodehouse, at St. Petersburgh, for a British passport to enable her to be recognized as a British subject by the Russian authorities, she being the widow of a Prussian who had been naturalized in Russia.

Lord Wodehouse was instructed "to grant her a passport if she can show that she was a natural-born Englishwoman, and that she forfeited, upon the death of her husband, the rights she acquired in Russia as the wife of a naturalized Prussian subject; but if she did not forfeit those Russian rights, you will inform Madame von Essen that she cannot under such circumstances be provided with a British passport, more especially as she appears to have no intention of leaving Russia.

The Queen's Advocate remarked, in regard to this case, that there was no law as to the right of a British-born subject to a passport, and that it would be very inexpedient to lay down any inflexible rule in such matters. The primary intention and use of a passport was for travelling purposes, and it was for the Secretary of State to give such directions from time to time as he might think fit as to the grant of passports in special cases, having regard to the conditions as to domicil and residence in a foreign country, under which such applications were made.

Consul-General Mansfield, No. 16; February 24, 1857.

Shortly afterwards Consul-General Mansfield inquired whether a Polish lady married to an Englishman could legally be entered in her husband's passeport de séjour as a British subject. He was told that during marriage she became entitled to the status and civil rights of her husband, and consequently to the protection of the British Government as a British subject.

In 1862 a question arose as to the status of British Jews in Russia.

To Lord Napier, No. 105; May 15, 1862.

Her Majesty's Ambassador was instructed that, having regard to the language of the treaty between Great Britain and Russia of 1859, and to the facts stated with reference to the legal status of Russian Jews in their own country, Her Majesty's Government would not be justified in claiming exemption for British Jews in Russia from the disabilities to which Russian Jews are there liable by law. The effect of the 1st and XIth Articles of the Treaty was to place British subjects on the footing of Russian subjects before the law, each class being alike, and one not more than the other amenable to all general laws applicable in like cases. Russian subjects, being Jews, incurred certain disabilities, and the equality intended and provided by the Treaty was not infringed by British subjects who are Jews, whilst residing there, also sharing the same disabilities.

In 1865 the British Factory at St. Petersburgh wished to obtain a revision of the 6th section of the Russian naturalization law relating to children born after their parents had adopted Russian allegiance, with reference especially to the fact that previously to 1862 no alien could carry on business in Russia without being naturalized, and that the new law of 1864 made no provision for the denaturalization of persons who had assumed Russian nationality before it was passed.

Sir A. Buchanan, No. 21.

Sir A. Buchanan was instructed to assist the Factory as far as he could.

At the same time he was warned that it was impossible to press upon the Russian Government the law of England as a complete reason for the desired concession.

Queen's Advocate; January 31, 1865.

"The present law of England would allow a Russian merchant to carry on his business in Great Britain without being naturalized, and so far the doctrine of reciprocity might be made available; but, on the other hand, the law of England considered that allegiance, whether acquired by birth or by naturalization, is indelible, except, perhaps, in the case of a conflict of duty between the obligations of the naturalized foreigner to the State to which he originally belonged and Great Britain.

"A Russian could exercise wholesale and retail trade in England on the same footing as a British subject, with the exception that he could not lease land or house for a longer term than twenty-one years without being naturalized. A Russian could not,* according to the theory of the law, put off the allegiance acquired by naturalization, though practically he would do so if he returned to his own country, except, perhaps, in a case of war between Russia and England."

Sir A. Buchanan, No. 80; March 12, 1867.

In March 1867, Mr. George Wolff applied to Sir A. Buchanan for a British passport. Mr. Wolff was born in England of a Hanoverian father and English mother, had resided in England until he was eleven years of age, and had never claimed Hanoverian nationality.

Under these circumstances, Sir A. Buchanan was told that he might give notice to the Russian authorities of Mr. Wolff's name being withdrawn from the family passport, and give him a separate passport as a British subject.

SPAIN.

Consul Brackenbury, Nos. 6, 9, 9. 11, 1841. To Consul Brackenbury, No. 4; November 5, 1841.

Her Majesty's Consul at Cadiz having requested instructions in 1841 as to the claims of the sons of British subjects born in Spain to exemption from the conscription, he was informed that as British law considered all persons born in Great Britain to be British subjects, Her Majesty's Government could not urge the claims of persons born in Spain to British protection as against the laws of that country.

Lord Aberdeen, however, pointed out that by the Spanish Constitution of 1837 it was declared that all persons born in Spain were Spaniards, but when that law was passed it was interpreted by the Spanish Government to mean that such persons have the right of being admitted to the privileges of Spanish subjects at their option, and that if it was thereby meant that the children of aliens born in Spain were aliens unless they declared ther option of becoming Spaniards, it might be contended that the sons of British parents so situated, who had not made such a declaration, remained British subjects, and, as such, exempt from conscription.

* See, however, previously as to British naturalization, the certificates of which, as at present granted, are cancelled by absence from England without licence beyond a certain specified time.

Lord Howden, No. 96; March 25, 1856.

By Article 24 of the Royal Decree of 17 November 1852, it was provided that persons domiciled or travelling in Spain, as well as their sons, who had not chosen Spanish nationality, should be exempt from military service, with the exception of those whose parents were born in Spanish territory.

In 1856 a question arose as to the interpretation of this law, and certain persons, grandsons of native British subjects, claimed exemption in the face of it.

The case was referred to Lord Clarendon, who decided that the claim was inadmissible.

In 1861, however, it appeared that Her Majesty's Consuls in Spain still continued to claim to protect the grandsons of British subjects from military service, and Lord Russell then gave instructions that they should desist from doing so.

To Sir J. Crampton; December 11, 1861.

Further correspondence passed between Sir J. Crampton and Lord Russell on this subject in 1862, and the following depatch was addressed to Sir J. Crampton (July 9, 1862):—

Sir J. Crampton, No. 197; May 2, 1862. To Sir J. Crampton, No. 139; July 9, 1862. Law Officers; July 7, 1862.

"I have to state to you that with regard to the general question I have nothing to add to the instructions conveyed to you in my despatch No. 164 of the 17th December last, to which Her Majesty's Government adhere.

"With respect to the particular cases of Lieutenant Arguimban and his son Mr. Joseph Arguimban, and to any other cases which may come under the same category, I am advised that they should be determined by the domicil of the parents at the time of the birth of the children within the territories of the Crown of Spain. If at the time of the birth of Lieutenant Arguimban, his father was not only a natural-born British subject but legally domiciled in the British dominions, I am of opinion that Lieutenant Arguimban himself was at the time of his birth a British subject, owing permanent allegiance to the British Crown, and entitled to British protection. If, on the contrary, his father was then domiciled in the dominions of the Spanish Crown, he became a Spanish subject, and is not entitled to claim British protection against any obligations resulting from his Spanish allegiance, although by an English Statute he may be also entitled to the privileges of a natural-born British subject in Great Britain.

"The same observations apply to the case of Mr. Joseph Arguimban, whose position is likewise dependent on the allegiance and domicil of his father at the time of his birth.

"The fact of Lieutenant Arguimban and one of his sons being officers in the Royal navy tends primâ facie to show that the domicil of Lieutenant Arguimban, if originally in England, did not afterwards cease to be so; but even this point would not be conclusive if that gentleman has resided for a long time in the Spanish dominions, and I am advised that no length of service in the army or navy of Great Britain would be material for the purpose of the present question if the allegiance and domicil of the person engaged in such service were originally Spanish.

"I should add that, even in the case of persons owing permanent allegiance to the British Crown, but domiciled and resident in Spain, the claim to exemption from military service in Spain cannot justly be extended on their behalf to any services required for the legitimate purposes of internal defence only, and which do not involve any act at variance with the duties of their British allegiance."*

* The tenour of this despatch seems inconsistent with the doctrine previously held by the British Government, as it makes the nationality of the son to depend on the domicil of his father instead of the place of his own birth. It is to be presumed that the instruction was framed with reference to the peculiar law and usage of Spain, and was not intended to lay down any general principle applicable to other countries.

SWITZERLAND.

Lord Palmerston to M. Drouey, President of the Swiss Confederation.

"October 16, 1859.

"THE undersigned has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to him in the name of the Federal Council in Switzerland by M. Drouey, President of the Confederation, requesting to be made acquainted with the provisions of the English law as regards the cases in which foreigners lose their rights of nationality.

"In reply, the undersigned has the honour to inform M. Drouey that he is not aware of any case in which a British-born subject can lose his right of nationality unless he should be deprived of it by an Act of Parliament.

"It is well established that a natural-born British subject cannot put off his allegiance to the British Crown by any act of his own, not even by swearing allegiance to a foreign Power; and though it is not illegal for a British subject to contract engagements with a foreign Power with the licence of the British Crown, yet such engagemeent do not affect his national status according to the English law, and the licence so given may be revoked at any moment.

"But though a British subject cannot get rid of his national character, he may so misconduct himself either by committing piracy, or in other ways, as to forfeit all claim to the protection of the British Government."

In 1863 the Swiss Government claimed to include in the conscription at Geneva two brothers named Fournier, born in England, but whose father had been naturalized subsequently to their birth as a citizen of Geneva.

To Admiral Harris, No. 16; April 22, 1863.

As the young men were both of full age, and had done nothing to forfeit their British character, Her Majesty's Minister at Berne was informed that they came within the meaning of the term "British subjects" in the 6th Article of the Treaty of 1855, and, as such, were exempt from Swiss military service.

To Admiral Harris, No. 2; November 20, 1865.

In 1865 a question arose whether an English Company (the European Central Railway Company), whose direction and agent was located in the Canton of Tessin, was entitled to the support of the British Legation.

Admiral Harris was instructed "that this "English company has not forfeited its right to "the protection of the British Legation, because "in the Act of Concession the technical domicil of "the company ('la direction technique du chemin "de fer') is to be considered as being in the Canton where the Board of Administration of the "Company is situated. The distinction between "different kinds of domicil is familiar to all "jurists. The domicil which incorporates a "foreign citizen into the State in which he is "resident is wholly distinct in its character and "consequences from the domicil which is assigned "by the State to a foreign subject with relation to "certain legal acts or liabilities. Such a domicil "is for the purpose of founding jurisdiction in the "event of legal proceedings being taken, either by "him or against him in the country in which he is "resident. The domicil specified in the concession "for the Company is of this nature, and falls under "this category; but it does not affect the right of "the Company to the intervention of its Government for the purpose of preventing an act of "injustice being done to it by the foreign Government. The intervention, however, of the British "Legation in Switzerland should be strictly confined to such a case, and should not attempt to "interfere with the ordinary course of the municipal law in its operation upon the rights and "liabilities of the Company."

Mr. J. G. Koch, March 16, 1866.

In 1866, Mr. J. G. Roch protested against being called upon for military service in Switzerland as a Genevese.

Mr. Roch's grandfather was a Genevese by birth, having been born in a territory ceded by Sardinia to Geneva in 1816 by a Treaty, one of the conditions of which was, that those so born should, being Christians, be considered as Genevese. By the law of that Canton the national character is inalienable, and extends to the grandchild.

To Admiral Harris, No. 21; March 29, 1866. Queen's Advocate; April 14, 1866. Queen's Advocate: May 8, 1866. Queen's Advocate; May 21, 1866.

As Mr. Roch lived and was domiciled at Geneva, Admiral Harris was informed that the claim to exemption could not be put—the English law on the same subject being duly borne in mind—upon the high ground of strict right. The claim could only be preferred upon the lower ground of usage and convenience.

TUNIS.

Lord Palmerston to Sir T. Read.

"SIR, January 16, 1840.

"Mr. ANCRAM, in his despatch No. 14 of the 2nd of June 1838, reported the case of a young Maltese girl, Grazia Abela, the wife of a Maltese, who had been persuaded to embrace the Mahomedan religion, but who afterwards desired to recant. Mr. Ancram, it appears, made thereupon an application to the Bey that the girl should be restored to her husband, but the Bey refused to restore her. Since that time I have heard nothing further from Mr. Ancram or from yourself on this subject; and I would hope that the Bey, on further reflection, may have been induced to give up the girl. But if that should not have been the case, I have to instruct you to state, by a written note to the Bey, that all the subjects of Her Majesty are free to change their religion, if they think fit to do so, and the British Government never interferes with the conscience of British subjects; but that every person who is born a subject of the British Crown must, by the law of England, continue during life to owe allegiance to the Sovereign of Great Britain; and, on the other hand, every such person is entitled during life to the protection of the British Crown.

"The woman in question having been born in Malta is a British subject; and though she is at liberty to embrace the Mahomedan religion if she shall think fit to do so, she cannot thereby cease to be a British subject, and she is as much entitled to British protection as if she had remained a Christian. The law of Tunis may be different; but the British Government has nothing to do with that law, and Great Britain never can permit the laws of any foreign State to interfere with the indissoluble connection which binds a British-born subject to the British Crown.

"Moreover, marriage is by the law of England a tie which can only be dissolved by an Act of the British Legislature, and Her Majesty's Government never can permit any foreign Government to assume that a marriage legally contracted between two British subjects can be dissolved by the circumstance that one of these parties has changed their religion.

"Her Majesty's Government, therefore, expect that this Maltese woman shall be placed under your protection, in order that she may have an opportunity of freely choosing whether she will return to her husband and her country, or remain where she is.

"I am, &c.

"PALMERSTON."

In 1865 Mr. Wood reported that he had sent to Malta a Maltese family, consisting of a widow and minor children, who had been induced by distress to embrace the Mahomedan religion.

As the children of a Maltese father during their minority remained British subjects, and it was assumed that the application made for their removal to Malta had been at the instance of their next relation or friend, Mr. Wood's proceedings were approved.

Queen's Advocate; January 13, 1865.

TURKEY.

The question as to the protection of British subjects in the East does not come within the scope of this Memorandum, but it would require careful attention in case any alteration of the present law of allegiance were contemplated.

To Mr. C. Murray, Consular, No. 13; November 17, 1849.

The following instruction was addressed, in 1849, to Mr. Murray, respecting the amount of protection to be granted in Egypt to aliens who had obtained letters of naturalization in England :—

" Your inquiry arises out of three questions which have been put to you by Mr. Walne, Her Majesty's Consul at Cairo; and I will give answers to those questions.

" The first question is, whether Greek houses in Egypt, being branches of establishments belonging to Greeks who have been naturalized in England, are entitled to protection ?

" Upon this point I have to answer, that those members of such houses who are not naturalized British subjects cannot claim for themselves nor for their branch house British privileges, merely because another member of the house residing elsewhere has been naturalized in England.

" The second question is, whether British protection is to be extended in Egypt to subjects of the Kingdom of Greece who have obtained letters of naturalization in England and have returned to the Levant ?

" The answer to this is, that if these persons have been legally naturalized in England, they are entitled everywhere but in the Kingdom of Greece to the privileges of British subjects.

" The third question is, whether Greek rayahs, resuming their residence in the Ottoman territory, after having obtained naturalization in England, are to be protected ?

" The answer is, that these persons cannot, within the country of their natural allegiance, that is to say, within the Ottoman Empire, claim to be considered British subjects, because natural allegiance in the country of a man's birth over-rides privileges obtained by naturalization elsewhere."

To Mr. D. Cassavetti; February 22, 1851.

In 1851 this instruction was modified as regards Mr. Cassavetti, a Greek naturalized British subject resident in London, and Her Majesty's Consul-General in Egypt was instructed to afford to his branch establishments at Cairo and Alexandria the same protection as would have been afforded to the branch establishments of an English firm.

To Mr. Brant, Consular, No. 4; August 26, 1852.

A similar instruction was sent to Mr. Consul Brant in the case of Mr. Calimachi, a Greek, the agent at Trebizond of Mr. Mathew Schilizzi, a resident in London.

To Mr. Theologo; January 12, 1855.

In 1855 like protection was extended to Messrs. Bogni and Kotti, Greek agents at Galatz for M. Theologo.

To Mr. P. Theologo; February 8, 1856.

In 1856 Mr. P. Theologo was informed that his naturalization would not entitle him to protection in Turkey, he having been born in Broussa in Asia Minor.

To Mr. Giro; September 7, 1858. To Mr. Muller, No. 2; February 14, 1859.

In 1858 protection in Egypt was refused to Mr. Giro, a native of Lemnos; but in the following year it was decided that, bearing in mind the peculiar relations between Egypt and the Porte, he might properly receive British protection in Egypt, unless the Egyptian authorities objected.

In October 1859 a question was raised as to the nationality of Mr. John Aslan, born at Cerigo, but who had not complied with the provisions of the Ionian Law in order to constitute himself an Ionian citizen.

To Mr. Colquhoum, Consular, No. 36; December 9, 1859.

Eventually it was arranged that protection should be afforded to him until he had an opportunity of returning to the Ionian Islands and completing his naturalization there.

To Mr. Theologo; November 11, 1861.

In 1861 Mr. Sophocles Theologo was informed that his agent at Galatz was not entitled to personal protection for himself or his concerns; but that the interests he represented, as the agent of a naturalized British subject resident in London, would be entitled to such protection.

Messrs. Wilson, Dodgshun, and Papayanni; April 2, 1861.

In April 1861 an application was made for British protection on behalf of the estate of a bankrupt, Mr. Rodocanachi, a native of Scio, who had been naturalized as a British subject in 1855.

As his certificate of naturalization contained an express exception of " any rights and capacities of " a natural-born British subject out of or beyond " the dominions of the British Crown and the " limits thereof" (the usual clause at that date), and Mr. Rodocanachi was at Constantinople in no danger of molestation, Her Majesty's Government refused to interfere.

In the case of Themistocles George Aslan, who claimed to have his declaration of part-ownership in a British vessel registered at the Cairo Consulate in 1861, it was decided that the question of Mr. Aslan's right to have his declaration of part-ownership in a British vessel attested at the British Consulate at Cairo depended not upon the terms of his letters of naturalization, nor upon the circumstance of his having or not having a foreign passport, but upon the provisions of " The Merchant " Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict., cap. 104, sec. 18." By that Act persons who are naturalized by or pursuant to statute are rendered capable of being owners or part-owners of a British ship, only if they " are and continue to be, during the whole " period of their so being owners, first, resident in " some place within Her Majesty's dominions, or " second, if not so resident, members of a British " factory or partners in a house actually carrying " on business in the United Kingdom, or in some " other place within Her Majesty's dominions." Mr. Aslan, it appeared, was not a person fulfilling the first of these conditions, but it did not appear whether he was or was not a member of a British factory, or a partner in a house actually carrying on business within Her Majesty's dominions. If he was, the application made by him to the British Consul at Cairo ought to be complied with; if not he was by law incapable of being owner or part owner of a British ship, and the ship of which he was owner or part-owner could not be deemed to be British; in which case the Consul ought not to attest his declaration.

Acting Consul at Cairo, No. 25; May 30, 1861. Law Officers; August 9, 1861.

The clause in Mr. Aslan's letters of naturalization excepting from the grant " any rights and capa- " cities of a natural-born British subject out of " and beyond the dominions of the British Crown " and the limits thereof," was intended only to prevent the person thereby naturalized from claiming, by virtue of his naturalization, as against foreign governments while within their territories, the benefit of the status of a British subject. It was not intended to be applicable to the right and capacity of the person naturalized (provided he fulfils the requirements of the Merchant Shipping Act), to be and continue, while locally resident beyond the limits of Her Majesty's dominions, an owner or part owner of a British ship, and to do while there all acts proper to be done by him in that character. Such a right is not one of which any foreign locality can be predicated, merely because the person entitled to it may happen to be residing abroad; it is in its nature essentially a British right, its subject being a British ship having its port of registry within the dominions of the British Crown, and if locality was to be ascribed to it at all, it must follow the port or domicil of the ship, and not the residence of the owner.

To Mr. Theologo; December 24, 1862.

In December 1862 Mr. Sophocles Theologo was informed " that a foreign house having foreign " interests, although connected with the English " house, and being conducted by foreigners and in " a foreign country, cannot claim the protection of " a British consul, except in so far as the direct " interests of British subjects, apart from those of " foreigners, are involved."

In 1864 Sir E. Hornby was authorized to register Messrs. Cuppa as British subjects, reserving any rights of allegiance which might be preferred against them by the country of their birth.

r E. Hornby, o. 42; me 22, 1864. w Officers; ly 23, 1864.

These gentlemen were Ionians by birth, sons of an Ionian who had commanded, as a British naval officer, a scamparia or gunboat in the war with France, and they claimed, accordingly, to be British subjects, under the Act 13 Geo. II. cap. 3.

ay 14, 1866.

In the case of M. Mavrogodato in 1866 it was decided that "although in strictness a foreigner "who is merely naturalized in Great Britain "has no title to British protection abroad, the "good offices of Her Majesty's representatives "may as a general rule be properly extended to "such persons elsewhere than in the dominions of "the State to which they owe natural allegiance;" and that such claim as M. Mavrogodato might have to those good offices in the Ottoman dominions must be "subject to the determination of any "question which may be raised by the Turkish "Government, arising out of his place of birth, "and that if that question is raised M. Mavrogo-"dato must be prepared to establish to his Excel-"lency's satisfaction that he forms one of a class "of persons over whom the Porte has renounced "its right of regarding them as its subjects, not-"withstanding their birth in its territory."

VENEZUELA.

Mr. Riddell, Consular, No. 42; August 12, 1851. Queen's Advocate; January 19, 1852. Law Officers; February 3, 1852.

A question arose in 1851 whether the illegitimate children of British parents, born in Venezuela, were entitled to be registered as British subjects at Her Majesty's Consulates.

Sir John Dodson, then Queen's Advocate, considered that such persons might be taken to be British subjects for the purposes of registration only, but that their claim to British nationality could not be asserted against an actual adverse claim of the Venezuelan Government to treat them as natural-born citizens.

It having been pointed out to Sir John Dodson that this opinion seemed to be at variance with a report which he had previously made in the case of a Mr. Stratford, when he had stated that the illegitimate children of British parents born abroad was not entitled to be considered a British subject in foreign countries, Sir John Dodson replied that the question was one of much difficulty in which the other law officers should be consulted.

This was accordingly done, and, on the 3rd of February 1852 the Law Officers advised that illegitimate children born abroad of English parents are not British subjects, and therefore not entitled to British protection. By the common law, children born abroad of English parents were not, except in certain special cases, English subjects. Acts of Parliament have been passed to remedy this inconvenience, but these Acts, from their particular purposes and wording, can only be held to apply to legitimate children.

During the discussion of the British claims on Venezuela in 1865, the Venezuelan Government objected to the insertion of certain claims in the British Schedule on the ground that the claimants were citizens of Venezuela.

Mr. Edwardes, No. 66; August 23, 1865.

In support of the principle on which this objection was based they quoted at considerable length passages from Wheaton, Blackstone, Sir R. Phillimore, and other jurists showing the doctrine of native nationality held by England.

With regard to the particular case of Venezuela the Foreign Secretary stated (July 27, 1865), "Now "in this country it has been judged suitable, for "many reasons, to establish that all that are born "in its territory are Venezuelans. It has been "thus declared in the Constitutions that have ruled "the country since 1821. In the long process of "time which has elapsed, it has been understood "that the fact of being born in Venezuela carries "with it the obligation of naturalization. A con-"troversy which originated with the Spanish "Legation in 1847, for pretending to include in the "matriculation of subjects of Her Catholic Majesty "persons born in Venezuela, although of Spanish "parents, might be cited."

"During the war of five years, on an occasion which created difficulties, and to avoid others, the executive power deviated in one single instance from the common practice, that of the young man, Alexander d'Empaire, and declared him exempt from military service, as a minor, being under the protection of his father and not having signified his wish to become a citizen of Venezuela. But that resolution cannot be considered definitive, for it is not given to the Executive power to point out the sense of the Constitution. The President understood it to be so, and mentioned it in his Message to Congress in 1861, asking that a law should interpret the Constitutional rule. Nothing was then resolved. The question was still undecided when the Constituent Assembly met in 1863; the Government insisting for a termination, it pronounced itself in this manner in Article 6 of the Federal Constitution:—

"'Venezuelans are—1. All persons born, or who may be born in the territory of Venezuela, whatever may be the nationality of their parents.

"'2. The children of a Venezuelan father, or of a Venezuelan mother, born in other territories, who may fix their residence in this country, and shall express their desire to be considered as such.'

"It therefore appears that there can be no doubt as to the meaning of the legislators, and if a more explicit declaration has been asked for, it is owing to its being considered that it should come directly from them."

Mr. Edwardes. No. 89; October 25, 1865.

On the 23rd of October 1865 Mr. Edwardes, under instructions from Lord Russell, replied, "Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that "the general principles on which his Excellency "founds his particular position are sound; though it "is to be observed that by Treaty stipulation and by "long usage one State may concede to the subjects "of another privileges which are not accorded to "its own subjects. Many circumstances may make "such a usage not impolitic or unreasonable."

"Her Britannic Majesty's Government are, moreover, of opinion that when such usage is abrogated by the Municipal Law, ample time should certainly be given to the subjects of the State from whom the privilege is withdrawn to make up their minds whether they will remain in or leave the country in which this change in their former relation to it has been effected.

"M. Seijas will perceive from the foregoing opinions that, although Her Britannic Majesty's Government offer no opposition to the change which the Venezuelan Government desire to make in the position of children born to British subjects in Venezuela, they are far from admitting its power of retro-action.

Mr. Harrison. No. 5; December 9, 1865.

"The undersigned, therefore, being unable to see how the solution of the question at issue can possibly affect the settlement of claims already pending, avails himself, &c."

The Venezuelan Government rejoined, on 22nd of November 1865, that it was not a question of passing a new law, but of interpreting a principle which had been (with the exception of the French case previously referred to) maintained since the foundation of the Republic.

To Mr. Fagan. No. 3; January 16, 1866.

In January 1866 Lord Clarendon instructed Mr. Fagan "that Mr. Edwardes appears to have "stated the matter very properly to the Venezuelan "Government. It seems clear that the new "law ought not to affect the position of British "claimants whose claims had accrued previously "to the passing of this law; and the argument "that the law is not retro-active but explanatory "is inadmissible.

"Previously to the passing of it, practice and usage had interpreted the law as treating the children of foreign subjects, though born in the Venezuelan territory, as foreigners. To pass a law now, explaining that the law had never meant to consider such persons as foreigners, is substantially to pass a retro-active law to the injury of foreigners."

Mr. Edwardes, No. 93; November 9, 1865. Mr. Edwardes, No. 97; November 22, 1865.

In November 1865 Mr. Edwardes forwarded a list of claims admitted by the Venezuelan Government. This list includes the claims of persons alleged to be British subjects although born in Venezuela, and a note is appended to their names showing that these claims were admitted subject to their nationality being proved.

Mr. Irving's Memorandum: February 2, 1867.

Negotiations are now pending for the settlement of these admitted claims, together with any other claims not yet investigated, by a mixed Commission, when the right of these Venezuelan natives to British nationality will again come under discussion.

CHAS. S. A. ABBOTT.

To Mr. Fagan, No. 4; January 30, 1868.

Foreign Office,
March 5, 1868.

ADDENDA.

(A.)

OPINION OF MR. CALEB CUSHING.

RIGHT OF EXPATRIATION.

Citizens of the United States possess the right of Voluntary Expatriation, subject to such Limitations, in the interest of the State, as the Law of Nations or Acts of Congress may impose.

Attorney-General's Office,
SIR, October 31, 1856.

I HAVE to apologise to you for having omitted to reply at an earlier day to your communication, inclosing extract from a letter addressed to Mr. Vroom, Minister of the United States in Prussia, by the Count de Montgelas, Minister of Bavaria at the same court, and requesting me to consider the question of law propounded by the Count de Montgelas.

The question is, "Whether, according to the laws of "the United States of America, a citizen thereof, when "he desires to expatriate himself, needs to ask either "from the Government of the United States, or of the "State of which he is the immediate citizen, permission "to emigrate; and if so, what are the penalties of con-"travention of the law?"

It might suffice, perhaps, for me to say that there is no provision of law on the subject in the Constitution of the United States, or in any Act of Congress; and that, therefore, a citizen of the United States, desiring to emigrate, is free to do so, without express consent of the Government of the Union: and that no law of any one of the States forbids the citizen thereof to emigrate, or imposes any penalties on him if he do so without the consent of such State.

This naked statement, however, though a substantial response to the inquiry, leaves out of view some relations of the subject, which, in deference to the possible wishes of the Count de Montgelas, it may be desirable to expose.

In the popular discussions of the United States, it is common to assume that the theory of their political organization requires, and that their laws admit, unlimited right of emigration.

This impression is partly derived from the fact that, the United States having so recently by force made themselves independent of Great Britain, ideas of right, which belong to revolutionary epochs, still predominate over those of duty, which belong to the regular action of all political society, and the importance of which grows more and more apparent with every year's duration of the Union.

To justify the supposition of unlimited right of emigration, it is common to appeal to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and of its laws regulating the naturalization of foreigners. These provisions do, indeed, show that the encouragement of foreign immigration is a feature of the public policy of the United States, and suggest implication, that, in the spirit of international equity, we shall concede to our own citizens a reciprocal faculty of emigration, and of foreign naturalization, involving abjuration of allegiance to the Union.

Acting on these impressions attempts have been made from time to time in the Congress of the United States to legalize the right of emigration; but, on all such occasions, careful scrutiny has made evident the fallacy of the popular assumption, and has caused the whole subject to be left, as it now stands, as a question of our public law, unsolved in its complete generality—but with elements of solution, which have not failed to strike the observation of many jurists and statesmen of the United States.

To begin: it is true, as the tenor of the question of the Count de Montgelas implies he presumed might be the case, that the conditions of citizenship of the United States and of any one of the states are not identical; that is to say, it may happen that by the laws of a given state a person shall be a citizen thereof, and still not be a citizen of the United States. Nor does it follow, because he is a citizen of a given State by the very letter of its laws, that therefore he is of every or any other State. Persons may be, and in fact are, citizens of the State of Massachusetts, that is, invested with all the rights, political and municipal, which its institutions can bestow, without being citizens of the State of Virginia or of the United States. But the distinctions which exist in this respect are not very important in international relations; and so far as they are anywise material they will come up incidentally in considering the duties and the rights of citizens of the United States.

Neither in the Constitution nor in the laws of the United States is there any definition of citizenship. The Constitution, which is the organic law of the Union, confines the exercise of all the great functions of state to citizens, and some of these functions to natural citizens; and it empowers congress to enact laws of naturalization. Such laws have been enacted, and provide in effect that any free white alien, after five years' residence in the country, and two years' intermediate declaration of intention to become a citizen, may become such on his making proof of good character, and abjuring, in certain prescribed forms, all foreign allegiance, and taking oath of allegiance to the United States. And many ordinary municipal rights are, by other laws, capable of being enjoyed by citizens alone: such as the ownership of merchant ships, the command and in part the manning of such ships, and the purchase of public lands by pre-emption.

To this it may be added, that in many of the States the right to own land within the same is by their laws restricted to citizens of the United States. But I repeat citizenship, whether acquired by birth or by naturalization, is not a thing specifically defined in its elements, either by the Constitution or by the laws of the Union.

Nor is there in the Constitution or laws of the United States, any general provision to define how the rights of citizenship may be lost, or its duties be made to cease, whether by one's own act or by that of the Government.

And in the codes of the States there is occasional confusion of thought, arising from the want of proper attention to the difference between the enjoyment of mere civil rights, the right of suffrage, and the right of citizenship as a political status of persons, independent of their sex, age, or condition. Thus women, minors, and some other persons do not possess the right of suffrage in any of the States although citizens of the United States, and it is possessed in some of the States by persons who are not citizens of the United States.

As to citizenship and its termination, though we do not find them defined by any law of the Union, still we may gather the prevailing thought of the nation on the subject, by inspecting the legislation of some of the States.

In truth, we must divide the people of the United States into two classes: those in the full enjoyment of all the rights of citizenship, and those deprived of some or all of those rights; and then we must distinguish between such of the inhabitants of the country as are citizens, and such as are subjects only, and whether capable or not of becoming citizens, yet not so at the present time. I allude in the latter case to the Indians who, in some of the States are the subjects of the State in which they exist, but who are in general subjects of the United States; and to the Africans, or persons of African descent who, being mostly of servile condition, are of course not citizens but subjects, in reference as well to the respective States in which they reside as to the United States.

In the sequel of these remarks it will be seen that the distinction between citizens and subjects in the United States is material to the just appreciation of the question of the right of emigration in its domestic relations, and still more in its foreign relations, and especially as admonitory of candid consideration of the laws regulating emigration, which exist in some of the countries of Europe.

These are prefatory considerations. I proceed now to state how far limitations of the right of emigration are imposed in fact by the laws either of the Union or of individual States.

The Union, as already explained, has not as yet undertaken to formalise any general law, either of citizenship or of emigration. One of the States, Virginia, has done this; and its express legislation on the subject, though imperfect, is quite suggestive, and leads directly to important reflections.

The code of Virginia contains the following provisions:—

"All free white persons born in this State, all free white persons born in any other State of this Union, who may be or become residents of this State, all aliens being free white persons naturalized under the laws of the United States, who may be or become residents of the State; all persons who have obtained a right to citizenship under former laws, and all children, wherever born, whose father, or if he be dead, whose mother shall be a citizen of this State at the time of the birth of such children, shall be deemed citizens of this State.

"2. Whensoever any citizen of this State, by deed in writing, executed in the presence of, and subscribed by two witnesses, and by them proved in the court of the county or corporation where he resides, or by open verbal declaration made in such court and entered of record, shall declare that he relinquishes the character of a citizen of this State, and shall depart out of the same; such person shall, from the time of such departure, be considered as having exercised his right of expatriation, so far as regards this State, and shall thenceforth be deemed no citizen thereof.

"3. When any citizen of this State, being twenty-one years of age, shall reside elsewhere, and in good faith become the citizen of some other State of this Union, or the citizen or subject of a foreign State or Sovereign, he shall not, while the citizen of another State, or the citizen or subject of a foreign State or Sovereign, be deemed a citizen of this State.

"4. No such act of becoming the citizen or subject of a foreign State or Sovereign, and no act under the second section shall have any effect if done while this State or the United States shall be at war with any other foreign power." (Revised Code, tit. ii.)

Without stopping to comment on the conditions of citizenship here laid down, let us attend to the conditions of its relinquishment. These are two, namely: 1. Solemn declaration of intention to emigrate, with actual emigration. 2. Residence elsewhere, that is, actual emigration from the State, and the assumption in good faith of citizenship in some other State of the Union, or of allegiance to a foreign State or Sovereign.

But the rights thus defined are of the change of citizenship, which involves emigration: not of pure emigration. The law does not comprehend the case of subjects of the State.

And the rights accorded are with significant restriction: they cannot be exercised in time of war. That is, the legislator, while nominally admitting the general rights of citizens to emigrate, reflected that it would not answer to leave the right without such limitation, at least, as to deprive the citizen of the power to abstract himself from the public service in certain emergencies by emigration, or under the same emergencies to shelter acts of treason under pretences of emigration.

Thus, in the very act of legalizing emigration, the State of Virginia declares expressly that the right is, in its judgment, subject to the paramount rights of the State.

How could it be otherwise? If the State owes protection to the citizen, does not the citizen owe service to the State? Above all, in a republican country, in which the State is but the congregation of the citizens, are not the interests of all bound up together into a unity of common interest, so that rights are but correlative to obligations? The assumption of the unlimited right of emigration would make of the inhabitants of a country a mere collection of individuals each pursuing blindly his own passionate or narrow view of his apparent personal interests, instead of an organized political society, combining individual right with public power, and maintaining the true rights of individuals as well against individual wrongdoers as foreign foes, by means of the aggregate force of the State. But of this more hereafter.

To return to the actual laws of Virginia. These, in formalizing the right of emigration, impose restriction upon it, and thus recognize the public right of restriction.

But other restrictions of the right are found in the laws of the same State.

A citizen of Virginia, it is clear, does not effectually cast off any private obligations of his, whether relating to person or property, by pretence of emigration. He may, it is true, be sheltered by the foreign jurisdiction, and thus enabled to evade legal obligations existing in the state of Virginia; but those obligations do not the less continue in force within that State, until discharged by its laws. This doctrine comprehends citizens of that State a fortiori its subjects.

But the more material question is of the obligations of citizens to the State itself. And here, the proposition is a general one; thus, a citizen of the State of Virginia cannot, by emigration, discharge himself of any obligation to the State, the non-performance of which involves by its laws any penal consequence. If he leave the State under such circumstances, though under pretence of expatriation, he is a fugitive from justice, not a lawful emigrant; the State will demand his extradition from the State to which he assumes to emigrate, and obtain it, in virtue of an express provision of the Constitution of the United States; and the State will itself deliver up, on demand, any such person undertaking to emigrate to it from any other State. (Code, tit. x, ch. 17, § 8–16.

The State of Kentucky imitated the State of Virginia in this respect, repeating in substance, and almost in the same words, the enactment of the latter as well as to citizenship as expatriation.

No other State of the Union has, so far as my observation extends, attempted to solve these interesting questions by express legislation.

The Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania declares that "emigration from the State shall not be prohibited" (Art. ix. § 25). The same provision is contained in the Constitution of the State of Indiana, and, it may be, of some other States. But this declaration is to be taken subject to all the qualifications which have been exhibited in discussing the institutions of the States of Virginia and Kentucky.

The nature of these qualifications may be illustrated further, by supposing the militia of the State of Pennsylvania or of Indiana to be in the field. If a discontented soldier in the ranks undertakes to escape his duties by professed emigration, will that profession be admitted by the State? Undoubtedly not. It will reply that desertion cannot be covered up under the cloak of emigration; in a word, that emigration or expatriation cannot shelter a criminal act, and is of necessity subject to conditions of the service of the State.

If we pass now to the legislation of the United States we shall encounter a series of provisions which confirm the conclusions already drawn from the legislation of the States, involving the general doctrine that a citizen of the United States cannot, of right, discharge himself by emigration from subsisting obligations, either private ones or to the Union.

In the first place, the Federal Government recognizes the general doctrine that a citizen or subject cannot, by pretence of expatriation, relieve himself from any existing penal liability to the Union, or to any one of its States. It provides, by the Constitution and by laws, for the extradition of fugitives from service or crime as between the States respectively; and it provides, by numerous treaties and by laws, for the extradition of fugitives from justice as between the United States and foreign Governments.

Nor, in the second place, can it be doubted that the same doctrine may be applied in the United States to some cases in which the act of expatriation is itself, in motive as in fact, an evasion of duties to the State. Thus, we should not be prepared to admit that a soldier in the army, or a seaman in the navy, can, by pretence of expatriation, relieve himself from the charge of desertion; or an officer of the army or navy on the same pretence anticipate and escape a charge of treason involved in the very act of expatriation.

To the contrary of this, we have the case reported of one Elijah Clark, who was tried and sentenced as a spy during the last war between the United States and Great Britain, although he had professedly emigrated to Canada. (Breckenridge's Miscellanies, p. 409.)

For there is unanimity of opinion among jurists and statesmen alike, that expatriation, even if admitted of general right, must not involve any collateral violation of law or of duty to the State or to fellow-citizens. "The laws do not admit," says Mr. Jefferson, "that "the bare commission of crime amounts, of itself, to a "divestment of the character of citizen, and withdraws "the criminal from their coercion," (Letter to Mr. Morris, August 16, 1793. American State Papers, Foreign Relations, vol. i. p. 169).

This remark of Mr. Jefferson's is the more significant, inasmuch as he applied it to the very case of alleged emigration as the cover of acts in violation of the neutrality of the United States.

But here debate opens. The Government of the United States commenced with successful revolution; it was organized on the hypothesis of allowing the largest range to individual volition compatible with public safety; the people of the United States are composed of emigrants from Europe, most of whom expatriated themselves in order to escape from oppression, or, if you please, legal impediments to personal action, in the countries of their birth,—and many of whom were the actors and the victims of revolutions or of civil wars. Thus it happens that the sympathies of the people of the United States, and to a certain degree their laws, tend to admit full freedom of expatriation, under all circumstances, where the inducement is political opinion or action.

Accordingly, the United States, while readily entering into treaty stipulations with foreign Governments for the reciprocal extradition of persons accused of mere municipal offences, have never conceded, and, of course, never asked the extradition of persons accused of political offences, or other acts in derogation of mere allegiance.

Meanwhile, in matters akin to this in principle, though apparently distinct, the legislators and the courts of the United States have exhibited much uncertainty of opinion, consequent on the popular assumption of a theory of unlimited right of emigration, and the undeniable difficulty of reconciling that theory to some of the exigencies of public security and peace.

For the preservation of the neutrality of the United States, we have enacted laws which forbid foreign recruitments in the country, or the equipment of expeditions therein, by land or sea, for the purpose of hostilities against any Government with which the United States are at peace. These enactments proceed on the sound hypothesis that the right of war belongs only to States, not to individuals. These enactments also recognize the fact that no country can permit its inhabitants to make war on the inhabitants of another country, without giving just umbrage to the latter, violating the principles of natural justice and of international law, and thus in the end superinducing war between the two Governments. Nothing can be plainer than the position that the body politic should determine the question of peace or war through its appointed agents, legislative or executive. And no Government, which respects its own dignity, or desires to maintain its independence and sovereignty, will suffer unauthorized individuals to wield at will this the highest of all the political functions of a State.

The remarks of Mr. Jefferson are pertinent and conclusive on this point. In a despatch of his already quoted, he says:—

* * "If one citizen has a right to go to war of his own authority, every citizen has the same. If every citizen has that right, then the nation (which is composed of all its citizens) has a right to go to war, by the authority of its individual citizens. But this is not true, either on the general principles of society, or by our Constitution, which gives that power to Congress alone, and not to the citizens individually. Then the first position was not true, and no citizen has a right to go to war of his own authority; and for what he does without right he ought to be punished.

"Indeed, nothing can be more obviously absurd, than to say all the citizens may be at war, and yet the nation at peace." (Ubi supra, p. 161.)

Of course, laws of this description are just in themselves and conformable to reason; and, as such, have been constantly maintained by the United States.

In this condition of the law, a case of prize, in which one of the questions was whether the capture was invalidated by reason of the cruiser having been fitted out in the United States, in violation of law, came up for adjudication in the Supreme Court of the United States; and, as incidental to this question, there was elaborate discussion, at the bar, of the right of expatriation, induced by the fact that the commander of the cruiser assumed, as preparation for that command, to have renounced his allegiance to the United States. (Talbot v. Janson, iii. Dallas' Rep. p. 383.)

It clearly appeared in the case that the cruiser was armed and fitted out in fraud of the law; and for that reason the prize was restored to her owners. Two of the judges, Chief Justice Rutledge and Justice Wilson, rested on this point, with but brief allusion to the question of expatriation; but the other three spoke of this in terms not to be mistaken.

Justice Patterson made the significant remark, "It is "an obvious principle, that an act of illegality can "never be construed into an act of emigration or "expatriation. At that rate, treason and emigration, "or treason and expatriation, would, in certain cases, "be synonymous terms."

To which he added the query, "Can that emigration "be legal and justifiable which commits or endangers "the neutrality, peace, or safety of the nation of which "the emigrant is a member?"

Justice Cushing calls attention to the necessity of proving the bonâ fides of an alleged act of expatriation; which is the more essential in the case of persons who engage in illegal military enterprises under the guise of emigration, and who do not, in purpose or fact, renounce their allegiance to their native Government, and do not hesitate to claim its protection when they become involved in difficulties by reason of their illegal undertaking.

But Justice Iredell entered fully into the general merits of the subject, as follows:—

"That a man ought not to be a slave; that he should not be confined, against his will, to a particular spot, because he happened to draw his first breath upon it; that he should not be compelled to continue in a society to which he is accidentally attached, when he can better his situation elsewhere, much less when he must starve in one country, and may live comfortably in another; are positions which I hold as strongly as any man, and they are such as most nations in the world appear clearly to recognise.

"The only difference of opinion is, as to the proper manner of executing this right.

"Some hold that it is a natural, unalienable right in each individual; that it is a right upon which no act of legislation can lawfully be exercised, inasmuch as a legislature might impose dangerous restraints upon it; and, of course, it must be left to every man's will and pleasure to go off, when, and in what manner he pleases.

"This opinion is deserving of more deference, because it appears to have the sanction of the Constitution of this State (Pennsylvania), if not of some other States in the Union.

"I must, however, presume to differ from it, for the following reasons:—

"1. It is not the exercise of a natural right in which the individual is to be considered as alone concerned. As every man is entitled to claim rights in society, which it is the duty of the society to protect, he, in his turn, is under a solemn obligation to discharge all those duties faithfully which he owes, as a citizen, to the society of which he is a member, and, as a man, to the several members of the society, individually, with whom he is associated. Therefore, if he has been in the exercise of any public trust, for which he has not fully accounted, he ought not to leave the society until he has accounted for it. If he owes money, he ought not to quit the country and carry all his property with him, without leave of his creditors. Many other cases might be put, showing the importance of the public having some hold of him, until he has fairly performed all those duties which remain unperformed, before he can honestly abandon the society for ever. But, it is said, his ceasing to be a citizen does not deprive the public, or any individual of it, of remedies in these respects. Yet, the right of emigration is said to carry with it the right of removing his family and effects. What hold have they of him afterwards?

"2. Some writers on the subject of expatriation say a man shall not expatriate in a time of war, so as to do a prejudice to his country. But, if it be a natural unalienable right, upon the footing of mere private will, who can say this shall not be exercised in time of war as well as in time of peace, since the individual upon that principle is to think of himself only? I therefore think, with one of the gentlemen for the defendant, that the principle goes to a state of war as well as peace, and it must involve a time of the greatest public calamity as well as the profoundest tranquillity.

"3. The very statement of an exception in time of war shows that the writers on the law of nations, upon the subject in general, plainly mean, not that it is a right to be always exercised without the least restraint of his own will and pleasure, but that it is a reasonable and moral right, which every man ought to be allowed to exercise, with no other limitation than such as the public safety or interest requires, to which all private rights ought and must for ever give way.

"And if in any Government principles of patriotism and public good ought to predominate over mere private inclination, surely they ought to do so in a Republic founded on the very basis of equal rights, to be perfectly enjoyed in every instance where the public good does not require a restraint.

" 4. In some instances, even in time of war, expatriation may fairly be permitted. It ought not then to be restrained. But who is to permit it? The Legislature surely, the constant guardian of the public interest where a new law is to be made or an old one dispensed with. If they may take cognizance in one instance (as, for example, in time of war) because the public safety may require it, why not in any other instance, where the public safety for some unknown cause may equally require it? Upon the eve of a war it may be still more important to exercise it, as we often see in case of embargoes.

" 5. The supposition that the power may be abused is of no importance if the public good require its exercise. This feverish jealousy is a passion that can never be satisfied. No man denies the propriety of the Legislature having a taxative power. Suppose it should be seriously objected to, because the Legislature might tax to the amount of 19s. to the pound. They have the power, but does any man fear the exercise of it? A Legislature must possess every power necessary to the making of laws. When constructed as ours is, there is no danger of any material abuse. But a Legislature must be weak to the extremest verge of folly to wish to retain any man as a citizen whose heart and affections are fixed on a foreign country in preference to his own. They would naturally wish to get rid of him as soon as they could, and therefore, perhaps, the proper precaution would be to restrain acts of banishment (if such could be at all permitted) rather than to limit the Legislative control over expatriation. But is there no danger of abuse on the other side? Have not all the contentions about expatriation in the courts arisen from a want of the exercise of this very authority? For if the Legislature had prescribed a mode, every one would know whether it had or had not been pursued, and all rights, private as well as public, would be equally guarded; but upon the present doctine no rights are secured but those of the expatriator himself. I, therefore, have no doubt that, when the question is in regard to a citizen of any country whose Constitution has not prohibited the exercise of the Legislative power in this instance, it not only is a proper instance in which it may be exercised, but it is the duty of the Legislature to make such provision, and for my part I have always thought the Virginia Assembly showed a very judicious foresight in this particular.

It is impossible to misapprehend the general effect of the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Iredell. It disaffirms unlimited right of expatriation. It reserves all the rights of the State in the premises. (Serjeant's Constitutional Law, p. 319.)

Indeed when this case first made its appearance in the Admiralty Court of the State of South Carolina, under all the influences of local sympathies to bias him, the Judge (Bee) in maintaining the right of expatriation and emigration expressly adds the conditions " Where " no legal prohibition exists, and no prejudice is done " thereby." (Jansen v. The Christina Magdalena, Bee's Rep., pp. 11, 23.)

This was in the year 1794. In the year 1799 the same question recurred, but under different circumstances. Indictment was found in the proper Court of the United States against a person, a natural citizen of the United States, charged with acts of hostility against a foreign Government, who pleaded that he had expatriated himself, and become the subject of the belligerent State in whose service he committed the acts of hostility. But the plea was overruled by the Court (Chief Justice Ellsworth), and the party was convicted and sentenced. (The United States v. Williams, ii. Cranch's Rep., p. 82, note.)

In this case the Chief Justice said, and said truly, that the political society, that is, the whole body of the citizens associated in a government, had rights as well as its individual citizens; and that the latter had no rights to be enjoyed to the destruction of the whole society. He also said with truth that " The most " visionary writers on this subject do not contend for " the principle in the unlimited extent that a citizen " may at any and at all times renounce his own, and " join himself to a foreign country." These views it is clear are in accordance with the spirit and letter of the existing laws of the States of Virginia and Kentucky.

The opinion expressed by the Chief Justice on this occasion was much criticised at the time; but with the less reason, considering, as the facts in the case indicate, that the party assumed foreign allegiance only for the special purpose, and then returned to reclaim his ancient rights as a citizen of the United States.

No laws in any country would be capable of execution if men were allowed to oscillate thus between different allegiances, at the dictate of caprice or self-interest.

There was another act of Congress, in the execution of which questions of the same class came once again before the Supreme Court of the United States.

During the partial estrangement which occurred, between the United States and the French Republic at the close of the last century, an act of Congress was passed, which for the time being prohibited all commercial intercourse with France on the part of persons resident within the United States, or under their protection; and subjected to forfeiture all vessels employed in the prohibited commerce, and belonging to persons residing in the United States, or to citizens thereof residing elsewhere. It contained other provisions in the same spirit not material to the present question.

While such was the law a vessel was captured, and came before the courts of the United States for adjudication under circumstances which raised the question whether her owner fell within the scope of persons to whom commerce with France was prohibited.

This person was born in the State of Connecticut before it became independent of Great Britain, and thus might, perhaps, have claimed the rights of citizenship in the United States. But he went to the Danish island of St. Bartholomew's at an early age, married, and was domiciled there, and became a subject of Denmark.

Upon these facts, the whole question of expatriation passed in review before the Supreme Court. The Court, by Chief Justice Marshall, disposed of it in these words: " Jared Shattuck, having been born within the United States, and not being proved to have expatriated himself according to any form prescribed by law, is said to remain a citizen, entitled to the benefit and subject to the disabilities imposed upon American citizens; and, therefore, to come expressly within the description of the act which comprehends American citizens residing elsewhere.

" Whether a person born within the United States, or becoming a citizen according to the established laws of the country, can divest himself absolutely of that character, otherwise than in such manner as may be prescribed by the law, is a question which it is not necessary at present to decide. The cases cited at bar, and the arguments drawn from the general conduct of the United States on this interesting question, seem completely to establish the principle that an American citizen may acquire, in a foreign country, the commercial privileges attached to his domicil, and be exempted from the operation of an Act expressed in such general terms as that now under consideration. Indeed, the very expressions of the act would seem to exclude a person under the circumstances of Jared Shattuck. He is not a person under the protection of the United States. The American citizen, who goes into a foreign country, although he owes local and temporary allegiance to that country, is yet, if he performs no other act changing his condition, entitled to the protection of our Government, and if, without the violation of any municipal law, he should be oppressed unjustly, he would have a right to claim that protection, and the interposition of the American Government in his favour would be considered a justifiable interposition. But his situation is completely changed, where, by his own act, he has made himself the subject of a foreign power. Although this act may not be sufficient to rescue him from punishment for any crime committed against the United States, a point not intended to be decided, yet it certainly places him out of the protection of the United States while within the territory of the sovereign to whom he has sworn allegiance, and consequently takes him out of the description of the act.

" It is, therefore, the opinion of the Court, that the 'Charming Betsy,' with her cargo, being at the time of her recapture the bonâ fide property of a Danish burgher, is not forfeitable in consequence of her being employed in carrying on trade and commerce with a French island." (Murray v. Schooner " Charming Betsy," ii. Cranch, pp. 64, 119.)

It is observable, that the Court carefully abstain from asserting any unlimited right of expatriation. Nor was any such right pretended among the eminent counsel Messrs. Key, Alexander J. Dallas, and Martin, who argued the case. On the contrary, it was conceded on all hands, in the words of Mr. Dallas, " that a man " cannot expatriate himself unless it be done in a fit " time, with fairness of intention, and publicity of " act."

At the commencement of the last war between the United States and Great Britain, this question again presented itself, in two cases of great interest, where, however, the main question being of the effect of commercial domicil on the national character, the doctrine of expatriation was touched only, without being elucidated. (The Venus, viii. Cranch, p. 253: the Francis, ibid, p. 335.) In each of these cases, the party concerned was a native of Great Britain, who, after coming to the United States and being naturalized here, returned to Great Britain, and there resided at the time of the declaration of war. Laying aside all consideration, either of naturalization or of expatriation, the Supreme Court, in discussing the effect of their commercial domicil in the enemy's country, conceded to them, for the argument's sake, all the rights of native Americans.

Soon after this, in a question of the ownership of a vessel as bearing upon the question of domestic or foreign bottom, Mr. Justice Washington said:—

"I do not mean to moot the question of expatriation, founded on the self-will of a citizen, because it is entirely beside the business before the Court. It may suffice for the present to say, that I must be more enlightened on this subject than I have yet been, before I can admit that a citizen of the United States can throw off his allegiance to his country without some law authorizing him to do so." (United States v. Gillies, i. Peters' C. C. Rep. p. 159, 161.)

Finally, at a later period, the same question came before the Supreme Court, and was argued by eminent counsel, including Mr. Tazewell and Mr. Webster, in exposition of a clause of the existing Treaty between the United States and Spain, which prohibits the citizens or subjects of the respective Contracting Parties from taking commissions to cruise in private-armed vessels against the other, under penalty of being considered pirates. On this occasion, Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the Court, made the following observations:—

"This view of the question renders it unnecessary to consider another, which has been discussed at the bar, respecting what is denominated the right of expatriation. It is admitted by Captain Chayton, in the most explicit manner, that, during this whole period, his wife and family have continued to reside at Baltimore; and, so far as this fact goes, it contradicts the supposition of any real change of his own domicil. Assuming, for the purposes of argument, that an American citizen may, independently of any Legislative Act to this effect, throw off his own allegiance to his native country—as to which we give no opinion—it is perfectly clear that this cannot be done without a bonâ fide change of domicil, under circumstances of good faith. It can never be asserted as a cover for fraud, or as a justification for the commission of a crime against the country, or for a violation of its laws, when this appears to be the intention of the Act. It is unnecessary to go into a further examination of this doctrine; and it will be sufficient to ascertain its precise nature and limits when it shall become the leading point of a judgment of the Court." (The Santissima Trinidad, vii. Wheaton, pp. 283, 357.)

There is one other important relation of the subject, in which it has come before the Supreme Court of the United States, and that is in the discussion of questions of allegiance as bearing on the rights of property of persons, who, though natives of the United States, yet left the country on its revolutionary separation from Great Britain. It is the celebrated question of the antenati, discussed in Calvin's case (vii. Co. R., p. 18 b), and previously determined by Bracton. (De Legibus Angliæ, fol. 427 b.)

In disposing of such cases, the Supreme Court has occasionally, and at a relatively late time, referred to the question in very expressive language. Thus in one of them, Justice Thompson assumes that "allegiance may "be dissolved by the mutual consent of the Government "and its citizens and subjects" (Inglis v. Sailors' Snug Harbour, iii. Peter's R., pp. 99, 125); and in another, Justice Story says, "The general doctrine is, that no "persons can, by any act of their own, without the "consent of the Government, put off their allegiance "and become aliens." Shanks v. Dupont, Ibid. pp. 242, 247.)

Here, in so far as regards the views of the Supreme Court or its members, the matters stands,—unadjudicated as decision, but not undetermined as opinion. After carefully reviewing the whole subject, Chancellor Kent pronounces the better opinion to be, that a citizen cannot renounce his allegiance to the United States without permission of the Government, to be declared by law. (Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 49.) It is a significant fact, at all events, that, on so many occasions when the question presented itself, not one of the judges of the Supreme Court has affirmed, while others have emphatically denied the unlimited right of expatriation from the United States.

This exposition of the opinions on the question of the right of expatriation by the judicial authorities of the United States would be incomplete without some brief statement of what has occurred on the subject in the Courts of the States.

Observations on the subject occur in sundry cases of the class already spoken of, where the main question was of land belonging to persons who were born in the United States before their separation from Great Britain, but adhered to the mother country. As the law of England maintains the unalterable perpetuity of allegiance,—and, as that of England, transmitted to many of the States of the Union, denies the capacity of aliens to hold lands,—the question of citizenship repeatedly came before the Courts in the early years of the Republic.

In such a case in the State of Massachusetts, its Supreme Court, by Chief Justice Parsons, say:—

"Protection and allegiance are reciprocal. The Sovereign cannot refuse his protection to any subject, nor discharge him from his allegiance against his consent; and he will remain a subject, unless disfranchised as a punishment for some crime. So, on the other hand, he can never discharge himself from his allegiance to his Sovereign, unless the protection which is due to him from the laws is unjustly denied him." (Ainslie v. Martin, vi. Mass. R., p. 460.)

Here, a most important condition of the rightfulness of the claim of society, as against the citizen, is indicated,—namely that the laws of the country afford him due protection.

In a case of the same character in the State of Pennsylvania, her Supreme Court, by Chief Justice Tilghman, speaks of a "principle not compatible with the Constitution of Pennsylvania or her sister States; that is to "say, that no man can, even for the most pressing reasons, divest himself of the allegiance under which he "was born." (Jackson v. Burns, iii. Binney's R., pp. 75, 85.)

Allusions to the point as being yet unsettled, occur in the State of Alabama, in a case where distinction between emigration and expatriation is well suggested. (Beavers v. Smith, Alabama Reports, N.S. vol. xi., pp. 20, 29.)

The doctrine is touched, also, in several cases involving matrimonial rights, as affected by domicil or citizenship; but without any result of importance. (See Bishop on Marriage, b. vii.)

But, of the cases in the several States, those adjudged by the Courts of Virginia and Kentucky are the most important, because of the special laws of those two States on the subject of citizenship; and these cases also possess intrinsic interest.

Controversy arose in the State of Virginia, in a matter not material to be here explained, which presented the immediate question of expatriation from the State, but involved in argument that of expatriation generally. (Murray v. McCarty, ii. Mumford's R., p. 393.)

In this case, Judge Cabell, with concurrence of his associates of the court, affirms the general right of expatriation in these words:—

"Nature has given to all men the right of relinquishing the society, in which birth or accident may have thrown them, and of seeking subsistence and happiness elsewhere; and it is believed that this right of emigration, or expatriation, is one of those inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity. But, although municipal laws cannot take away or destroy this great right, they may regulate the manner, and prescribe the evidence of its exercise; and in the absence of these regulations, juris positivi, the right must be exercised according to the principles of general law." (Ibid. pp. 396, 397.)

The same judge suggests reasonable doubt of the effect of that provision of the law of Virginia, which requires a formal declaration of the purpose of change of citizenship. "If," he says, "arguments drawn from "the long and uniform practice of a country are ever "allowed to have any influence on a question concerning "the construction of its laws, they might here be urged "with much force. For, of the innumerable emigrants "from Virginia, who have overspread the Southern and "Western States and Territories, and filled their highest "offices, it is believed that not one has ever deemed it "necessary to conform to our Act concerning expatriation. Are they still citizens of the State?" (Ibid. p. 399.)

And he adds expression of opinion, that, "if a citizen "of Virginia shall have departed out of this Common" wealth with an open and avowed, fair and bonâ fide,

" intention of quitting it, and of becoming a citizen of " some other State, and shall, in fact, have become a " citizen thereof, that, from thenceforth, he ceased to be
" a citizen of Virginia, notwithstanding he may have
" omitted to comply with the requisites of our Expatria-
" tion Act." (Ibid. p. 400.)

Judge Roane, another member of the court, dwells on the important fact of the difference between citizenship of a State and that of the United States; the consideration of which leads him to say, among other things:

" I entirely subscribe to the doctrine that the situation of America, in this particular, is new, and may produce new and delicate questions; that we have sovereignties moving within sovereignties; that allegiance to a particular State is one thing, and that to the United States is another; that a renunciation of the former allegiance does not draw after it a renunciation of the latter; and that a statute of the United States on the subject of expatriation is much wanted." (Ibid. 403.)

And the same distinction draws after it the following reflection:

" The power of expatriation, in relation to the Commonwealth of Virginia, is one, with which Congress had certainly nothing to do; it is not granted in the instrument of Government; and it is a fundamental principle in our system, that each State retains every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States. The power of legislation on the subject of expatriation from the Commonwealth of Virginia, has not and ought not to have been given up by Virginia, to the United States." (Ibid. p. 405.)

As to which, it may be observed, that, undoubtedly, the State of Virginia may determine who is a citizen of that State, in relation to any matter of the proper jurisdiction of the State, but not in matters of the jurisdiction of the United States. The question of citizenship, for instance, as affecting the right to hold lands in the State, the State itself may decide, without interference on the part of the United States. Not so, in regard to federal citizenship.

Indeed, in one great class of cases, that of suits in the courts of the United States by the citizens of one State against the citizens of another, as provided for by the Constitution, it has been adjudged that mere simple removal to one State from another, and residence in the former, constitutes a change of citizenship in that respect within the meaning of the Constitution and the Acts of Congress. (Cooper v. Galbraith, iii. Washington's C.C.R., p. 546; Case v. Clark, v. Mason's R., p. 70.) The party must of course be otherwise a citizen of the United States. (Gassies v. Ballon, vi. Peters 761.)

Finally, the members of the court affirm, with one accord, that, conceding the right of expatriation, however regulated, its effective exercise depends on the completeness, publicity, and good faith of the assumed act of expatriation.

Views to the same effect, in substance, appear to have been entertained by the courts of the State of Kentucky. In one case, to be sure, the court merely refer to this matter as a " litigated question," and refuse to pass upon it without necessity. (Brooks v. Clay, iii. A. K. Marshall's R., p. 545. See S. C., Shearer v. Clay, i. Littell's R. p. 261.) But, in a later case, the Court of Appeals of that State, by Chief Justice Robertson, met the great question directly, and placed it on what are, in my judgment, its true foundations.

In the first place, the court construe the law of Virginia reasonably, suggesting that the mode of expatriation, proscribed by that law, is very proper, but " is not, of " course, the only admissible or satisfactory evidence of " the fact that the admitted right has been exercised."

In the second place, the court say:

" Whatever may be the speculative or practical doctrine of feudal governments or ages,—allegiance, in these United States, whether local or national, is, in our judgment, altogether conventional, and may be repudiated by the native as well as adopted citizen, with the presumed concurrence of the government, without its formal or express sanction. Expatriation may be considered a practical and fundamental doctrine of America. American history, American institutions, and American legislation, all recognise it. It has grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength. The political obligations of the citizen, and the interests of the Republic, may forbid a renunciation of allegiance by his mere volition or declaration, at any time, and under all circumstances. And, therefore, the government, for the purpose of preventing abuse and securing the public welfare, may regulate the mode of expatriation. But when it has not prescribed any limitation on the right, and the citizen has, in good faith, abjured his country, and become a subject or citizen of a foreign nation, he should, as to his native government, be considered as denationalized, especially so far as his civil rights may be involved, and, at least, so long as that government shall seem to acquiesce in his renunciation of his political rights and obligations."—(Alsberry v. Hawkins, ix. Dana's R., p. 177.)

These are intelligent views:—expatriation a general right, subject to regulation of time and circumstance according to public interests; and the requisite consent of the State presumed where not negatived by standing prohibitions.

In conclusion of this part of the subject, it seems proper to add, that the juridical authorities of the United States admit that a party may by his own act be subject to the conflicting obligations of two different allegiances. (United States v. Williams, ii. Cranch, p. 82, note; Ainslie v. Martin, ix. Massachusetts R., p. 453; Sergeant's Constitutional Law, p. 319.)

A meritorious writer on constitutional law (Mr. Rawle), has devoted some pages to the discussion of the question. He maintains, with reason, that no such thing as absolute or indefeasible right of expatriation exists, any more than absolute or indefeasible right of allegiance; and suggests consideration of the distinction between mere emigration, involving question of domicil only, and expatriation, involving of necessity change of allegiance. (Rawle on the Constitution, ch. 9. See also Duer's Lectures, p. 302.)

Another legal commentator has been disposed to affirm, with more absoluteness, the right of expatriation, and with perhaps insufficient regard for the contingent rights of the State. (Tucker's Blackstone, vol. ii. pt. 2. p. 90.)

There is a small, but well-written treatise on the question by Mr. Hay, elicited by the circumstances in which the second war between the United States and Great Britain originated, and which involved, among other things, extravagant assertions of the doctrine of indefeasible allegiance, as against British emigrants to the United States.

In truth, opinion in the United States has been at all times a little coloured on the subject by necessary opposition to the assumption of Great Britain to uphold the doctrine of indefeasible allegiance, and in terms to prohibit expatriation. Hence we have been prone to regard it hastily as a question between kings and their subjects. It is not so. The true question is of the relation between the political society and its members, upon whatever hypothesis of right, and in whatever form of organization, that society may be constituted.

The assumption of a natural right of emigration, without possible restriction in law, can be defended only by maintaining that each individual has all possible rights against society, and the society none with respect to the individual; that there is no social organization, but a mere anarchy of elements, each wholly independent of the other, and no otherwise consociated save than by their casual co-existence in the same territory. (Ahrens, Droit Natural, p. 324.)

Accordingly through all the diversities of opinion respecting the question, the true doctrine of our law is readily distinguishable, as it appears to me, and is not in contradiction with jurisprudence, theoretical or positive, of the enlightened nations of Europe.

If we cursorily inspect the existing laws of different countries, we discern in them three aspects of the main question.

In Great Britain the professed theory and the actual law combine to prohibit expatriation in terms. (Act of 3 James I., cap. 4.) In practice, however, emigration is permitted, nay encouraged. And, on the other hand, the most striking negation of the indefeasibility of allegiance as a principle, is afforded by the Act of Parliament of 7 and 8 Victoria, cap. 66, which makes permanent a general provision for the naturalization of aliens in Great Britain. (See Bowyer's Const. Law of England, p. 406.) Thus it is that the jurisprudence of England, little capable of generalization, asserts an assumed rule of public law, or denies it, according to the caprices of apparent local interest; and her diplomacy, with characteristic inconsequence and partiality of thought, upholds abroad, while it repudiates at home, the saying of the great republican jurisconsult, civitas carcer non est. (Bynkershoek, Quæst. J. Pub. lib i. cap. 22.)

The singularity of the law of England consists in the doctrine, that, as explained by Sir William Blackstone, a natural subject cannot by any possibility or for any reason cease to be a subject, save by the permission of his liege lord. (Blackstone's Com. vol. i, p. 369.) And this, adds Blackstone, is a "principle of universal law;" in support of which strange assertion he cites,—not any of the great authorities of universal or public law,—all of whom, as we shall presently see, maintain the contrary, but a common lawyer of his own country, namely, Sir Matthew Hale. (Pleas of the Crown, vol. i, p. 68.) And a very modern commentator on the laws of England (Mr. Anstey) adheres to the doctrine, applying to every Englishman who leaves the country, the phrase of amittit regnum sed non regem. (Lectures on the Laws of England, p. 94.)

In other countries, the party emigrating contrary to law may lose the civil rights of his birthplace, and become liable to forfeitures of a local description, but without drawing upon himself the extreme consequences involved in the doctrine of the laws of England.

Thus, the Code Napoleon provides, that, "The quality "of Frenchmen will be lost: 1, by naturalization acquired "in a foreign country; 2, by the acceptance, without "authority of the government, of public functions con- "ferred by a foreign government; 3, by establishment in "a foreign country without purpose of return." (Art. 17.) It also provides the means of recovering the lost quality, except in the case of the party bearing arms against his country. (Art. 18, 20, 21.) There are several decrees, one of the reign of Louis XIV., and two of that of Napoleon I., which add confiscations and loss of civil rights, as the penalty of any Frenchman expatriating himself without public authority. But some doubt exists whether these decrees are now in force, and at any rate they are not so, as respects the provision of confiscation: the doctrine of the general right of expatriation being maintained in France. (Dalloz, Dic. Jur. voc. Droit Civil, 53.)

Spain and the Spanish American Republics contemplate and provide for voluntary expatriation. (Escriche, Dic, sub. vocc. Espanol, Natural.)

It is a curious fact, that, at the time when Bynckershoek wrote, the Governments, which prohibited expatriation under penalties, were Great Britain, Russia, France, and China. (Quæst. Juris. Publ. lib. i. cap. 22.)

Then, as now, expatriation was lawful in Spain; as it now is in the Spanish American Republics. (Escriche, ubi, supra.) And the public policy of Spain has never been otherwise in this relation. (Dou, Derecho Publico, lib. i, tit. 7.)

But the most explicit and complete enactments on the subject, are those of some of the States uf the Germanic Confederation. I take as example the legislation of Austria and Prussia.

In each of these countries emigration is permitted by law, but regulated. In neither of them can expatriation take place legally in evasion of military duty. In both special conditions apply to the time of war. In Prussia permission to emigrate is not refused unless for prescribed causes, appertaining to military or civil obligations: in Austria it may be refused at discretion. In Prussia ten years residence in a foreign country, with some exceptions, effects the result of expatriation: this provision is omitted in Austria. Of each eystem, the common and essential feature is a standing provision for emigration on application to the public authorities. (Decree of the Emperor Francis I., of March 24, 1832: Circular of King Frederick William, of December 31, 1842.)

In the United States, as we have seen, there is no provision of federal law which defines citizenship; and none which expressly forbids or expressly authorizes the expatriation of citizens of the United States.

On several occasions, when the question was before Congress, doubts were suggested whether the Federal Government has power to legislate on the subject. I cannot perceive the force of these doubts. Citizenship is a federal qualification for the tenure of office, and for the enjoyment of many other rights under the Constitution of the Union. What constitutes citizenship of the United States cannot be determined by the several States. If they were to undertake it, they would be found to differ radically and irreconcilably in the matter. If Congress cannot do it then the Union is in the singular predicament of the constitutional impossibility of ascertaining who compose it, who may be its President, Senators, and Representatives. No such impossibility exists. When Congress enacts that only citizens of the United States are competent to do certain things, it may well proceed to say, if it choose, who the persons thus designated are, and to define them by classes or description of inclusion or exclusion. If it could not say this directly, and by systematic definition, in the way other nations do, it could say it indirectly by acts of penalty; it could say what are the circumstances of time or manner in which the act of emigration would or would not deprive an American of rights, or subject him to penalties and forfeitures. But the idea that citizenship, or the loss of it, cannot be defined by Congress, is one of the lingering prejudices of the common law, which relies upon judicial exposition to deduce general rules from particular cases, instead of laying down general rules by previous legislative survey of the subject matter. Thus it is that Congress leaves this question to the fortuitous occurrence of some judicial contingency, in which it may be definitely disposed of by decision of the Supreme Court.

In the absence of such a decision, we are compelled to reason out a conclusion in the premises, with aid of analogies of our own or of the public law applicable thereto.

The doctrine of absolute and perpetual allegiance—the root of the denial of any right of emigration—is inadmissible in the United States. It was a matter involved in, and settled for us by, the Revolution, which founded the American Union.

Moreover, the right of expatriation, under fit circumstances of time and of manner, being expressly asserted in the legislation of several of the States, and confirmed by decisions of their Courts, must be considered as thus made a part of the fundamental public law of the United States.

Most of the jurisconsults and judges, who have had occasion to discuss the subject, admit, as we see, either directly or indirectly, that it is a question of circumstances and conditions.

The admissibility of change of allegiance in the United States without necessary express co-operation of the foreign government, is implied by the naturalization acts, which require conditions of residence, of personal character, of publicity, and of actual abjuration of the foreign allegiance, as indispensable to the consummation of an act of expatriation.

I think, in consideration of these premises, that the omission of the federal laws to enact any express or specific restraints on expatriation, is tacit or implied consent, subject only to such conditions of good faith, of discharge of subsisting obligations to the society left, and of consummated expatriation in fact, as the principles of international right require to be observed.

As a question of natural right, emigration belongs to the general category of those elements of individual happiness which every citizen is entitled to pursue, but in subordination, always to the general welfare. (Grotius, De Jure Bell, ac Pacis, lib. ii, ch. 5, no. 24; Wolff, Jus Naturæ, part vii, cap. i, s. 186, 187; Burlamaqui, Droit de la Nature, p. 2, ch. 5, s. 13; Almeda, Derecho Publico, tom. i, cap. 17).

The society cannot absolutely take away this right, but may regulate it in such way as to reconcile the interest of the individual and of the community. (Wolff, Jus Naturæ, pars viii, cap. 3, s. 415; Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. i, ch. 19, s. 10.)

In fine, the present state of the law of nations and of nature on this point is well stated by D. Antonio Riquelme, as follows:

"It is a recognized principle of the law of nations that all can change their primitive nationality, according to their convenience. This principle, admitted by all the world, and in virtue of which every individual may renounce the nationality which birth combined with parentage gives him, does not release him, who avails himself of it, of the obligations which he owes to his country; so that the citizen or subject, who, without authorization of his government, accepts the nationality of a foreign state, may be called upon for the performance of the personal charges imposed on him by his primitive country in the form which the laws establish. Thus, a deserter from the military service, who becomes naturalized in the state to which he flies, though not subject to extradition without special treaty authorizing it, if, nevertheless, he come within the jurisdiction of the authorities of his primitive country, cannot be reclaimed by his new one, but remains bound to fulfil the obligations of his service. While the law of nations concedes to individuals the liberty of changing their nationality, it also empowers a state to restrict this faculty in certain circumstances, as in case of war and others, in return for the services and protection, which it bestows on the citizen or subject; and when he changes his nationality in contempt of the laws, he gives occasion for the disregard of his new nationality." (Derecho Internacional, tom. i, p. 319).

In the absence of general prohibition, general consent of the state is presumed. "Vel si consenu expresso aut tacito." (Puffendorf, De Officio Hominis et Civis, lib. ii, cap. 18.) Or, in the words of Bynkershoek, "Si non sit lex quæ prohibeat, utique licet subditi conditionem exuere, et civitatem ut lubet mutare." (Quæstiones Juris Publici, lib. i, cap. 22).

Of course, the citizen cannot apply such implied consent to any act of pretended emigration, which is itself a violation otherwise of the law, either public or municipal, as in the case of illegal military enterprises; nor, by it, can he escape the punishment of crime or the performance of local contracts, nor appeal to it as a mask to cover desertion or treasonable aid of the public enemy. I am not prepared to say that the right of a citizen of the United States to expatriate himself, implied in the absence of any prohibition, may not be exercised in time of war; but, if so, it would have to be done with attendant circumstances clearly showing good faith, in order to be justifiable; and, it is not easy to see how citizenship could be transferred in time of war to the foreign enemy in such way as to escape reprehension, if the party should afterwards return to the United States.

And, whether in peace and war, the expatration would have to be an actual one, by foreign residence, and with authentic renunciation of the pre-existing citizenship. Under the circumstances and with the conditions thus indicated, and subject to such others as the public interest might seem to Congress to require to be imposed, it seems to me that the right of expatriation exists, and may be freely exercised by the citizens of the United States.

I have the honour to be, very respectfully,

Hon. William L. Marcy, Secretary of State. C. Cushing.

(B.)

United States Naturalization Act, 1802. Seventh Congress.—Session I.

Chap. xxviii.—An Act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the Acts heretofore passed on that subject.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any alien, being a free white person, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, or any of them, on the following conditions and not otherwise:

First, That he shall have declared on oath or affirmation, before the supreme, superior, district or circuit court of some one of the states, or of the territorial districts of the United States, or a circuit or district court of the United States three years at least, before his admission, that it was bonâ fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce for ever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, whereof such alien may at the time be a citizen or subject.

Secondly, That he shall, at the time of his application to be admitted, declare on oath or affirmation, before some one of the courts aforesaid, that he will support the constitution of the United States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof he was before a citizen or subject, which proceedings shall be recorded by the clerk of the court.

Thirdly, That the court admitting such alien shall be satisfied that he has resided within the United States five years at least, and within the state or territory where such court is at the time held one year at least, and it shall further appear to their satisfaction that during that time he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same. Provided, that the oath of the applicant shall, in no case, be allowed to prove his residence.

Fourthly, That in case the alien applying to be admitted to citizenship shall have borne any hereditary title, or been of any of the orders of nobility in the kingdom or state from which he came, he shall, in addition to the above requisites, make an express renunciation of his title or order of nobility in the court to which his application shall be made, which renunciation shall be recorded in the said court.

Provided, That no alien who shall be a native-born citizen, denizen, or subject of any country, state, or sovereign with whom the United States shall be at war at the time of his application, shall be then admitted to be a citizen of the United States. Provided also, that any alien who was residing within the limits or under the jurisdiction of the United States before the twenty-ninth day of January one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five may be admitted to become a citizen, on due proof made to some one of the courts aforesaid, that he has resided two years at least within and under the jurisdiction of the United States, and one year at least immediately preceding his application within the state or territory where such court is at the time held, and on his declaring on oath or affirmation that he will support the constitution of the Unired States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, state or soveignty whereof he was before a citizen or subject, and moreover on its appearing to the satisfaction of the court that during the said term of two years he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same; and where the alien applying for admission to citizenship shall have borne any hereditary title, or been of any of the orders of nobility in the kingdom or state from which he came, on his moreover making in the court an express renunciation of his title or orders of nobility, before he shall be entitled to such admission; all of which proceedings, required in this proviso to be performed in the court, shall be recorded by the clerk thereof: and provided also, that any alien who was residing within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States at any time between the said twenty-ninth day of January one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five and the eighteenth day of June one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, may within two years after the passing of this Act be admitted to become a citizen without a compliance with the first condition above specified.

Sec. 2. Provided also, and be it further enacted: That in addition to the directions aforesaid, all free white persons being aliens, who may arrive in the United States after the passing of this Act, shall in order to become citizens of the United States make registry and obtain certificates, in the following manner, to wit: Every person desirous of being naturalized shall, if of the age of twenty-one years, make report of himself, or if under the age of twenty-one years or held in service, shall be reported by his parent, guardian, master or mistress, to the clerk of the district court of the district where such alien or aliens shall arrive, or to some other court of record of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the same or of a particular state, and such report shall ascertain the name, birthplace, age, nation, and allegiance of each alien, together with the country whence he or she migrated, and the place of his or her intended settlement; and it shall be the duty of such clerk on receiving such report to record the same in his office, and to grant to the person making such report, and to each individual concerned therein, whenever he shall be required, a certificate under his hand and seal of office of such report and registry, and for receiving and registering each report of an individual or family he shall receive fifty cents; and for each certificate granted pursuant to this Act to an individual or family, fifty cents, and such certificate shall be exhibited to the court by every alien who may arrive in the United States after the passing of this Act on his application to be naturalized as evidence of the time of his arrival within the United States.

Sec. 3. And whereas doubts have arisen whether certain courts of record in some of the states are included within the description of district or circuit courts: Be it further enacted, that every court of record in an individual state, having common law jurisdiction and a seal and clerk or prothonotary, shall be considered as a district court within the meaning of this Act; and every alien who may have been naturalized in any such court shall enjoy, from and after the passing of the Act, the same rights and privileges as if he had been naturalized in a district or circuit court of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted: That the children of parents duly naturalized under any of the laws of the United States, or who, previous to the passing of any law on that subject by the government of the United States, may have become citizens of any one of the said states under the laws thereof, being under the age of twenty-one years at the time of their parents being so naturalized or admitted to the rights of citizenship, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens of the United States, and the children of persons who now are or have been citizens of the United States, shall, though born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, be considered as citizens of the United States: Provided, That the right of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers have never resided within the United States: Provided also, that no person heretofore proscribed by any state, or who has been legally convicted of having joined the army of Great Britain during the late war, shall be admitted a citizen as aforesaid, without the consent of the Legislature of the State in which such person was proscribed.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all Acts heretofore passed respecting naturalization, be and the same are hereby repealed.

Approved April 14, 1802.

PRACTICAL FORMS annexed to a Manual of the United States Naturalization Laws, published by an United States Barrister, 1855.

1. Declaration of Intention.

I, A. B., do declare on oath (or affirmation) that it is bonâ fide, my intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce for ever all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign Prince, Potentate, State, or Sovereignty whatever, and particularly to [here insert the name of the Prince, Potentate, State, or Sovereignty, whereof the alien may at the time be a citizen or subject].

A. B.

Sworn in open court, this day of , 18 ,
before me L. F. Clerk, of

2. Oath to support the Constitution.

I, A. B., do declare on oath (or affirmation) that I will support the constitution of the United States, and that I do entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign Prince, Potentate, State, or Sovereignty whatever, and particularly to [here insert the name of the Prince, Potentate, State, or Sovereignty, whereof the applicant was before a citizen or subject].

A. B.

Sworn in open court, this day of , 18 ,
before me L. F. Clerk, of

[If the applicant has borne any title or been of any order of nobility, he must also expressly renounce it.]

3. Oath of Citizens to prove Residence.

State of New York, County, S.S.
C. D., of , and E. F., of , being duly sworn, do severally depose, and each for himself says, that he is a citizen of the United States, that he is well acquainted with the aforesaid A. B.; that the said A. B. has resided for the last five years within the United States, and for one year past within the State of New York, and that during that time he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same.

C. D.
E. F.

Sworn in open court, this day of , 18 ,
before me L. F. Clerk, of

4. Certificate of Citizenship.

United States of America, State of ,
County, S.S.

Be it remembered, that on the day of ,
in the year one thousand eight hundred and ,
A.B., late of , in , now of ,
in the State of , aforesaid, appeared in the Court of , being a Court of Record, having common law jurisdiction and a seal and clerk, and applied to the said Court to be admitted to become a citizen of the United States of America, according to law: And the said A. B. having thereupon produced to the Court such evidence, taken such oath, and made such declaration and renunciations as are required by law: thereupon it was ordered by the said Court to be a citizen of the United States of America.

In testimony whereof, the seal of the said Court is hereunto affixed this day of 18 , and in the year of our independence

(L. S.) By the Court. L. F., Clerk.

(C.)

"ANN," SMITH.

This ship, under American colours, was seized in the River Thames, by the Marshal of the Admiralty, on the 1st of August 1812. A claim was given by the master, who was also sole owner of the ship, describing himself to be a British subject, and as such entitled to the benefit of the Order in Council of November 1812. directing the restitution of British ships under the American flag. It appeared that he was a native of Scotland, and that his wife and family resided in that country, but that he had himself been admitted a citizen of America about sixteen years ago, upon taking an oath that he had been sailing out of the American port for two years; that from the year 1799 till 1805, he had been connected with a house of trade at Glasgow, which had an establishment at New York, and another at Charlestown, and that he had occasionally resided at each of the last-mentioned places; that he had purchased this vessel at public auction in America, and had made three voyages in her, the two first from Charlestown to Kingston in Jamaica, returning each time in ballast, and the last from Charlestown to the River Thames. The question was, whether, from the residence and employment of this man, he was, quoad this vessel, to be considered as a British subject.

JUDGMENT.

Sir W. Scott.—This ship, when seized by the Marshal in the River Thames, was under the American flag but, according to the account given by the master, was not furnished with the American, or indeed with any pass whatever. It is very difficult to conceive that this was the true state of the case, since the ship was not only American-built, but likewise American owned, as far, at least, as the ostensible character of the claimant is concerned; for though he could not altogether throw off his allegiance to his native country, he had been admitted a citizen of the United States. I cannot conceive, therefore, why the pass was not granted, or what obstacle prevented this man from obtaining so important a document. I must presume that the vessel was furnished with an American pass; but, supposing the case to be otherwise, still, if the ship was furnished with the documents usually granted to American ships, the same rule of law must be applied as if she had been furnished with a regular flag and pass. The ship must be conclusively held to be American property and consequently subject to condemnation.

It is said, however, that this ship is protected by the Order in Council issued on the 28th of November 1812, by which it is directed "that all vessels under the flag of "the United States of America which are bonâ fide and "wholly the property of His Majesty's subjects, and not "purchased by them subsequent to the date of hostilities "on the part of the United States of America, and "which shall have been detained in port under the "embargo, or shall have sailed to or from the ports of "this kingdom previous to the knowledge of hostilities, "and shall have been captured on such voyage, shall be "restored to the British owners, upon satisfactory proof "being made to the High Court of Admiralty, or the "Courts of Vice-Admiralty, to which they shall be "taken for adjudication, that the said vessels are bonâ "fide and wholly the property of His Majesty's subjects "as aforesaid, and had been engaged in trade as above "described." A claim has been given for this ship by Mr. Smith, describing himself to be a British subject; and, if he is a British subject, he will, under this Order in Council, be entitled to restitution.

The question therefore, comes to this, whether the claimant is, quoad this property, to be considered a British subject. For some purposes he is undoubtedly so to be considered. He is born in this country, and is subject to all the obligations imposed upon him by his nativity. He cannot shake off his allegiance to his native country, or divest himself altogether of his British character by a voluntary transfer of himself to another country. For the mere purposes of trade he may, indeed, transfer himself to another State, and may acquire a new national character. An English subject, resident in a neutral state, is at liberty to trade with the enemy of this country in all articles, with the exception of those which are of a contraband nature: but a trade in such articles would be contrary to his allegiance. Now, the account which he gives of himself is, "that he "was born at Falkirk, in Scotland; that during the last " seven years he has been chiefly at sea, but, when at " home, he has lived, and still lives, at Bathgate, in the " shire of Linlithgow, in North Britain; that he is a " subject of our Sovereign Lord the King, but, about " sixteen years ago, he was admitted a citizen of the " United States of America, for the purpose of commerce " only." Why, this transaction is for the purpose of commerce. According to his own account, then, he ceased to be a British subject for commercial purposes. He goes on to say, that he was admitted "for the " purpose of covering a ship of his own, to enable her " to sail without risk of capture, and he was so admitted " by the magistrates of Philadelphia, on oath being " made that he had sailed out of an American port for " two years; that he hath never been admitted a " burgher or freeman of any city or town, but, from the " year 1799 to the year 1805, the deponent having been " connected in a house of trade at Glasgow, which had " a house at New York, and another at Charlestown in " South Carolina," so that, from 1799 to the year 1805, he might, as far as he was connected with the house at Glasgow, and for that particular branch of his trade, be considered a British subject. But since that time, I understand him to say that he has withdrawn altogether from that connection. He says afterwards, in answer to the ninth interrogatory, "that he is a North Briton by " birth, and, when he is at home, his place of residence " is Bathgate, in the shire of Linlithgow, in North " Britain, where his wife and family reside, and where " he the deponent hath always resided from the time he " was ten or eleven years of age, when he was not at sea " or in foreign parts." The affirmative part of his history, as far as it goes, shews that he lived very much abroad, and principally at New York or Charlestown in America. True it is that he had no house in either of these places, but he was there as a single man. It is not the mere circumstance of leaving a wife and family in Scotland that will avail him for the purpose of retaining the benefit of his national character. He cannot be permitted to take the advantage of both characters at the same time, and in the same adventure. The utmost that can be allowed to him is, that he should be entitled to the one character or the other, according to the circumstances of the transaction. When the vessel herself is American-built, when the personal residence of the owner, as far as he has any, is in America (for it does not appear that this man at all resided in Scotland), it would be difficult to say that it could be any other than an American transaction. Since the purchase of this ship by Mr. Smith, he has made three voyages, two of them to Kingston in Jamaica, and one to the port of London; but to the ports of Scotland he has never sailed, nor does it appear that he has even visited his wife and family in that country. He has been sailing constantly out of American ports, and his prevailing destination has been to the West India islands. It is quite impossible that he can be protected under the Order in Council, which applies only to those who are clearly and habitually British subjects, having no intermixture of foreign commercial character. It never could be the intention of His Majesty's Goverment that the benefit of this Order should be extended to a person who has thrown off his allegiance, and estranged himself from his British character, as far as his own volition and act could do. I am of opinion that Mr. Smith is not entitled to the benefit of the Order in Council, and therefore I reject the claim.—Ship condemned.

(D.)

Extrait des Minutes du Greffe du Tribunal Civil de première instance de l'Arrondissement de Wissembourg, Département du Bas Rhin.

Le Tribunal Civil de première instance de l'arrondissement de Wissembourg à rendu le Jugement suivant:—

Audience du vingt-cinq Avril, mil huit cent soixante:

Entre Michel Zeiter, cultivateur, domicilié aux Etats-Unis de l'Amérique, Demandeur, comparant par Maître Volpert, son avoué; Contre M. le Préfet du Bas Rhin, Défendeur.

Après avoir ouï à l'audience du vingt courant, les conclusions de M. de Ring, substitut du Procureur Impérial, et après en avoir délibéré en la Chambre du Conseil:

Attendu que les tribunaux sont compétents d'après l'Article vingt-six de la Loi du vingt-un Mars, mil huit cent trente-deux, pour décider les questions relatives à l'état ou aux droits civils des jeunes gens appelés à faire partie du contingent de l'armée; attendu que, d'après l'Article deux de la même Loi, nul ne peut être admis dans les troupes Françaises s'il n'est Français:

Que le Demandeur prétendant qu'il a perdu sa qualité de Français par sa naturalisation en pays étranger, il n'y a pas à s'inquiéter si cette naturalisation en pays étranger a eu lieu sans l'autorisation du Gouvernement Français, contrairement aux prescriptions du Decret du vingt-six Août, mil huit cent onze, mais seulement si, au moment actuel, le Demandeur est encore Français.

Attendu que le Demandeur rapporte un certificat constatant qu'il s'est présenté devant la Cour des Plaids Communs du Comté d'Essex, Etat de New Jersey, et a fait la demande d'être admis à devenir citoyen des Etats Unis d'Amerique, mais qu'il n'est pas justifié que cette formalité suffise pour conférer cette qualité; que le Tribunal doit exiger un supplément de renseignements, tel, par exemple, qu'une attestation du Consul des Etats Unis en France de reconnaissance du titre de citoyen des Etats Unis d'Amérique.

Par ces motifs, le Tribunal surseoit à statuer sur la demande jusqu'à ce que le Demandeur rapporte une attestation du Consul des Etats Unis en France, constatant qu'il a rempli toutes les formalités nécessaires pour devenir citoyen des Etats Unis, ou toute autre pièce justificative de sa nouvelle nationalité, et le condamne dès à présent aux dépens.

Jugé et prononcé à l'audience publique du Tribunal Civil de l'arrondissement de Wissembourg présents Messieurs Bardy, President; Lanth et Stoffel, Juges; et Richert, Procureur Impérial.

(Signé) N. Bardy, et
Vogt,
Commis Greffier.

Extrait des Minutes du Greffe du Tribunal Civil de première instance de l'Arrondissement de Wissembourg, Bas Rhin.

Le Tribunal Civil de première instance de l'arrondissement de Wissembourg a rendu le Jugement suivant:—

Audience du deux Juin, mil huit cent soixante:

Entre Michel Zeiter, cultivateur, domicilié aux Etats Unis d'Amérique, Demandeur, comparant par Maître Volpert, avoué; Contre M. le Préfet du Bas Rhin, Défendeur, représenté par M. le Procureur Impérial.

Après avoir ouï les conclusions respectives des parties, ainsi que celles du Ministère Public:

Attendu que, par la production du certificat qui lui a été delivré le vingt-huit Mai dernier, par le Consul des Etats Unis à Paris, et qui a été enregistré à Wissembourg aujourd'hui, le Demandeur a justifié qu'il est citoyen Américain:

Le Tribunal donne acte au Demandeur de ce que, par la production du dit certificat, il a satisfait au Jugement rendu en ce Siège le vingt-cinq Avril dernier.

En conséquence dit et reconnait que le Demandeur, Michel Zeiter, par sa naturalisation en pays étranger, a perdu la qualité de Français, et le condamne aux dépens.

Jugé et prononcé à l'audience publique du Tribunal Civil de l'arrondissement de Wissembourg: presents, Messieurs Bardy, Président; Lanth et Stoffel, Juges; et De Ring, substitut du Procureur Imperial.

(Signé) N. Bardy, et
Vogt,
Commis Greffier.

Note.—M. Treitt, who has procured the copy of this paper, states that the Judgment attracted little attention at the time it was given, and that it must not be accepted as a definitive exposition of French Law, on a point which, as he believes, is still open to controversy.

(E.)

Extracts of an Opinion of Mr. Attorney-General Bates, dated November 29, 1862.

Who is a citizen? What constitutes a citizen of the United States? I have often been pained by the fruitless search in our law books and the records of our Courts for a clear and satisfactory definition of the phrase citizen of the United States. I find no such definition, no authoritative establishment of the meaning of the phrase, neither by a course of judicial decision in our Courts nor by the continued and consentaneous action of the different branches of our political Government. For ought I see to the contrary, the subject is now as little understood in its details and elements, and the question as open to argument and to speculative criticism, as it was at the beginning of the Government. Eighty years of practical enjoyment of citizenship, under the Constitution, have not sufficed to teach us either the exact meaning of the word or the constituent elements of the thing we prize so highly.

In most instances, within my knowledge, in which the matter of citizenship has been discussed, the argument has not turned upon the existence and the intrinsic qualities of citizenship itself, but upon the claim of some right or privilege as belonging to and inhering in the character of citizen. In this way we are easily led into errors both of fact and principle. We see individuals, who are known to be citizens, in the actual enjoyment of certain rights and privileges, and in the actual exercise of certain powers, social and political, and we, inconsiderately, and without any regard to legal and logical consequences, attribute to those individuals, and to all of their class, the enjoyment of those rights and privileges and the exercise of those powers as incidents to their citizenship, and belonging to them only in their quality of citizens.

In such cases it often happens that the rights enjoyed and the powers exercised have no relation whatever to the quality of citizen, and might be as perfectly enjoyed and exercised by known aliens. For instance, General Bernard, a distinguished soldier and devoted citizen of France, for a long time filled the office of General of Engineers in the service of the United States, all the time avowing his French allegiance, and, in fact, closing his relations with the United States by resigning his commission and returning to the service of his own native country. This and all such instances (and they are many), go to prove that in this country the legal capacity to hold office is not confined to citizens, and therefore, that the fact of holding any office for which citizenship is not specially prescribed by law as a qualification is no proof that the incumbent is an American citizen.

Again, with regard to the right of suffrage, that is the right to choose officers of Government, there is a very common error to the effect that the right to vote for public officers is one of the constituent elements of American citizenship, the leading faculty indeed of the citizen, the test at once of this legal right, and the sufficient proof of his membership of the body politic. No error can be greater than this, and few more injurious to the right understanding of our Constitutions and the actual working of our political Governments. It is not only not true in law or in fact, in principle or in practice, but the reverse is conspicuously true; for I make bold to affirm that, viewing the nation as a whole, or viewing the States separately, there is no district in the nation in which a majority of the known and recognized citizens are not excluded by law from the right of suffrage. Besides those who are excluded specially on account of some personal defect, such as paupers, idiots, lunatics, and men convicted of infamous crimes, and, in some States, soldiers, all females and all minor males are also excluded. And these, in every community make the majority; and yet, I think, no one will venture to deny that women and children, and lunatics, and even convict felons may be citizens of the United States.

Our code (unlike the codes of France, and perhaps some other nations) makes no provision for loss or legal deprivation of citizenship. Once a citizen whether natus or datus,) as Sir Edward Coke expresses it,) always a citizen, unless changed by the volition and act of the individual. Neither infancy nor madness nor crime can take away from the subject the quality of citizen. And our laws do, in express terms, declare women and children to be citizens. See, for one instance, the Act of Congress of February 10, 1855, 10 Stat., 604.

The Constitution of the United States does not declare who are and who are not citizens, nor does it attempt to describe the constituent elements of citizenship. It leaves that quality where it found it, resting upon the fact of home, birth, and upon the laws of the several States. Even in the important matter of electing members of Congress it does no more than provide that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of "members chosen every second year by the people of the "several States, and the electors in the several States shall "have the qualifications requisite for the electors of the "most numerous branch of the State Legislature." Here the word citizen is not mentioned, and it is a legal fact, known of course to all lawyers and publicists, that the constitutions of several of the States, in specifying the qualifications of electors, do altogether omit and exclude the words citizen and citizenship. I will refer, in proof, to but three instances.

1. The Constitution of Massachusetts, adopted in 1779-80, in Article 4 of section 3, cap. 1, provides as follows:—"Every male person, being twenty-one years "of age, and resident of a particular town in this Com-"monwealth for the space of one year next preceding, "having a freehold estate within the same town of the "annual income of three pounds, or any estate of the "value of sixty pounds, shall have the right to vote in "the choice of representative or representatives for "said town."

2. The Constitution of North Carolina, adopted in 1776, after a Bill of Rights, and after reciting that "whereas allegiance and protection are, in their nature, "reciprocal, and the one should of right be refused "where the other is withdrawn," declares, in section 8, "that all freemen at the age of twenty-one years, who "have been inhabitants of any one county within the "State twelve months immediately preceding the day of "any election, and shall have paid public taxes, shall "be entitled to vote for members of the House of Com-"mons for the county in which he resides."

3. The Constitution of Illinois, adopted in 1818, in Article 2, section 27, declares that "in all elections all "white male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one "years, having resided in the State six months next "preceding the election, shall enjoy the right of an "elector; but no person shall be entitled to vote except "in the county or district in which he shall actually "reside at the time of the election."

These three Constitutions belong to States widely separated in geographical position, varying greatly from each other in habits, manners, and pursuits, having different climates, soils, productions, and domestic institutions, and yet not one of the three has made citizenship a necessary qualification for a voter; all three of them exclude all females, but only one of them (Illinois) has excluded the black man from the right of suffrage. And it is historically true that the practice has conformed to the theory of those Constitutions respectively; for without regard to citizenship, the coloured man has not voted in Illinois, and freemen of all colours have voted in North Carolina and Massachusetts.

From all this it is manifest that American citizenship does not necessarily depend upon nor co-exist with the legal capacity to hold office and the right of suffrage, either or both of them. The Constitution of the United States, as I have said, does not define citizenship; neither does it declare who may vote, nor who may hold office, except in regard to a few of the highest national functionaries. And the several States, as far as I know, in exercising that power act independently and without any controlling authority over them, and hence it follows that there is no limit to their power in that particular but their own prudence and discretion: and therefore we are not surprised to find these faculties of voting and holding office are not uniform in the different States, but are made to depend upon a variety of facts, purely discretionary, such as age, sex, race, colour, property, residence in a particular place, and length of residence there.

On this, point, then, I conclude that no person in the United States did ever exercise the right of suffrage in virtue of the naked, unassisted fact of citizenship. In every instance the right depends upon some additional fact and cumulative qualification, which may as perfectly exist without as with citizenship.

I am aware that some of our most learned lawyers and able writers have allowed themselves to speak upon this subject in loose and indeterminate language. They speak "of all the rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed "by the Constitution to the citizen" without telling us what they are. They speak of a man's citizenship as defective and imperfect, because he is supposed not to have "all the civil rights" (all the jura civitatis, as expressed by one of my predecessors), without telling what particular rights they are nor what relation they have, if any, with citizenship. And they suggest, without affirming, that there may be different grades of citizenship, of higher and lower degree in point of legal virtue and efficacy; one grade "in the sense of the Constitution," and another inferior grade made by a State and not recognized by the Constitution.

In my opinion the Constitution uses the word citizen only to express the political quality of the individual in his relations to the nation; to declare that he is a member of the body politic, and bound to it by the reciprocal obligation of allegiance on the one side and protection on the other. And I have no knowledge of any other kind of political citizenship, higher or lower, statal or national; or of any other sense in which the word has been used in the Constitution, or can be used properly in the laws of the United States. The phrase "a citizen of the United States," without addition or qualification, means neither more nor less than a member of the nation. And all such are, politically and legally, equal—the child in the cradle and its father in the Senate are equally citizens of the United States; And it needs no argument to prove that every citizen of a State is, necessarily, a citizen of the United States; and to me it is equally clear that every citizen of the United States is a citizen of the particular State in which he is domiciled.

And as to voting and holding office, as that privilege is not essential to citizenship, so the deprivation of it by law is not a deprivation of citizenship. No more so in the case of a negro than in case of a white woman or child.

In common speech the word citizen, with more or less of truth and pertinency, has a variety of meanings. Sometimes it is used in contrast with soldier; sometimes with farmer or countryman sometimes with alien or foreigner. Speaking of a particular man we ask, Is he a citizen or a soldier? meaning is he engaged in civil or military pursuits? Is he a citizen or a countryman? meaning. does he live in the city or in the country? Is he a citizen or an alien? meaning, is he a member of our body politic or some other nation? The first two predicates relate only to the pursuits and to the place of abode of the person. The last is always and wholly political, and concerns only the political and governmental relations of the individual. And it is only in this last sense, the political, that the word is ever used in the Constitution and statutes of the United States.

We have natural-born citizens (Constitution, article 2, § 5), not made by law or otherwise, but born. And this class is the large majority; in fact, the mass of our citizens; for all others are exceptions specially provided for by law. As they become citizens in the natural way by birth, so they remain citizens during their natural lives, unless, by their own voluntary act, they expatriate themselves, and become citizens or subjects of another nation. For we have no law (as the French have) to decitizenise a citizen, who has become such either by the natural process of birth, or by the legal process of adoption. And in this connexion the Constitution says not one word, and furnishes not one hint, in relation to the colour or to the ancestral race of the "natural born citizen." Whatever may have been said in the opinions of judges and lawyers, and in State statutes, about negroes, mulattoes, and persons of colour, the Constitution is wholly silent upon that subject. The Constitution itself does not make the citizens (it is, in fact, made by them). It only intends and recognizes such of them as are natural—home-born—and provides for the naturalization of such of them as were alien—foreign-born—making the latter, as far as nature will allow, like the former.

And I am not aware of any provision in our laws to warrant us in presuming the existence, in this country, of a class of persons intermediate between citizens and aliens. In England there is such a class, clearly defined by law, and called denizens. "A denizen (says Sir "William Blackstone) is an alien born, but who has "obtained, ex donatione regis, letters patent to make "him an English subject; a high and incommunicable "branch of the royal preroyatixe. A denizen is in a kind "of middle state between an alien and a natural born "subject, and partakes of both of them."—Sharwood's Com., 374). In this country I know of but one legal authority tending to show the existence of such a class among us. One of my learned predecessors, Mr. Legaré (4 Opin., 147) supposes that there may be such a class, and that free coloured persons may be ranked in it. Yet, in that same opinion, he declares that a "free "man of colour, a native of this country, may be admitted "to the privileges of a pre-emptioner under the 10th "section of the Act of the 4th September 1841." And that Act declares that a pre-emptioner must be either a citizen of the United States or a person who had declared his intention to become a citizen, as required by the naturalization laws. Of course, the "coloured man" must have been citizen or he could not have entered the land under that Act of Congress. If not a citizen then, by virtue of his native birth, he never could become one by force of law, for our laws extend the privileges of naturalization to such persons only as are "aliens, being free white persons," and he was neither; not alien, because natural-born in the country, and not a free white person, because, though free, confessedly "a man of colour."

As far as I know, Mr. Secretary, you and I have no better title to the citizenship which we enjoy than "the accident of birth"—the fact that we happened to be born in the United States. And our Constitution, in speaking of natural-born citizens, uses no affirmative language to make them such, but only recognizes and re-affirms the universal principle, common to all nations, and as old as political society, that the people born in a country do constitute the nation, and, as individuals, are natural members of the body politic.

If this be a true principle, and I do not doubt it, it follows that every person born in the country is, at the moment of birth, primâ facie a citizen; and he who would deny it must take upon himself the burden of proving some great disfranchisement strong enough to override the "natural-born" right as recognized by the Constitution in terms the most simple and comprehensive, and without any reference to race or colour, or any other accidental circumstance.

That nativity furnishes the rule, both of duty and of right, as between the individual and the government, is a historical and political truth so old and so universally accepted that it is needless to prove it by authority. Nevertheless, for the satisfaction of those who may have doubts upon the subject, I note a few books, which, I think, cannot fail to remove all such doubts—Kent's Com., vol. 2, part 4, sec. 25; Bl. Com., book 1, ch. 10, p. 365; 7 Co. Rep., Calvin's case; 4 Term Rep., p. 300. Doe v. Jones; 3 Pet. Rep., p. 246, Shanks v. Dupont; and see a very learned treatise, attributed to Mr. Binney in 2 Am. Law Reporter, 193.

In every civilized country the individual is born to duties and rights—the duty of allegiance and the right to protection; and these are co-relative obligations, the one the price of the other, and they constitute the all sufficient bond of union between the individual and his country, and the country he is born in, is, primâ facie, his country. In most countries the old law was broadly laid down that this natural connexion between the individual and his native country was perpetual; at least, that the tie was indissoluble by the act of the subject alone.—(See Bl. Com. supra.) 3 Pet. Rep.

But that law of the perpetuity of allegiance is now changed, both in Europe and America. In some countries by silent acquiescence; in others by affirmative legislation. In England, while asserting the perpetuity of natural allegiance, the King, for centuries past, has exercised the power to grant letters of denization to foreigners, making them English subjects, and the Parliament has exercised at pleasure the power of naturalization.

In France the whole subject is regulated by written law, which plainly declares who are citizens (citoyens Français) and who are only the French (Français), meaning the whole body of the French people.—(See Les Codes Français titre premier.) And the same law distinctly sets forth by what means citizenship and the quality of French may be lost and regained; and maintains fully the right of expatriation in the subject, and the power of naturalization in the nation to which he goes.

In the United States it is too late now to deny the political rights and obligations conferred and imposed by nativity; for our laws do not pretend to create or enact them, but do assume and recognize them as things known to all men, because pre-existent and natural; and therefore things of which the laws must take cognizance. Acting out this guiding thought, our Constitution does no more than grant to Congress (rather than to any other department) the power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." And our laws made in pursuance thereof indue the made citizen with all the rights and obligations of the natural citizen. And so strongly was Congress impressed with the great legal fact that the child takes its political status in the nation where it is born, that it was found necessary to pass a law to prevent the alienage of children of our known fellow-citizens who happen to be born in foreign countries. The Act of February 10, 1855, 10 Statutes, 604, provides that "persons," (not white persons) "persons "heretofore born, and hereafter to be born, out of the "limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose "fathers were or shall be at the time of their birth, citi-

" zens of the United States, shall be deemed and consi" dered and are hereby declared to be citizens of the " United States: Provided, however, That the rights of " citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers
" never resided in the United States."

" SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any woman who might lawfully be naturalized under the existing laws, married, or who shall be married to a citizen of the United States, shall be deemed and taken to be a citizen."

But for that Act, children of our citizens who happen to be born at London, Paris, or Rome, while their parents are there on a private visit of pleasure or business, might be brought to the native home of their parents, only to find that they themselves were aliens in their father's country, incapable of inheriting their father's land, and with no right to demand the protection of their father's government.

That is the law of birth at the common law of England, clear and unqualified; and now, both in England and America, modified only by Statutes, made from time to time, to meet emergencies as they arise.

Every citizen of the United States is a competent member of the nation, with rights and duties, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, which cannot be destroyed or abridged by the laws of any particular State. The laws of the State, if they conflict with the laws of the nation, are of no force. The Constitution is plain beyond cavil upon this point. Article 6: " This Constitution, and the laws of the United States " which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all " treaties, &c., shall be the supreme law of the land, and
" the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any" thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the " contrary notwithstanding." And from this I assume that every person who is a citizen of the United States, whether by birth or naturalization, holds his great franchise by the laws of the United States, and above the control of any particular State. Citizenship of the United States is an integral thing, incapable of legal existence in fractional parts. Whoever, then, has that franchise is a whole citizen and a citizen of the whole nation, and cannot be (as the argument of my learned predecessor seems to suppose) such citizen in one State and not in another.

I fully concur in the statement that " the description,
" citizen of the United States, used in the Constitution,
" has the same meaning that it has in the several acts of " Congress passed under the authority of the Constitu-
" tion." And I freely declare my inability to conceive of any second or subordinate meaning of the phrase as used in all those instruments. It means in them all the simple expression of the political status of the person in connexion with the nation—that he is a member of the body politic. And that is all it means, for it does not specify his rights and duties as a citizen, nor in any way refer to such " rights, privileges, and immunities " as he may happen to have, by State laws or otherwise, over and beyond what legally and naturally belong to him in his quality of citizen of the United States. State laws may and do, nay must, vest in individuals great privileges, powers, and duties which do not belong to the mass of their fellow-citizens, and in doing so they consult discretion and convenience only. One citizen, who happens to be a judge, may, under proper circumstances sentence another to be hanged, and a third, who happens to be governor, may grant a pardon to the condemned man, who, as a citizen, is the undoubted peer of both the judge and the governor.

The Constitution, I suppose, says what it means, and does not mean what it does not say. It says nothing about " the high characteristic privileges of a citizen of the State " (of Virginia or any other). I do not know what they were, but certainly in Virginia, for the first half of the existence of the commonwealth, the right of suffrage was not one of them. For during that period no man ever voted there because he was a free white adult male citizen. He voted on his freehold, in land; and no candidate, in soliciting his election, appealed to the people or to the citizens, but to the freeholders only, for they alone could vote

---

(F.)

Chief Baron Pigott's refusal of a mixed jury in Warren's case.

The Chief Baron.—My learned brother and I do not entertain the least doul as to the course we ought to adopt in reference to this proceeding. It is essential to sustain the application; and assuming the Court has the power to grant it, the practice has been invariably to award a jure de medietate, as it is called, wherever an alien claims it. But assuming the authority of the Court, upon which I will not now cast the slightest doubt, it is perfectly plain the person who claims a jury de medietate linguæ must be an alien. It is very truly put by the counsel for the prisoner, that what the prisoner contends for in the present case is, that by reason of what appears—assuming the statement to be fact—what appears stated in the suggestion, he is an alien, and he is not now under the allegiance of the Queen, I cannot allow that proposition to be put forward without meeting it with a prompt and unhesitating denial. According to the law of England, a law which has been administered without any variation or doubt from the very earliest times, he who once is under the allegiance of the English sovereign remains so for ever. It would be really almost pedantry for me to cite authorities on that subject. They are familiar to every lawyer. I shall cite one English authority, and I shall then cite some American authorities of the greatest weight and highest reputation. In the first volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, pages 269 and 270, the law is thus stated:—

" Allegiance, both express and implied, is, however, distinguished by the law into two sorts or species, the one natural, the other local; the former being also perpetual, the latter temporary. Natural allegiance is such as is due from natural-born subjects. This is a tie which cannot be severed or altered by any change of time, place, or circumstance, nor by anything but the united concurrence of the legislature. An Englishman who removes to France or to China, owes the same allegiance to the King of England there as at home, and 20 years hence as well as now. For it is a principle of universal law that the natural-born subject of one prince cannot by any act of his own, no, not by swearing allegiance to another, put off or discharge his natural allegiance to the former, for this natural allegiance was intrinsic and primitive, and antecedent to the other, and cannot be divested without the concurrent act of that prince to whom it was first due. Indeed the natural born subject of one prince, to whom he owes allegiance, may be entangled by subjecting himself absolutely to another, but it is his own act that brings him into these straights and difficulties of owing service to two masters; and it is unreasonable, that, by such voluntary act of his own, he should be able at pleasure to unloose those bonds by which he is connected to his natural prince."

Blackstone then proceeds to show that local allegiance, which by foreigners is due to the monarch, continues so long as the foreigners reside within the kingdom. The maxim of the law on this subject, referred to by Sir Michael Foster, page 184 of his Treatise, and referred to by a variety of other authorities, is nemo potest exuere patriam. I said I would only refer to one English authority; I have brought down, with a view to some possible matter which might have arisen, some American authorities, and I don't think it is unuseful to cite these authorities on the subject now before us. In Storey's " Conflict of Laws," page 23, section 21, referring to the general maxim or rule, that the laws of one State do not bind property or persons in another, he says:—

" Upon this rule there is often engrafted an exception of some importance to be rightly understood. It is that although the laws of a nation have no direct binding force or effect, except upon persons within its own territories; yet that every nation has a right to bind its own subjects by its own laws in every other place. In one sense this exception may be admitted to be correct and well founded in the practice of nations; in another sense it is incorrect, or at least it requires qualification. Every nation has hitherto assumed it as clear that it possesses the right to regulate and govern its own native-born subjects everywhere, and consequently that its laws extend to and bind such subjects, at all times and in all places. This is commonly adduced as a consequence of what is called natural allegiance; that is, of allegiance to the government of the territory of a man's birth. Thus, Mr. Blackstone says, natural allegiance is such as is due from all men born within the king's dominions immediately upon their birth."

He then proceeds to quote the passage from Blackstone which I have cited. In Chancellor Kent's Commentaries, in the 2nd volume, page 42, the following is laid down as English law. He is expounding the American law; and expounding the American law, founded as it is on the law of England, he says:—

"It is the doctrine of the English law, that natural born subjects owe an allegiance which is intrinsic and perpetual, and which cannot be divested by any act of their own."

He then cites an English authority, in the case of M'Donnell, who was tried for high treason in 1746, by Lord Chief Justice Lee, and who, he says—

"Though born in England, had been educated in France, and spent his riper years there. His counsel spoke of the doctrine of natural allegiance as slavish and repugnant to the principles of their Revolution. The Court, however, said that it had never been doubted that a subject born, taking a commission from a foreign prince and committing high treason, was liable to be punished, as a subject, for that treason. They held that it was not in the power of any private subject to shake off his allegiance, and transfer it to a foreign prince; nor was it in the power of any foreign prince, by naturalizing or employing a subject of Great Britain, to dissolve the bond of allegiance between that subject and the Crown. Entering into foreign service without the consent of the sovereign, or refusing to leave such service when required by proclamation, is held to be a misdemeanour at common law."

Chancellor Kent then deals with the question, how far the doctrine of the English law prevails in America, he says:—

"It has been a question (here he leaves the English law, and proceeds to expound the other) frequently and gravely argued, both by theoretical writers and in frequent discussions, whether the English doctrine of perpetual allegiance applies in its full extent to this country."

That is, whether in America that doctrine is recognized. Its recognition there or repudiation could not in the slightest degree affect this country or its tribunals. Chancellor Kent then proceeds with an elaborate review of the authorities, and he closes thus, stating his view of the American law:—

"From this historical review of the principal discussions in the Federal Courts on this interesting subject of American Jurisprudence, the better opinion would seem to be that—a citizen cannot renounce his allegiance to the United States without the permission of Government, to be declared by law; and that, as there is no existing legislative regulation on the case, the rule of the English common law remains unaltered."

I have thought it right to cite these two great American authorities—Mr. Justice Storey in his book on the Conflict of Laws; that is, on the laws of nations as they relate to each other—and Chancellor Kent expounding the law of America, and expounding it in the first instance by an exposition of the law of England, which is its foundation. We in our courts have been in the habit of treating, not merely with respect but with reverence, these two great lights of the laws of America. We have cited them in our courts of justice; they have been quoted in our forensic discussions. The principles laid down by them in interpreting in America the laws of England as they are adopted there, have been approved and adopted by some of the ablest judges that have sat on the British bench. Mr. Justice Storey was himself a great judge. So was Chancellor Kent; and some of the finest contributions that have ever been made to the science of jurisprudence, or to the law of England as a science, have been made by these two great men from whose works I have read these passages. I have thought it not unuseful since I had the opportunity of doing so, of stating that this was the law as laid down by the great authorities in America, because I think it is desirable that they who in America formed views—I will say no more now than that—with respect to what is passing, or what is expected to pass, within the dominions of the Crown of England, should be aware of the obligations imposed on them if they have ever been under the allegiance of the Crown of England; and how, according to the laws of England, they may be dealt with when they are found here. For these reasons we are of opinion that the objection made by the Attorney-General is well founded, and that we ought not to comply with this application, and that the prisoner is not entitled to a jury de medietate linguæ.

(G.)

Memorandum on Prussian Laws.

(Translation.)

By the terms of section 1 of the law of 3d September 1814 (Collections of Laws for the Year 1814, p. 79), every Prussian subject who has attained the age of 20 full years is obliged to serve in the army.

In consequence in each year all the young men of that age must present themselves at a certain time before the Military Commission of the circle in which they are domiciled, to be examined as to their fitness to render service, and designated, the case happening, to the detachment in which they are to be incorporated.

This obligation to present themselves for service is not extinguished by time. Whoever does not appear at the point indicated, is held to serve at a more advanced age; and if he can be got hold of, is enrolled under the flag before any other.

Service in the army in active employ lasts three years.—(Section 6 of the law above mentioned.)

During the two years following the soldier is dismissed on leave, and belongs to the reserve; thenceforward he is not called into service until a war, or an increase of the active force requires it.

After the expiration of these two years, the soldier passes for seven years into the first levy of landwehr (Land-guard), which, in time of peace, musters only annually for some weeks of drill.

These seven years completed the soldier becomes a member for seven years longer of the second levy of the landwehr, which is only called out in time of war.

Whoever evades the duties of the landwehr is obliged to take part therein at a later time, and his more advanced age does not exempt him from such call.

Emigration is not permitted, except with express leave from the Government. This permission cannot be granted to males between 17 and 25 years of age, unless they produce a certificate from the Commission for Recruiting the Army, testifying that they do not propose to expatriate themselves for the sole purpose of evading their military obligations.—(Section 17 of the law of 31st of December 1842, on the mode in which the quality of subject of Prussia acquired and lost. Bulletin of the Laws of the year 1843, p. 15, et seq.)

This certificate serves also as a guide when it is required to determine if there is reason to grant to minors authority to emigrate with their parents.

Soldiers belonging to the army in active service, or to the reserve, do not obtain leave to expatriate themselves until they have been dismissed.

On the other hand, the service in the first or second levy of the landwehr does not prevent the person who may still be subject to such service from disengaging himself from the ties which bind him to his native land; one exception alone is made to this regulation, which is when the landwehr is called into active service.

Whoever leaves Prussia without permission, and thereby evades service either in the army, in active service, or the landwehr, incurs a penalty of 50 to 1,000 crowns, or incurs an imprisonment of one month to one year.—(§ 110 of the Penal Code of April 14, 1851.)

But the payment of the penalty, or the infliction of the punishment of imprisonment does not dispense with the obligation to render the military service. This obligation continues the rather until he who may have neglected his duty discharges it completely.

Proceedings are taken against such persons the moment it is perceived that they are unlawfully absent, and without regard to the age they may meantime have attained.

The permission to emigrate, of which a formula is annexed to this Memorandum, puts an end to the quality of Prussian subject (§ 20 of the Law of December 31, 1842), and whoever has obtained it is no longer under any obligation to serve in the army. Unless there be a formal exception, this permission embraces also the wife of the individual to whom it has been granted, as well as the minor children, who are still subject to the paternal authority.

Berlin, January 6, 1859.

Form.

(Translation.)

The undersigned Royal Government certifies hereby, that a permit of emigration has been granted to [name, profession, residence], at his request, and for his emigration to . with his wife, formerly Miss and the following minor children still being under the authority of the father:

[Name and time of their birth.]

This permit of emigration causes the loss of the quality of Prussian subject from the date of its delivery, only, however, for those persons expressly named therein.

The day of

ROYAL PRUSSIAN GOVERNMENT.

[Seal.]

(No. .)

(H.)

Report by Counsel to the Vienna Embassy on Austrian Laws.

The qualification of an Austrian subject can be attained:

1. By way of birth. The citizenship in the Austrian States is inherent in the children of Austrian subjects from their birth. (Sec. 28 of the Austrian Civil Code.)

2. A female foreigner becomes an Austrian in marrying an Austrian subject. (Decree of the Imperial Chancery, 23d February 1833; No. 2,596.)

3. By an expressed investing a foreigner with the rights of an Austrian subject. (See Sec. 30 of the Civil Code.)

4. By accepting a situation in the Public Service. (Sec. 29 of the Civil Code.)

5. By an uninterrupted residence of 10 years a foreigner can obtain the quality of an Austrian subject, provided that he has during this time not suffered any punishment for crime, and that his behaviour was always respectable. Only on this presumption such a foreigner is to be admitted to take the oath of an Austrian subject. (Sec. 29 of the Civil Code and Aulic Decree of 1st of March 1833.)

6. In conformity with sec. 21 of the Patent, 24th March 1832, an Austrian subject, who has, without legal authorization, emigrated, and consequently lost his rights as an Austrian subject, can be re-established by the grace of His Imperial Majesty.

The rights arising from the quality as an Austrian subject cease:—

1. In consequence of emigration, which can take place with or without the authorization of the competent authorities. (Patent, 24th March 1832; No. 2,557.)

2. For females, on their marrying a foreigner. (Sec. 19 of the Patent, 24th March 1832, No. 2,557.)

Particular Remarks.—It is nearly impossible to give a distinct and coherent summary of all the laws concerning the mode of acquiring the quality of an Austrian subject, and the mode of losing it. The first and systematic dispositions regarding this matter are contained in the Austrian Civil Code. They have, however, experienced in the course of time so many alterations, that the Code can no longer be considered as the principal source regulating such matters. The above cited laws, copies of which accompany this note, contain most of the now existing rules. There are besides some which exercise a certain influence on the subject, even if they have not been issued with the intention to give a new rule of attaining the quality of an Austrian subject. So, for instance, the now existing law in regard to trade does no longer maintain the distinction between business requiring a regular domicile in a certain place and other undertakings. Therefore the establishing of a business requiring a regular domicil can no longer be considered as a mode of acquiring the quality of an Austrian subject. This is the more accurate, as foreigners, according to this law are fully entitled to carry on such business in this country without undergoing any alteration of their quality as foreigners. Further, the law concerning the communes establishes the principle that any Austrian subject must be a member of a community in the country. And as no commune (gemeinde) can be compelled to receive a new member against their will, it is a natural consequence that a foreigner who is about to apply for the Austrian citizenship must secure himself the reception in some Austrian community, and that he cannot obtain the citizenship itself without having secured an eventual reception in such an Austrian community.

D. J. Winiwarter.

Vienna, 8th February 1868.

(Inclosure 1.)

Code Civil, sec. 28.)

On acquiert la jouissance complète des droits civils par le droit de bourgeoisie. Le droit de bourgeoisie dans nos Etats héréditaires appartient, par droit de naissance, aux enfants de tout bourgeois Autrichien.

(Inclosure 2.)

(Translation.)

Court Chancery Decree of 23rd February 1833, to all the Chief National Authorities, in pursuance of the Imperial Resolution of 26th January 1833.

His Imperial Royal Majesty has been pleased to decide, in addition to the methods of acquiring Austrian citizenship in the General Code of Civil Law, and in accordance with section 32 thereof, and with section 19 of the Emigration Patent of 24th March 1832 (I. G. S., No. 2,557), that Austrian citizenship may also be acquired by a foreign woman through her marriage with an Austrian citizen.

(Inclosure 3.)

Code Civil, sec. 29.

Les étrangers acquièrent le droit de bourgeoisie Autrichienne en entrant dans un service public, en entreprenant une industrie dont l'exercice exige un domicile habituel dans le pays; par un séjour non interrompu de dix années dans nos Etats, sous la condition toutefois que, dans ce laps de temps, l'étranger ne se sera attiré aucune peine à raison d'un délit.

(Inclosure 4.)

Code Civil, sec. 30.

On peut aussi, sans l'exercice d'une industrie ou d'un metier, et avant l'écoulement de dix années, se pourvoir auprès des autorités politiques pour obtenir le droit de bourgeoisie, et celles-ci pourront l'accorder suivant l'état de la fortune, la capacite industrielle, et la moralité du demandeur.

(Inclosure 5.)

Abstract of an Ordinance by Francis I., Emperor of Austria, respecting the Emigration or Expatriation and unauthorized absence of his subjects from their country, applicable to his German States, to Lombardy and Venice, Dalmatia, Galacia, and Lodomeria.

I. Emigration or Expatriation.—Any Austrian subject who leaves his own country for a foreign State without the intention of returning is to be considered as an emigrant.

II. Lawful Emigration.—Those who wish to emigrate must apply to the proper authority to be released from their Austrian citizenship. They must prove that they are self-dependent, and in the free exercise of their rights; they must state what members of their family are to emigrate with them; prove that they have all fulfilled their military liabilities; and show that no hindrances exist in regard to public duties. Should the application be rejected, recourse may be had to the Privy Council.

III. Unauthorized Expatriation.—Those who go to a foreign country without leave, with the expressed or apparent intention to return no more are to be considered as unauthorized emigrants. Such intention is shown by the acceptance of foreign citizenship, or a foreign, civil, or military office without special permission; by joining a foreign religious institution or other association out of the Empire, requiring personal attendance; by staying abroad for five years without having property or business there requiring such absence, and if the family and property of the emigrant be withdrawn from the country; by staying abroad for 10 years without the previous conditions; by non-obedience to a summons of recall to the Austrian States, issued by the Authorities. The five and 10 years periods are not applicable to Austrian subjects residing in States with which Austria has Treaties of free emigration.

IV. The Effects of Emigration.—Those who emigrate with permission lose their character as Austrian subjects and are treated as foreigners. Those who emigrate without permission lose their rights of citizenship, and are liable to all the legal consequences of that loss; they lose the rank and advantages which they held in Austria, and are struck off the registers; they can neither acquire nor transfer property where this law applies; any previous testamentary dispositions with regard to such property become void; their inheritances go to the next heir after them. Their property is sequestered without prejudice to the claims thereon. Their children or descendants resident in the State are suitably maintained out of the sequestrated property. The net overplus goes to increase the property, the whole of which reverts to the heirs at the death of the expatriated owners. In special cases the Sovereign can allow the children to enjoy the sequestrated property.

V. The Children of Unauthorized Emigrants.—Those who are born before sentence has been passed against the father do not lose their Austrian citizenship or their position during their minority, nor for 10 years after coming of age if the father be still living; nor for one year after his death, if within the 10 years; nor for three years after coming of age if the father die before they do so; and they enter upon their full rights if they return to the Austrian States within those periods. This favour is also applicable to children sent to reside abroad by an Austrian subject living himself in the country. Such children are, however, to be looked upon as foreigners if they have acquired citizenship abroad, or if they do not claim the reserved rights within the prescribed periods.

VI. Female Subjects married to Foreigners.—They lose the Austrian citizenship on such marriage, and if they become widows, can only regain it, in the same way as any female foreigner.

VII. Re-habitation.—Citizenship can only be re-conferred on unauthorized emigrants by permission of the Sovereign; but those who have emigrated with permission may regain it in the manner prescribed in the General Code of Civil Law. Such regained citizenship is only available in regard to subsequently acquired rights.

VIII. Unauthorized Absence.—Subjects who go out of the State without Passports or permission, or who stay away longer than the time fixed, are considered to be absent without authority; and if they cannot justify themselves they are liable for that absence alone to a penalty of from five to 50 florins, or imprisonment for from three to 14 days, and to double the amount of fine and one or more fast days during the imprisonments, if the absence continue for longer than three months.

IX. Proceedings against unauthorized Emigrants.—The absentees are to be summoned to appear within a certain time by edicts duly promulgated in newspapers and in the neighbourhoods to which they belong. If they do not appear within the appointed period proceedings are taken against them in the Civil Courts by order of the Government, and their property is sequestrated.

X. Proceedings against unauthorized Absentees.—The absentee is first to be summoned by an edict to answer for himself, within three or six months, according to the circumstances; he may justify himself during those periods; if he does not, judgment is passed against him by the competent Court. Appeals are allowed to the superior authority.

XI. Provisions applicable to the proceedings in both cases.—If the absentee or emigrant be accused of any criminal act, proceedings are taken in the Criminal Court, and the civil proceedings are stayed meanwhile. The judgment in the criminal proceedings is sent to the Civil Court for its sentence on the absence or expatriation. The sequestration is operative during the criminal proceedings.

XII. Transitory Provisions.—Expatriation proceedings pending at the promulgation of this Ordinance are to be adjudged according to it; but if former laws awarded a milder punishment that only is to be inflicted. Sentences passed before the promulgation of this Ordinance remain in full force.

The enactments of the general Civil Code, as well as all military conscription, and police laws applicable to absentees or emigrants retain their full force and validity; all other laws and regulations on the subject are hereby annulled.

Vienna, 24th March 1832.

(Inclosure 6.)

COURT CHANCERY DECREE of 1st March 1833, to all the Chief Authorities of the Country.

(Translation).

His Imperial Royal Majesty has been pleased to command by supreme resolution of the 8th February 1833, that from henceforth Austrian citizenship shall not be acquired by a foreigner through an uninterrupted residence of full 10 years in the countries for which the General Code of Civil Law is binding, until he shall have given the requisite proof thereof to the Chief National Authority of his last dwelling-place; shall have taken the citizen's oath, by order of that Authority, either to itself or at the proper district Court, and shall have received a certificate of his having done so.

The foreigner shall not, however, be allowed to take that oath until the aforesaid Chief National Authority has been fully convinced that throughout the said time, not only has he not rendered himself liable to punishment for any crime, but that his conduct has always been peaceful, obedient to the laws and ordinances of the constituted authorities, and well-mannered, and that by his demeanour and the known tenor of his thoughts, he has never given any real ground for suspicion or complaint.

On the other hand, those foreigners who have, on the day of the publication of this supreme resolution, already completed the 10 years uninterrupted abode in the said countries, are to be allowed to relinquish the Austrian citizenship thereby acquired, by giving proof that they had no intention of becoming Austrian citizens; this proof must, however, be produced absolutely at the latest within six months from the publication of this supreme resolution, as after that time it will no longer be allowed.

(I.)

1.—NATURALIZATION ACT OF 1844.

7 & 8 VICTORIÆ, Cap. 6.—AN ACT to amend the Laws relating to Aliens.—[6th August 1844.]

Whereas it is expedient that the laws now in force affecting aliens should be amended, and that Her Majesty should be enabled to grant to aliens the rights and capacities of British subjects, under such regulations and with such restrictions and exceptions as are herein-after provided: And whereas an Act of Parliament was made and passed in the Twelfth Year of the Reign of His late Majesty King William the Third, intituled "An Act for "the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing "the rights and liberties of the subject;" and another Act of Parliament was made and passed in the First Year of the Reign of His late Majesty King George the First, intituled "An Act to explain an Act made in the "Twelfth Year of the Reign of King William the Third, "intituled 'An Act for the further limitation of the "'Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties "'of the subject;'" and another Act of Parliament was made and passed in the Fourteenth Year of the Reign of His late Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An Act to prevent certain inconveniences that may happen by Bills of Naturalization:" Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that such parts of the said recited Acts of Parliament as are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act shall be repealed.

II. And be it enacted, that so much of the said Act of the First Year of the Reign of King George the First as provides that no person shall hereafter be naturalized unless in the Bill exhibited for that purpose there shall be a clause or particular words inserted to declare that such person shall not thereby be enabled to be of the Privy Council, or a member of either House of Parliament, or to take any office, either civil or military, or to have any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments from the Crown to himself or any other person in trust for him, and that no Bill of Naturalization shall hereafter be received in either House of Parliament unless such clause or words be first inserted, be repealed.

III. And be it enacted, that every person now born, or hereafter to be born, out of Her Majesty's dominions, of a mother being a natural-born subject of the United Kingdom, shall be capable of taking to him, his heirs, executors, or administrators, any estate, real or personal, by devise or purchase, or inheritance of Succession.

IV. And be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this Act every alien, being the subject of a friendly State, shall and may take and hold, by purchase, gift, bequest, representation, or otherwise, every species of personal property, except chattels real, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, and with the same rights, remedies, exemptions, privileges, and capacities, as if he were a natural-born subject of the United Kingdom.

V. And be it enacted, that every alien now residing in, or who shall hereafter come to reside in, any part of the United Kingdom, and being the subject of a friendly State, may, by grant, lease, demise, assignment, bequest, representation, or otherwise, take and hold any lands, houses, or other tenements, for the purpose of residence or of occupation by him or her, or his or her servants, or for the purpose of any business, trade, or manufacture, for any term of years not exceeding twenty-one years, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, and with the same rights, remedies, exemptions, and privileges, except the right to vote at elections for Members of Parliament, as if he were a natural-born subject of the United Kingdom.

VI. And be it enacted, that upon obtaining the certificate and taking the oath herein-after prescribed every alien now residing in, or who shall hereafter come to reside in, any part of Great Britain or Ireland, with intent to settle therein, shall enjoy all the rights and capacities which a natural-born subject of the United Kingdom can enjoy or transmit, except that such alien shall not be capable of becoming of Her Majesty's Privy Council, nor a Member of either House of Parliament, nor of enjoying such other rights and capacities, if any, as shall be specially excepted in and by the certificate to be granted in manner herein-after mentioned.

VII. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for any such alien as aforesaid to present to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State a memorial, stating the age, profession, trade, or other occupation of the memorialist, and the duration of his residence in Great Britain or Ireland, and all other the grounds on which he seeks to obtain any of the rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject, and praying the said Secretary of State to grant to the memorialist the certificate herein-after mentioned.

VIII. And be it enacted, that every such memorial shall be considered by the said Secretary of State, who shall inquire into the circumstances of each case, and receive all such evidence as shall be offered, by affidavit or otherwise, as he may deem necessary or proper for proving the truth of the allegations contained in such memorial; and that the said Secretary of State, if he shall so think fit, may issue a certificate, reciting such of the contents of the memorial as he shall consider to be true and material, and granting to the memorialist (upon his taking the oath herein-after prescribed) all the rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject, except the capacity of being a Member of the Privy Council or a Member of either House of Parliament, and except the rights and capacities (if any) specially excepted in and by such certificate.

IX. And be it enacted, that such certificate shall be enrolled for safe custody as of record in Her Majesty's High Court of Chancery, and may be inspected, and copies thereof taken, under such regulations as the Lord High Chancellor shall direct.

X. And be it enacted, that within sixty days from the day of the date of such certificate, every memorialist to whom rights and capacities shall be granted by such certificate, shall take and subscribe the following Oath; (that is to say,)

"I A.B. do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be "faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen "Victoria, and will defend Her to the utmost of my "power against all conspiracies and attempts whatever "which may be made against Her Person, Crown, or "Dignity; and I will do my utmost endeavour to dis- "close and make known to Her Majesty, Her heirs and "successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies "which may be formed against Her or them; and I do "faithfully promise to maintain, support, and defend "to the utmost of my power the succession of the "Crown, which succession, by an Act, intituled 'An "'Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better "'securing the rights and liberties of the subject,' is "and stands limited to the Princess Sophia Electress of "Hanover, and the Heirs of Her Body, being Protes- "tants, hereby utterly renouncing and abjuring any "obedience or allegiance unto any other person claiming "or pretending a right to the Crown of this realm.

"So help me GOD."

Which oath shall be taken and subscribed by such memorialist, and shall be duly administered to him or her, before any of Her Majesty's Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench or Court of Common Pleas or Court of Exchequer, or before any Master or Master Extraordinary in Chancery; and that the Judge or Master or Master Extraordinary in Chancery, whether in England or in Ireland, before whom such oath may be administered, shall grant to the memorialist a certificate of his or her having taken and subscribed such oath accordingly; and such certificate shall be signed by the Judge, Master, or Masters Extraordinary in Chancery, before whom such oath shall be administered.

XI. And be it enacted, that the several proceedings hereby authorized to be taken for obtaining such certificate as aforesaid shall be regulated in such manner as the Secretary of State shall from time to time direct.

XII. And be it enacted, that the fees payable in respect of the several proceedings hereby authorized shall be fixed and regulated by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury.

XIII. And be it enacted, that all persons who shall have been naturalized before the passing of this Act, and who shall have resided in the United Kingdom during five successive years, shall be deemed entitled to and shall enjoy all such rights and capacities of British subjects as may be conferred on aliens by the provisions of this Act.

XIV. Provided always, and be it enacted, that nothing in this Act shall prejudice or be construed to prejudice any rights or interests, in law or in equity, whether vested or contingent, under any will, deed, or settlement executed by any natural-born subject of Great Britain or Ireland before the passing of this Act, or under any descent or representation from or under any such natural-born subject who shall have died before the passing of this Act.

XV. And be it enacted, that nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to take away or diminish any right, privilege, or capacity heretofore lawfully possessed by or belonging to aliens residing in Great Britain or Ireland, so far as relates to the possession or enjoyment of any real or personal property, but that all such rights shall continue to be enjoyed by such aliens in as full and ample a manner as such rights were enjoyed before the passing of this Act.

XVI. And be it enacted, that any woman married or who shall be married to a natural-born subject or person naturalized shall be deemed and taken to be herself naturalized, and have all the rights and privileges of a natural-born subject.

XVII. And be it enacted, that this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act to be passed in the present Session of Parliament.

2.—Act of 1847.

11 & 12 Vict. Cap. 83.—22d July 1847.

Whereas by divers Acts, statutes, or ordinances enacted by the legislatures of divers of Her Majesty's colonies or possessions abroad provision hath been made for imparting to divers aliens there resident the privileges or some of the privileges of naturalization, to be exercised and enjoyed within the respective limits of such colonies and possessions respectively: and whereas doubts have arisen as to the competency of the said legislatures to enact any such laws, statutes, or ordinances, and as to the validity of the same when so enacted, and it is expedient that such doubts be removed: Be it therefore and it is hereby declared and enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that all Acts, statutes, and ordinances heretofore made and enacted by the legislatures of any of Her Majesty's colonies and possessions abroad for imparting to any person or persons the privileges or any of the privileges of naturalization, to be by such person or persons exercised and enjoyed within the respective limits of such colonies or possessions respectively, shall within such limits have and be taken and reputed to have had from the time of the enactment thereof respectively all such and the same force and effect as doth by law belong to any other law, statute, or ordinance made or enacted by any such respective legislatures.

II. And be it and it is hereby enacted and declared, that all laws, statutes, and ordinances which shall hereafter be made and enacted by the legislatures of any of Her Majesty's colonies or possessions abroad for imparting to any person or persons the privileges or any of the privileges of naturalization, to be by any such person or persons exercised and enjoyed within the limits of any such colonies and possessions respectively, shall within such limits have the force and authority of law, any law, statute, or usage to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding: provided nevertheless, that all such laws, statutes, and ordinances shall be made and enacted in such manner and form, and subject to and in conformity with all such rules as now are or hereafter shall be in force in respect of other laws, statutes, or ordinances enacted or to be enacted by any such legislatures respectively, and shall and may be confirmed or disallowed by Her Majesty in such and the same manner, and subject to the same rules and regulations as extend or as shall hereafter extend to the confirmation or disallowance of any other such laws, statutes, or ordinances.

III. And whereas a certain Act was made and enacted in the seventh and eighth year of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to amend the laws relating to aliens:" and whereas doubts have arisen whether the said recited Act of the seventh and eighth year of Her Majesty's reign extends to and is in force in Her Majesty's colonies or possessions abroad; now it is hereby further enacted and declared, that the said recited Act of the seventh and eighth year of Her Majesty's reign, or any part of it, doth not extend to the said colonies or possessions, or to any of them.

IV. And be it enacted, that this Act may be amended or repealed by any other Act of this present session of Parliament.

3.—Form of Certificate.

Secretary of State's Office, Whitehall.

7 & 8 Vict. cap. 66. In pursuance of an Act passed in the session of Parliament holden in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled "An Act to amend the laws relating to aliens,"

I hereby certify that A.B., an alien now residing at London, in that part of Great Britain called England, with intend to settle therein, has presented to me, the right honourable D.E., one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, a memorial, stating, &c. &c., and praying me, as such Secretary of State, to grant him the certificate therein mentioned: and whereas I have inquired into the circumstances of the case, and have received such evidence as I have deemed necessary for proving the truth of the allegations contained in such memorial: now, in pursuance of the power and authority given to me as Secretary of State by the said Act, I hereby grant to the aforesaid A.B. (upon his taking the oath prescribed by the said Act) all the rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject, except the capacity of being a member of the Privy Council, or a member of either House of Parliament, and except any rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject out of and beyond the dominions of the British Crown and the limits thereof, other than such as may be conferred upon him by the grant of a passport from the Secretary of State to enable him to travel in foreign parts: provided always, and I do hereby declare, that all the before-mentioned rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject are granted to the aforesaid A.B. upon the condition that he shall continue to reside permanently within the United Kingdom, and that if at any time hereafter he shall voluntarily be absent from the United Kingdom for a period of six months at any one time without licence in writing under the hand of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, he shall be deemed to have ceased to reside permanently within the United Kingdom, and then and in such case this certificate and all the rights and capacities thereby granted shall absolutely cease and determine.

In witness whereof I have hereto subscribed my name this day of 186

(Signed) D.E.

---

7 & 8 Vict. Cap. 66. Sect. 10.

And be it enacted, that within sixty days from the day of the date of such certificate, every memorialist to whom rights and capacities shall be granted by such certificate, shall take and subscribe the following oath; (that is to say,)

"I, A.B. do sincely promise and swear, that I will "be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty "Queen Victoria, and will defend her to the utmost "of my power against all conspiracies and attempts "whatever which may be made against Her person, "crown, or dignity; and I will do my utmost endeavour "to disclose and make known to Her Majesty, Her "heirs and successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies which may be formed against Her or them "and I do faithfully promise to maintain, support, and "defend to the utmost of my power the succession of "the crown, which succession, by an Act intituled "'An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and "'better securing the rights and liberties of the subject,' "is and stands limited to the Princess Sophia Electress "of Hanover and the heirs of Her body, being Protestants, hereby utterly renouncing and abjuring any "obedience or allegiance unto any other person claiming "or pretending a right to the Crown of this realm. "So help me GOD."

Which oath shall be taken and subscribed by such memorialist, and shall be duly administered to him or her, before any of Her Majesty's judges of the Court of Queen's Bench or Court of Common Pleas or Court of Exchequer, or before any master or master extraordinary in Chancery, and that the judge or master or master extraordinary in Chancery, whether in England or in Ireland, before whom such oath may be administered, shall grant to the memorialist a certificate of his or her having taken and subscribed such oath accordingly; and such certificate shall be signed by the judge, master or master extraordinary in Chancery, before whom such oath shall be administered.

N.B.—This certificate must afterwards be enrolled in the High Court of Chancery in conformity with section 9.

4.—Form of Letter granting Certificate.

Sir, Whitehall,

I am directed by the Secretary of State to transmit to you herewith the certificate of naturalization, which he has been pleased to grant to you in pursuance of your request.

I am at the same time to explain to you that no certificate or other act of naturalization granted by the British government to an alien, places him beyond the lawful power and control of his native country, unless he has received from the government of such country a certificate of denationalization or been released from his original obligations as a subject or citizen in some other legal way.

I am, &c.

Adolphus F. O. Liddell.

5.—Form of License to be absent from the United Kingdom.

Whereas on the day of in the year of our Lord One thousand eight hundred and D.E., one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, in pursuance of the statute 7 & 8 Victoria, c. 66, intituled "An Act to amend the laws relating to aliens" did certify that A.B. an alien then residing at London, had presented to D.E. a memorial praying him to grant to the said A.B. the certificate therein mentioned. And whereas D.E. after due inquiries (in the said certificate mentioned) did in and by the said certificate grant to the said A.B. (on taking the oath therein referred to) all the rights and capacities of a natural-born British subject (except as therein excepted): Provided always that all the said rights and capacities should be and were granted to the said A.B. on the condition that he should continue to reside permanently within the United Kingdom, and that if at any time thereafter he should voluntarily be absent from the United Kingdom for a period of six months at any one time without license in writing under the hand of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, he should be deemed to have ceased to reside permanently within the United Kingdom, and then and in such case the said certificate and rights and capacities thereby granted should absolutely cease and determine.

Now I the undersigned F.G. being one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, do hereby at the request of the said A.B., and for divers good causes and reasons, give and grant to the said A.B. full license to be absent from the United Kingdom for a period of not exceeding months at one time in addition to the said period of six months: Provided always, and this license is on the condition that if the said A.B. shall voluntarily be absent from the United Kingdom for a period exceeding the said months at one time in addition to the said period of months without the further license in writing under the hand of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the said certificate and all the rights and capacities thereby granted, shall, notwithstanding the license, absolutely cease and determine.

In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name this day of 18

(Signed) F. G.

6.—Regulations respecting the Issue of Certificates of Naturalization.

Home Office, Whitehall, August 1, 1847.

Regulations by the Secretary of State with reference to Certificates of Naturalization, in pursuance of Statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, intituled "An Act to amend the Laws relating to Aliens."

I. Upon an application to the Secretary of State for the grant of a Certificate of Naturalization, it will be necessary that the applicant should present to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, a Memorial, praying for such grant stating:—

Of what Friendly State he is a Subject?
His Age, Profession, Trade, or other Occupation?
Whether he is Married, and has any Children?
Whether he has any settled place of Residence, and where situated, and how long he has resided within the Kingdom?
Whether he intends to continue to reside permanently within the United Kingdom?
On what grounds he seeks to obtain the Right and Capacities of a Natural-born British Subject?

II. That the memorialist should make a declaration before a Magistrate, or other person authorized to take such declaration, verifying the statements in his memorial.

III. That a declaration* should be made and signed by four householders at least, who should state their places of residence, vouching for the respectability and loyalty of the memorialist, verifying also the several particulars stated in the memorial; and that this declaration should be made in due form, either together or separately, before a magistrate, or other person authorized by law to receive such declaration, in pursuance of the Act passed in the 5th & 6th years of His late Majesty King William IV.

(K.)

Circulars to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Agents respecting the Grant of Passports and Protection to Naturalized British Subjects.

1.

Foreign Office, January 8, 1851.

Cases having occurred in which the holders of certificates of naturalization, issued by the Secretary of State under the Act 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 66, have put forward claims to receive from Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Agents abroad the same degree of protection to which the natural-born subjects of Her Majesty are entitled, I have to inform that Her Majesty's Government have deemed it expedient to insert a new clause in the certificates in question, which are now drawn up as follows:—"I hereby "grant to (A. B.) all the rights and capacities of a "natural-born British subject, except the capacity of "being a member of the Privy Council, or a member of "either House of Parliament, and except any rights and "capacities of a natural-born British subject out of and "beyond the dominions of the British Crown and the "limits thereof."

I transmit herewith, for your information and guidance, copies of the new form of certificate now in use, and of the Act 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 66; and I have to add that the holders of these new certificates are not entitled to demand British passports, nor to claim in foreign countries British protection for mercantile firms abroad with which their houses of business in this country may be connected.

I am, &c.

---

* In most cases the Secretary of State requires that th declaration should also state that the applicant has resided three years in the United Kingdom.

2.

Foreign Office, May 1, 1854.

In order to obviate the inconvenience experienced by holders of certificates of naturalization of not being able to procure passports for travelling on the Continent, Her Majesty's Government have so far relaxed the regulations which were made known to you by the Circular instruction of the 8th of January, 1851, as to add to the clause heretofore inserted in the certificates in question, granting "all the rights and capacities of a "natural-born British subject, except the capacity of "being a member of the Privy Council or a member of "either House of Parliament, and except any rights and "capacities of a natural-born British subject out of and "beyond the dominions of the British Crown and the "limits thereof;" the following words, "other than "such as may be conferred upon him by the grant of a "passport from the Secretary of State to enable him to "travel in foreign parts."

I am, &c.

3.

Sir, Foreign Office, November 17, 1860.

A question having arisen as to the effect of certificates of naturalization granted by the Senate of the Ionian Islands, I am directed by Lord J. Russell to acquaint you that such certificates do not imply that the persons to whom they are granted are entitled to British protection in the countries to which their national allegiance is due.

You will bear this in mind, in all cases of claims to British protection made by persons in virtue of certificates of naturalization granted to them by an Ionian Senate.

I have, &c.

Her Majesty's Consul.

4.

Sir, Foreign Office, December 8, 1860.

It has come to my knowledge that some doubt has been entertained by certain of Her Majesty's Consuls abroad as to the course which they should pursue when application is made to them by persons holding certificates of naturalization as British subjects, for the renewal of passports granted to them by the Secretary of State.

I think it therefore right to explain to you that certificates of British naturalization are ordinarily granted on the assumption that the persons to whom they have been granted have their usual domicile in this country; and in order to prevent any attempt to evade the obligation as regards domicile, the passports granted to persons naturalized as British subjects since the 24th of August 1850, to enable them to travel abroad, contain a limitation as to the time for which such passports are valid.

Her Majesty's Consuls abroad are therefore not authorized to issue new passports to persons naturalized as British subjects since the above-mentioned date, neither are they authorized to extend the period for which passports have originally been granted to naturalized British subjects; the only exception being that passports strictly limited to a return to England may be granted to such persons when their original passports have expired, if applied for within six months after the expiration, the original passport being in that case retained in the Consulate by which the new one is granted,

I am, &c,

Her Majesty's Consul.

5.

Sir, Foreign Office, July 21, 1863.

Earl Russell's attention having been frequently drawn to cases in which foreigners, naturalized in British Colonies, claim British protection from Her Majesty's Representatives and Consuls abroad, I am directed by his Lordship to state to you that the mere fact of a foreigner having been naturalized in a British Colony does not entitle such foreigner to British protection out of the Colony in which the certificate of naturalization may have been granted, nor does it entitle him to claim a British passport.

I am to add, that Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies will instruct the Governors of British Colonies to make the above principle clearly understood in granting certificates of naturalization.

I am, &c.

Her Majesty's Consul.

6.

SIR, Foreign Office, May 21, 1866.

I HAVE to acquaint you that I have arranged with the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department that I should send instructions to Her Majesty's Ministers and Consuls abroad, directing them to extend to persons naturalized in British Colonies, and holders of Passports either from the Colonial Governors or from the Foreign Office, bearing on the face of them the place of naturalization and the period for which the passports are good, the same protection during that period as they are now in the habit of extending to persons holding passports in which they are described as "naturalized British subjects."

I have to instruct you to act in conformity with this arrangement.

You will understand that passports granted to persons naturalized in the Colonies, like passports granted to naturalized British subjects generally, cannot, as a general rule, be renewed by any of Her Majesty's Ministers or Consuls abroad; but, in order to relieve any such persons from inconvenience in case they should have remained abroad beyond the time specified in their passports, you are authorized in any such cases to give such parties, in exchange for their original passports, passports strictly limited to the time required for a direct journey back to the United Kingdom, or to any of Her Majesty's Possessions abroad; but no second passport of the same kind must be given, without the case being submitted to this Office, to a person who shall appear to have prolonged his stay beyond that limit.

I am, &c.

Her Majesty's Consul.

(L.)

EXTRACT from Mr. Vernon Harcourt's Letter to the "Times" on British Nationality (published in the "Times" of the 12th of February 1868.)

"The point to which I desire to call particular attention is that of criminal jurisdiction over aliens. It is well known what the law of England now is, viz., that, while British subjects are amenable in case of particular offences to trial in this country for acts committed abroad, foreigners cannot be tried here for any offence committed out of the realm. The jurisdiction for offences committed beyond the realm even in the case of British subjects is of comparatively modern growth in our law. Before the reign of Henry VIII., if one British subject killed another abroad he could only be tried by the same military tribunal of the Constable and Marshal, even though the victim died in England, 'because the stroke was given there where no visne can come.' (3 Inst., p. 48.) And so strict was the rule of venue that it is said, till the time of Edward VI., if the blow was struck in one English county and the death occurred in another, the murderer could not be tried in either. The policy of the statutes of Henry VIII. has been adopted and extended by more recent enactments. But it seemed hardly settled law till the case of 'R. v. Sawyer' (2 C. & K.), at the commencement of this century, that an Englishman could be tried for the murder of another Englishman out of the dominions of the Crown. Nor was it ever determined till the case of 'R. v. Azzopandi,' that an English subject could be tried in England for the murder of a foreigner abroad. Indeed, to this day many good lawyers doubt the soundness of this last decision. It is, however, clear law that a foreigner cannot be tried in England for the murder either of a foreigner or of an Englishman. ('R. v. Lewis,' D. & B., 1857.) Now the result of this state of the law is strange and unsatisfactory enough; if an Englishman and an American are together in a foreign ship or in a foreign land, if the Englishman kills the American and comes to England, he will be hanged; but if the American kills the Englishman and comes to England, he cannot be tried—a consequence not very consistent with the theory that the laws of England are made mainly for the protection of Englishmen. For some offences, like that of murder, a remedy is provided in treaties of extradition, but to many cases, and especially to those of political offences, extradition is not applied; and in all cases extradition is employed at the demand and for the benefit of the country to which the offender is given up, and not of that where he is found. Cases of great barbarity may and do constantly occur which escape with impunity, to the great scandal of law and order. For instance, a foreign ship comes into the Thames or the Mersey. The foreign captain has barbarously ill-used one or more of his foreign crew on the high seas. The victims of his cruelty may languish or even die in our hospitals, yet the offender may walk the streets of London or Liverpool without punishment. Ought such things to be, or ought such a state of law to continue?

"That, historically speaking, this strict rule of the locality of criminal jurisdiction had its origin in England in the curiously technical doctrine of venue, I think, cannot be doubted. I do not wish, however, to rest the discussion solely on that ground, because I am quite aware that writers of considerable authority have contended that the locality of criminal jurisdiction is a general and sound principle of law. I do not purpose at this moment to go into that which is a somewhat abstruse question, or to embark your readers in the technical learning of 'real, personal, and mixed statutes,' which the discussions of the civilians have left even darker than they found it. I shall for the present take a rougher, but perhaps not less satisfactory, method, and inquire what is the actual practice of modern nations on the point.

"The American practice is identical with, and derived from, the English doctrine. But that of all, or almost all, the Continental nations differs from it altogether. The French law, in the Code d'Instruction Criminelle, has the following provisions, Arts. 5 and 6:—

"'Tout Français qui se rendra coupable hors du territoire de la France d'un crime attentatoire à la sûreté de l'Etat, de contrefaction du sceau de l'Etat, de monnaies nationales ayant cours, de papiers nationaux, &c., pourra être poursuivi, jugé, et puni en France d'après les dispositions des lois Françaises.'

"This is, of course, in conformity with the principles of the English law. But then comes the following important provision:—

"Cette disposition pourra être étendue aux étrangers qui, auteurs ou complices des mêmes crimes, seraient arrêtés en France ou dont le Gouvernement obtiendrait l'extradition.'

"Here it will be seen that in respect of foreigners found on French territory (leaving out of consideration for the present the question of extradition) jurisdiction is assumed for a particular class of offences committed abroad—viz., offences against the State. The discussions which took place on the Commission by which the Code was drawn up are reported in the instructive and interesting work of Baron Locré. The arguments on both sides of this particular question when this provision was resolved on will be found in vol. xxiv, p. 112-521. The Arch-Chancellor who presided over the Commission, says:—'Si après avoir machiné dans sa patrie le bouleversement de la nation; et si après avoir donné toutes les suites qu'il a pu à ses projets, il vient ensuite en France, il ne doit pas y jouir de l'impunité,'—a sentiment which is certainly good sense, and which I believe is sound law. It was quite admitted that there might be practical difficulties in enforcing the principle, and that in policy it might be unwise always to press it. Accordingly the word sera, in the original draught, was changed into pourra, and the power was made discretionary (facultative). This is the law of France. That of most of the States of Europe is identical as to the class of offences. The details of the several codes will be found at length in M. Fœlix's excellent book (L. ii, tit. ix, cap. iii). Some States go further, and apply the jurisdiction to other classes of crime, but all, I think, assume it in the case of injury to the State itself. For the present I wish to confine the discussion to this particular class of offences. M. Ortolan, in his 'Eléments de Droit Penal,' where a very good discussion of the whole question will be found, enumerates, if I remember right, about 20 States where these provisions obtain.

"Here, then, we have a concurrence of both the elements which are essential to establish a rule of International Law—viz. (1), the sound principle that a State may, if it chooses, make such a rule with respect to aliens within its jurisdiction; (2), the fact that by the usage of the majority of States such a rule is actually made. Why, then, should we refuse to adopt a rule which is clearly for the advantage of our own State? If the French law authorizes criminal jurisdiction over an Englishman taken in France for offences committed abroad against the French State, why should the English Government deliberately refuse to arm itself with the same power of self-defence against a Frenchman? We cannot decline their jurisdiction over our subjects in such cases, and why should we not claim our own jurisdiction over their subjects in a similar case?

"These are questions which deserve the attentive consideration of statesmen. My object has been to show that in the principles of International Law they will find no obstacles in adopting such a course, if it is thought on the whole to be politic. That was a necessary preliminary for all those who do not think that nations ought to be governed solely by the question of whether it is 'worth while to go to war,' but, on the contrary, believe there is such a thing as right and wrong even between nations. In writing on such matters I always desire to deal quite fairly with your readers, and to state both sides of the case with impartiality. When questions are settled by authority and open to no reasonable doubt, like those with which I have recently had to deal, there is no occasion to express a hesitation for which there is no ground. It is otherwise with questions like the present, upon which there exists a real and reasonable difference of opinion among competent writers. I confess it was not without some difficulty that I have been able to overcome in my own mind the inveterate prejudice in which an English lawyer is bred in favour of the exclusive doctrine of the locality of criminal jurisdiction. From the best consideration I have been able to give to the matter, I have come to the conclusion that the Anglo-Saxon doctrine and practice on this point is wrong and impolitic, and that the Continental view and law is right and wise. I do not expect that everyone will share this opinion: but I hope I have said enough to induce them, at least, to examine it.

"I do not deny that there may be considerable practical difficulties which may surround the subject in some instances. But that is equally true as to the jurisdiction we already assume in the case of our own subjects for offences committed abroad, and whatever the difficulties may be, they can afford no argument against a discretionary power such as the French law assumes. If France can deal with these difficulties, why cannot we do so? I ought, in fairness to your readers, to tell them that Sir G. C. Lewis—a philosopher and statesman whom all men regard, and for whose judgment I in particular have a peculiar reverence—has, in his pamphlet on Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition, expressed a preference for the system of extradition over that of this species of jurisdiction. In that paper, full of his characteristic fairness and learning, all that can be said on that side of the question will be found.

"But it should be observed, first of all, that to the particular case of offences which we have been considering extradition is not properly applicable. If a man comes here having committed a crime against the subject of a foreign State, or perhaps against the State itself, extradition is the proper remedy. But the situation of a man who has come here having committed abroad an offence against our own State, or our own subjects, is not in the proper or usual sense of the word an object of extradition. We may say, 'We will not transact your criminal jurisdiction for you, do it for yourself.' We can hardly say the same of crimes that solely concern ourselves. On the other side of the question a paper in the 'American Jurist,' vol. xxii, page 381, by Mr. Luther S. Cushing, of Boston—as excellent a piece of legal reasoning as I have ever met with—is well worthy of consideration. It is satisfactory to find that one of the strongest arguments for such an alteration of law comes from America. It is now generally admitted that the Anglo-Saxon doctrine of allegiance and citizenship must be reviewed. My object has been further to point out that this question cannot and ought not to be taken alone. While we are willing to relax our hold upon persons who have left the realm, we ought to extend and strengthen our jurisdiction over those who may choose to place themselves within its protection and control. It will be observed that if we assume (as we have a right to assume) similar jurisdiction in all respects on all persons, whether subjects or aliens, within the realm, the whole difficulty as to the distinction between native-born and naturalized subjects of foreign States will become immaterial and disappear; for we shall trust them both alike—i. e., as precisely on the same footing as our own subjects.

"I have only indicated in outline the nature of this general scheme for settling a question of great importance and admitted difficulty. Let it be discussed with fairness, and determined with prudence, for it is a matter in which the peace of nations is deeply involved. I believe that, subject to proper limitations and conditions, the real solution will be found in the concurrent admission and establishment of three principles—1. A general right of expatriation. 2. An universal criminal jurisdiction over all persons within a State, whether subjects or aliens, alike, for offences, wheresoever committed, against that State, and, perhaps, against its subjects. 3. A liberal and extended practice of extradition. The obstacles to the settlement of these questions exist not so much in any difficulties of law or considerations of policy, but rather in the combined influence of pride and ignorance operating upon popular prejudice. It is the true and wholesome business of public discussion to enlighten that ignorance, and to mitigate that pride. We are beginning to see that to claim a dominion over persons who have renounced their country is, after all, not such a very fine thing. It requires but a step further to comprehend that a claim to immunity for the crimes of its citizens against other States is not a legitimate object of national ambition; and that to become the great asylum of unpunished rascality is not the best title to the first place in the civilized world. When these things are better understood nations will be less jealous of that which conduces to the mutual advantage of all. They will be less apt to quarrel, and far less eager to fight. "HISTORICUS.

"Temple, February 11."

M.

REPORT of the COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS concerning the RIGHTS of AMERICAN CITIZENS in FOREIGN STATES, in the House of Representatives, January 27, 1868.

Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign states, accompanied by the following report, which was ordered to be printed in the "Globe":—

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred "so much of the President's message as relates to our foreign affairs," also House resolutions Nos. 100, 111, 159, and 166, instructing the committee to inquire into and report upon the subject of the rights of American citizens in foreign countries; as well as 63 resolutions and memorials adopted in public meetings held by citizens of different sections of the country, praying that action be taken to secure to citizens of the United States protection abroad, respectfully report:—

The treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain at the close of the War of Independence left unsettled three subjects of international importance: First, the impressment of seamen; second, the right of search; and third, the question of expatriation. The impressment of seamen had long been practised under the most absolute of the monarchs of England, and little discrimination was there made between subjects and foreigners.

The right to search American vessels had been asserted and exercised by Great Britain from the recognition of American independence. Both claims were justified upon the theory of intrinsic and perpetual allegiance of all persons born subject to the British crown. The enforcement of this doctrine by the arrest and search of American vessels on the high seas, the impressment of American seamen, and the imprisonment of such as would not fight against their country, led to the war with Great Britain in 1812, which resulted in the triumph of our forces by sea and land. The treaty of peace did not in terms surrender these claims, but they were abandoned in practice. No impressment has been attempted since the war closed. A feeble effort to establish the right of search in a qualified form was made in the quintuple treaty negotiated in 1841, for the ostensible purpose of suppressing the slave trade and piracy, by the five great powers—England, France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia. Having been declined by the United States, and not being ratified by France, the treaty failed. The exercise of the right of search and impressment of seamen, which led to the war of 1812, have therefore been abandoned. But the claim is still maintained. The very earnest appeals of Mr. Webster, made as late as 1842, enforcing the wisdom and public necessity of removing this ground of past complaint and future danger, were promptly but politely rejected.

The question of the right of expatriation, the most important of all, and upon which both these claims rested, still remains unsettled, and under different circumstances becomes one of the most important questions of our day.

At the commencement of the war of 1812 the number of emigrants in the United States did not exceed 120,000. International difficulties prevented any considerable emigration from 1810 to 1816. The actual returns from 1820 to 1867, added to the estimated emigration from 1790 to 1820, show that the total emigration to this country from Europe since the declaration of independence is 6,640,000 persons. No more important question can arise than that which concerns the relations of this portion of the American people to the governments they have abandoned and that of their adoption. The English law holds them and their descendants as British subjects, "at least to the second "generation, and perhaps for ever."* The theory of a double allegiance is discarded, and they and their descendants, even though born of a foreign mother, are inexorably and for ever held to the service of native-born subjects, incapable of disavowing their allegiance to the mother country or of acquiring a legal citizenship in another land, and liable to punishment as traitors if found in a time of war in the army or navy of their adopted country.

During a general war in Europe they would be deprived of the privileges of travel or commerce; and in the event of participation by this Government in such war, which is not impossible, they would be liable to punishment as traitors by European or American governments, whether yielding compulsory service to one or the other. The execution of naturalized citizens of the United States when captured in the American army by the British troops, who claimed them as British subjects during the late war, was only prevented by the President's orders for retaliation on British soldiers. Deprived of recognized citizenship, debarred from the privileges of travel or commerce in peace, and exposed to punishment in time of war, they are without safety and without rights. The commission of public crimes could not more effectually strip them of privileges which in every age and in all parts of the world have been the accompaniments of civilization and freedom. At the opening of our national career Great Britain attempted to enforce her claims upon her natural-born subjects beyond her territorial jurisdiction, arresting American ships and impressing American seamen under their own flag. The actual sufferers were few in number. Now, after the lapse of half a century a similar claim is enforced against a nation of people; not, it is true, as before, upon their own soil or under their own flag, but wherever found within the jurisdiction of other nations. In the first contest their success would have driven American sailors from the ocean. In this it would deprive masses of the American people of privileges that were never denied to any nation, retaining any sense of the value of personal liberty. It is scarcely to be supposed that it can be pressed to this extent; but if the doctrine be inapplicable to masses of people it is unjust that it should be enforced against individual citizens in a manner to disturb the peace of a nation.

The correspondence transmitted to Congress shows that naturalized citizens of the United States being present in Great Britain, without the commission of any offence, have been arrested, tried, convicted, sentenced, and punished as criminals, upon the ground that they were natural-born subjects of the Crown; that their allegiance was perpetual and indefeasible, except by its consent; and that they were therefore subject to its laws and liable to punishment not only for offences committed within its jurisdiction, but for words spoken and acts performed in the United States. They claim the protection of their adopted country which has made them citizens and conferred upon them the same rights both at home and abroad which are enjoyed by native-born Americans. The Government is in duty bound to listen to their appeal, and to protect them in their rights. The President called the especial attention of Congress to this subject in his last annual message.

It is not our province to examine laws of England under which these prosecutions have been conducted; but as the English judges appeal to the law authorities of this country in justification of their course, it may not be inappropriate to consider the origin and nature of the claim of indefeasible and perpetual allegiance to the British Crown. The principal authority cited in its support is found in Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, as follows:—

"Natural allegiance is such as is due from all men born within the sovereign's dominions, immediately upon their birth; for, immediately upon their birth, they are under the protection of the Crown, at a time, too, when (during infancy) they are incapable of protecting themselves. Natural allegiance is, therefore, a debt of gratitude which cannot be forfeited, cancelled, or altered by any change of time, place, or circumstance, nor by anything but the united concurrence of the legislature. An Englishman who removes to France or to China owes the same allegiance to the King of England there as at home, and 20 years hence as well as now; for it is a principal of universal law that the natural-born subject of one prince cannot by any act of his own—no, not by swearing allegiance to another, put off or discharge his natural allegiance to the former; for this natural allegiance was intrinsic and primitive and antecedent to the other, and cannot be divested without the concurrent act of that prince to whom it was first due."—Vol. I. p. 368.

The Commentaries of Blackstone have probably never had greater weight with any people than in this country. In the discussions preceding the Revolution it was the authority mainly relied upon by the colonists in their contest with the mother country for constitutional liberty. More copies of his work were purchased in America than had been sold in Great Britain up to the time of the Revolution. It is not forgotten, however, that he supported in parliament principles of law in direct opposition to those of his Commentaries. Blackstone was the servant of power, and it was not without justice that Junius said of him that "he recollected he "had a place to preserve, though he forgot he had a "reputation to lose." But the American constitution is itself proof that Blackstone's theory of allegiance was not accepted by the American governments. He claimed for the sovereign absolute power. He left to the subject nothing but servile submission. The American statesmen reversed the proposition. In their system the people were absolute and the ruler a representative only. According to the philosophy of Blackstone the people were a possession of the government. Under the American system the government was the property of the people. They reserved to the body-politic collectively the power of reforming its institutions at pleasure, and left to the people individually the right of transferring their allegiance to other governments whenever the safety of life, the welfare of the subject, or liberty of conscience should demand it.

There are no rules of universal authority by which governments are guided in regulating the rights of subjects. The controversy existing between this country and England, and in a less degree with European states, in regard to the rights conferred by emigration and naturalization is a contest between feudal ideas and those that govern civilized states. Feudalism held all rights dependent upon the possession of the soil. The soil was the gift of the crown. Allegiance was due to the crown and controlled by the place of birth, and all the obligations of the people were summed up in that of personal fidelity to the king. It was more absolute in England as established by William the Conqueror than on the Continent under Charlemagne or the Gothic kings.

The oath of allegiance administered to the landowners of England by William the Conqueror at Salisbury, in 1086, sets forth this obligation and the reason upon which it is founded with more authority than in the paraphrase given us by Blackstone. Observe the oath to the crown: "I BECOME YOUR MAN FROM THIS "DAY FORTH, of life and limb and earthly worship, "and unto you will be faithful, and bear you faith for "the land I hold of you. So help me God."

The feudal law of Europe claimed allegiance to the crown from the barons, and that of lesser lords and landholders to the barons in turn. The English monarch held all alike in subjection to the crown. Other laws extended the principle to strangers, who were required to live and die in the king's quarrels, to serve in his wars, and to lodge only in English houses. The king's writ, ne exeat Regno, instead of being limited as now to processes of civil courts, obliged his subjects to remain within the realm, or recalled them from beyond the seas, and this "not merely in respect to attempts pre-judicial to the state, but from the king's right to the attendance and service of his liege men within the realm." No merchant was allowed to remain in the country above 40 days, no host to receive a lodger for more than three nights, and no man to wander from the highway without sounding a horn, under penalty of death.

* "Unless the British Government consents to their ancestor's expatriation, the same posterity must be treated as British at least to the second generation, and perhaps for ever."—Westlake's Private International Law, page 23.

The doctrine taught by Blackstone is hardly less absolute in principle than these provisions of the laws of Alfred, William, and later kings, upon which his theory is founded. It is unnecessary to say that in this age such doctrines have no claim to respect. The truth is now universally recognized in theory if not in practice: the world belongs to its people. Political institutions are rather for them than for their rulers. Under every form of administration it is now admitted that Governments are for the people, if not by them; and in this view they claim that "that which is best administered is best."

This is true of European States, but especially of England. The great charters of later English history and the popular rights secured by them attest this fact. The feudal theory of allegiance in England was early modified by the statute of Henry VII., which declared that no one was to be called in question for obeying a king de facto: denying the theory of divine right, and recognizing partially the revolutionary doctrines of possession and power. This is regarded as the basis of modern English allegiance.

The revolution of 1688 was the foundation of the present British constitution and overthrew all feudal institutions. The king no longer held power exclusively from tenure, birth, or possession, but by the consent of the people. He obtained from their representatives year by year authority for his Government, and supplies for the maintenance of his army and navy. Instead of being held by the king to the soil on which they were born, the people forbade the king to leave the kingdom without the consent of their representatives. "Sovereignty," they said, "was in the king with the Parliament." Without the recognition and support of the representatives of the people he had no power. Such is the comparison which history forces upon us between the Governments of William of Normandy, in 1086, and that of William of Orange, in 1688. And such is the contrast between the principles of allegiance contended for by Blackstone and English judges of the present day, and that which is sustained by the principles of modern history based upon public reason and justice.

Restrictive legislation, which forbade subjects to leave, or strangers to enter the kingdom, has been swept away. The prerogative of kings, though sometimes exercised in such matters during the bloodier periods of European history, has been resisted and its abuse punished with exile or death. The Chinese have been compelled to abandon their system of isolation and exclusion, maintained for many thousand years. Within our own time it has been held by all civilized nations that a government of isolation and exclusion presented in itself just grounds of war.

Such changes in the constitution of England and the States of Europe demonstrate that the doctrine of feudal supremacy, which is the basis of feudal allegiance as now upheld, ought to be without authority or force in any form of government existing in this age.

Having made war upon a nation so distant as that of China, disturbing so little the rest of the world by the movements of her people or the character of her Government, it scarcely becomes the English or European Governments to maintain the principles of absolute and perpetual power over their natural-born subjects, or the supremacy of municipal law against the laws of nations and the progress of civilization.

Of the Service due to Government.

It is not to be denied that there is between the Government and the subject an equitable and mutual interest; neither can it be denied that there is due from every citizen to the Government under which he lives certain obligations, and that the service which is implied by these obligations, whether or not supported by his oath, cannot be cast off without its consent. This is but a just return for the protection which he receives from the Government which attends him from his birth, and secures after death the preservation and disposition of his property according to his will so long as his name or race shall endure. This does not arise so much from any special or implied contract made in the organization of society as from the law of necessity and of nature. It is inherent in every form of civilized society, and is as apparent and as absolute in an unorganized company of individuals as it is in village, city, State, or nation. No man is permitted anywhere among civilized men to look with unconcern upon any outrage inflicted upon the persons or property of a company of which he is a member, without at least signifying to the extent of his ability his opposition to the wrong, and defeating it if in his power. This mutual obligation extends to the protection of property, the preservation of the public peace, as well as to the security of life. The same obligation rests upon a subject in regard to the Government under which he lives. He is bound to assist in its protection, to aid in its support by the contribution of his means or his labour, to maintain its honour unimpaired, to strengthen its capacity for usefulness by the performance of every duty which is necessary to the peace and prosperity of society, and to defend it in peril with his life if necessary. Failure in the performance of such duties is justly condemned and punished by all Governments. But the recognition of these varied and important obligations can in no wise be held to render such subjects and their descendants to the second and third generations perpetual prisoners of any association, society, or form of government. So long as they are of it they must fulfil their obligations, whatever they are. A mere contingent or possible obligation cannot rightly be made by construction, absolute and perpetual, controlling the actions and life of the subject from whom it is due wherever he may be found.

But if, from causes appertaining to the conscience or safety, the welfare of a subject or his family is to be improved by separation from that society of which he is a member, the laws of nature and the practice of all civilized nations, ancient and modern, justify him, within reasonable limits, in severing that connexion; otherwise, in a State which has an established religion, any citizen might be compelled to conform to its doctrines, and to leave his descendants to the same mental and moral servitude, deprived of the freedom of belief, and without that freedom of worship to which, according to the laws of nature and of God, every man is entitled. Society is necessary to the existence of man, and government indispensable to his civilization, prosperity, and power. But the perpetual subjection of every person born within its jurisdiction, without consent and in disregard of protest or removal, is not necessary in any form of political society. It does not rest upon any theory of justice, and the whole course of civilization disproves its justice or wisdom. It is a power that does not attach to a State which has for its object the welfare of all its members, but to a despotism that knows no duty and cares for no interest but to strengthen and perpetuate the power of rulers. The law of allegiance and of service is as essential to a republic as it is to a monarchy. It is not a mere matter of agreement, convenience, or utility; it is a necessity. Every form of government depends upon it, and dissolution awaits all forms of society to which it is denied.

But here the parallel ends. The authority of despotic governments is force; that of a State is the consent of its people.

The claim of indefeasible allegiance and perpetual service is the symbol of feudalism and force. The right of emigration and naturalization, where life or liberty is insecure, or where the prerogatives of conscience are violated, is wrought into the constitutions of all governments of choice. The feudal claim is as absolute over the mind as the body. It denies liberty of conscience and of thought by the same title that it proscribes the right of locomotion. It dwarfs human capacity and reason and corrupts the nature of man and society.

Of the Consent of Governments.

It may justly be conceded that the express or implied consent of both parties is necessary to the extinction of mutual obligations between a Government and its subject. But this does not justify the perpetual control of one by the force of the other. It assumes that it is the right and duty of the Government to so regulate the manner of separation as to secure in the highest degree the welfare of both. It is to this natural law that we refer the right to regulate, not defeat, emigration and naturalization, which together constitute expatriation. But a Government cannot justly admit one and deny the other.

A subject may justly be held to the complete performance of all obligations actually due to the Government at the time of separation. In a period of war or when public peace is threatened, every form of political society is justified by natural as well as municipal law in holding its members to the fulfilment of their duties until the crisis is past. In moments of public peril it might with justice forbid emigration so long as the common danger continued. But this exercise of power must be continued as incident to a present exigency of the State. It cannot be just that a citizen who has withdrawn in a time of peace, with the actual or implied consent of the Government, is to be held, himself and his descendants, for ever responsible for the conduct of that Government or the perils which it may encounter; or that he is bound under such circumstances to render the same service in its defence or make the same sacrifice for its support which could have been demanded had its connexion remained unbroken.

The reciprocal protection which is the basis of the obligation due from a subject to the State is rightfully terminated by a permitted removal, and leaves no foundation for the subsequent claim of perpetual service. The State would be justified, in anticipation of immediate or approaching public peril, in prohibiting many acts threatening its present or its future safety. In this view the decree of Charles I. in 1637-38, denying the right of departure to "passengers" for New England "as idle and refractory persons whose only or principal "end is to live out of the reach of authority where they "take liberty to nourish and preserve their schismatical "factions," might be justifiable as defeating an organization detrimental, if not destructive, to his throne. In this he did not merely assert a right, but he averted by his acts an immediate danger. Whether the result was more fortunate for his crown than to have allowed these "passengers"—among whom were Pym, Hampden, and Cromwell—the liberty of emigration, and how far despotic rulers ought to take warning from the fatal consequences that followed the exercise of such power in this particular case, his successors may be called upon to determine.

Rule of International Law.

International law does not control nations in the conduct of municipal affairs. It leaves them to the good sense of every independent State. It does not, therefore, present any positive rule by which Governments are to be guided. Nevertheless the opinions of writers of recognized authority upon national and international law, whose judgments are universally respected, ought not to be without weight in this discussion. With few exceptions, and those least important, they favour the largest liberty consistent with public safety in emigration and naturalization, which, taken together, complete the act of expatriation:

"Since one is a subject in regard that he constitutes, with others, one republic, into which he willingly enters, it follows from thence that one ceases to be a citizen so soon as he willingly removes with that design from his native country and joins himself to another State, settling there his fortune and family, unless the laws forbid subjects to remove."—Heinecius, B. 2, S. 230.

"A man should not leave his country or the State of which he is a member in time of war or great distress, but in a time of peace he may do so if he pleases."—Grotius.

"Where the liberty of removal hath been promiscuously allowed, and the subject settles himself and his effects under the protection of a foreign State, the Commonwealth which he left hath no longer any authority over him."—Puffendorf, B. 8, Ch. 11.

"Every man is born free; and the son of a citizen, when come to the years of discretion, may examine whether it be convenient for him to join the society for which he was destined by his birth. If he does not find it advantageous to remain in it, he is at liberty to quit it on making compensation for what it has done in his favour, and preserving, as far as new engagements will allow him, the sentiments of love and gratitude he owes it. A man's obligations to his natural country may, however, change, lessen, or entirely vanish, accordingly as he may have quitted it lawfully, and with good reason, in order to choose another, or has been banished from it deservedly or unjustly in due form of law or by violence."—Vattel.

"In England the subjects are under a stronger and more particular obligation to the sovereign than elsewhere in virtue of a right which they there call allegiance; but this does not prevent the English from withdrawing from the kingdom without the permission of the king; and when they have established themselves elsewhere neither the authority of the king nor of the laws of the kingdom have any further power over them."—Wicquefort, section 11, book 1, Ambassador.

"It is a right inherent in all free people to have the liberty of removal if they think proper. When a person becomes a member of a State he does not thereby renounce the care of himself and his affairs. He may seek the necessaries and conveniences of life elsewhere. The subjects of a State cannot be denied the liberty of settling elsewhere in order to procure those advantages which they do not enjoy in their native country."—Burlemaqui.

"The particular duties of citizens terminate with the offices from which they flowed; but as to general duties, they subsist as long as one continues to be a citizen and until that character is lost. Now, a man ceases to be a citizen in one of these ways: 1. When he goes to establish himself elsewhere; 2. When he is banished; 3. In case of subjection to a foreign Power."—Felice, Droit des Gens.

"On the other hand, except in cases of great necessity, where it is intended to call out the strength of the society, the civil power, considered simply as such, has no right to restrain emigration and the disposition to settle elsewhere; this right not being necessary for the perpetuation of the body politic, and the inhabitants of a country being by nature sufficiently attached to it (if the government be tolerable) without being detained."—Vicat.

"Man, whose subsistence depends upon his industry, ought naturally to seek happiness wherever he can find it. Want and misery make the law for him in this respect. If his native country offers him resources it is his nature to be attached to it. If it does not, by what right—I will add with what motive—shall we seek to arrest and to punish him? May he not say, "Give me and my family assurance of support, or let me seek it elsewhere?" The law of nature, which is that of self-preservation, will be to eternity stronger than all the maxims and calculations which politics can present. We are wrong to say that this man injures his country by carrying his industry abroad. He may justly reply that his industry is his own, and that he has a right to carry it where it can furnish him subsistence."—Raynewal.

"In times of peace it would seem unjust and dishonourable to any State to hinder its citizens from selling their lands and removing to any other State they please, and freeing themselves from their former political relation. For the several subjects, by the taxes or tributes which they pay annually, compensate all the ordinary advantages which they receive from the community, and it would be unjust to hinder them from consulting better their own interest, if they can, elsewhere. Nor is there danger that any State will be deserted by many of its subjects unless it be either miserably constituted or administered, and in such cases the citizens have a better right to quit it and cannot be compelled to remain its subjects."—Hutcheson's Moral Philosophy.

"Men may relinquish their country from a sense of insecurity, oppression, annoyance, or inconvenience, and emigration ought neither to be prohibited nor discouraged."—Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy.

"Considered from an international point of view, the jurisdicton of a nation must be founded either upon the person or the property being within its territory; considered from a civil point of view, jurisdiction may be founded upon natural as well as local allegiance; in other words, every independent State claims to make laws perpetually binding upon its natural-born subjects wherever they may be. But natural allegiance or the obligation of perpetual obedience to the Government of the country wherein a man may happen to have been born, which he cannot forfeit or cancel, or vary by any change of time or place or circumstance, is the creature of civil law, and finds no countenance in the law of nations, as it is in direct conflict with the incontestable rule of that law. 'Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur.'"—Twiss's Law of Nations, page 231.

"Formerly it was doubted whether an individual had a right to quit his country and settle elsewhere without leave from his Government; and in some countries he who did go had to sacrifice a part of his property.* At present such a right is very generally conceded under certain limitations. "The right of emigration," says Heffter, "is inalienable; only self-imposed or unfulfilled obligations can restrict it." The relation of the subject to the sovereign is a voluntary one, to be terminated by emigration; but a State is not bound to allow the departure of its subjects until all pre-existing lawful obligations to the State have been satisfied. Notice, therefore, may be required of an intent to emigrate, and security be demanded for the satisfaction of back-standing obligations, before the person in question is allowed to leave the country. †De Martens writes to the effect:‡

"It belongs to the universal and positive public law to determine how far the State is authorized to restrict or prevent the emigration of the natives of a country. Although the bond which attaches a subject to the State of his birth or his adoption be not indissoluble, every State has a right to be informed beforehand of the design of one of its subjects to expatriate himself, and to examine whether, by reason of crime or debt or engagements not yet fulfilled towards the State, it is authorized to retain him longer. These cases excepted, it is no more justified in prohibiting him from emigrating than it would be in prohibiting foreign sojourners from doing the same. These principles have always been followed in Germany. They have been sanctioned even by the federal pack of the German Confederation, as far as relates to emigration from the territory of one member of the Confederation to that of another."—Woolsey's International Law, page 142.

"While almost all the nations of Europe are ignorant of the constituent principles of society, and regard the people only as beasts of a farm, cultivated for the benefit of the owner, we are astonished, we are edified, that your thirteen republics should know at once the dignity of man, and should have drawn from the sources of the wisest philosophy the principles by which they are disposed to be governed."—Abbe de Mably to Mr. Adams, Minister to Holland.

"One of the principal objects of police is to hinder the subjects from emigrating in too great numbers. It is for the public, universal or particular, law to determine to what degree a sovereign is permitted to restrain the natural liberty of those subjects who wish to quit the territory for a long time or expatriate themselves entirely. A foreigner, as long as he remains so, and has not contracted debts or committed crimes, is entirely at liberty to quit the State when he pleases; it is only in case of collision, reprisal, or war that a state is justifiable in detaining a foreigner against his will. This liberty, founded on the universal law of nations, is confirmed and even extended by a great number of treaties,§ and accordingly it is rarely violated; but a foreigner, formally naturalized, has no more right to exemption from this restraint than those who are born subjects of a state, unless he made express or tacit conditions on the subject."—Von Marten's Law of Nations, 87.

"Citizenship ceases by penal or voluntary expatriation. In the first case the country renounces all its claims upon the subject; in the second he loses his privileges by voluntary separation from the country. But even when it is not permitted by law the bonds which unite the subject to his country are not indissoluble. Being wronged by his Government, compelled to seek in other lands the well-being (bienestar) and the happiness that he is not able to find in his own, he is allowed to abandon the association to which he belongs and to establish another elsewhere. This is a right of which the civil law cannot deprive him, and in the exercise of this right, as in all others, he is to decide for himself when to dissolve the ties which bind him to his country. It is, without doubt, possible for him to abuse it, but whether or not it is abused will be a difficult question for foreign nations to decide, as they are not competent judges of the facts."—Bello, Derechos Internacional, Paris, 1864, page 75.

Municipal Laws of European States.

The enlarged and just views of these and other authors as to the inalienable rights of man must, in good time, produce their proper effect upon the legislation of the world. But unhappily the ground of our present complaint is that the municipal legislation of European states is in conflict with the principles advocated by the most enlightened jurists, who have best studied the laws of nature and of nations.

In other relations of government great advances have been made. The great states of southern Europe have abandoned in their recent organizations the political philosophy of the middle ages. There are no longer sovereigns who govern for years without a parliament, like Charles I., and there are no archbishops who, like Laud, boast that they are not likely to hear "that noise" again. The consent of the people is now the first condition of permanent or peaceful Governments. The forms of the ancient monarchies only are retained. The popular power expands with every generation in the organization of states; but as to subjects the rigid traditions of feudal law are strictly preserved. Municipal government is unimproved. It confounds police regulations with natural law: local legislation with the law of nations.

Local Legislation of European States.

We have appended to this report a resumé of the laws of the several states of Europe, given by the principal cabinet officers in answer to inquiries presented by the American Government in 1849. It is but just to suppose that a statement of laws thus made by officers best acquainted with the course of legislation and administration will be more satisfactory than any cursory examination of the various statutes could give. The correspondence from which these expositions of European law upon the subject of expatriation are taken, is printed in Executive Document 38, first session Thirty-sixth Congress.

The doctrines of Great Britain, as represented by Lord Palmerston in a letter to Mr. Bancroft, are thus stated; that while it has never been denied by the British Government that emigrants leave their country by virtue of that rihgt which has been asserted to be the foundation of all liberty, the right of every reasonable being to seek a new country, and that by the laws of Great Britain no restraint can, except in very special cases, be placed upon the perfect liberty of every British subject to leave the realm when and for whatever period he chooses, yet this expatriation, in the sense of a voluntary abjuration of natural allegiance, cannot be sanctioned without the assent of the sovereign power; nor does it debar the return of the emigrant as a natural-born subject.

Count Walewski, for the Government of France, in a despatch to Mr. Calhoun, 25th November 1859, declares that French legislation does not permit a Frenchman to renounce his nationality, but he loses it by positive law when naturalized in a foreign country. A Frenchman who emigrates, and thus places himself out of the way of military service, would assuredly be punishable on his return to France although he should have obtained a foreign naturalization. (Article 230, Nouveau Code Militaire, 1859.)

The royal decree of the Spanish Government, 17th November 1852, declares that a Spaniard naturalized within the territory of another Power without the knowledge and authority of his Government shall not exempt himself from the obligations which were consequent to his primitive nationality. The same rule is applied to foreigners naturalized in Spain. (Serrano, to the Consul General of the United States at Cuba, 14th February 1860.)

Austria requires an emigrant to disengage himself from all obligations as an Austrian subject, and he is deprived by law of the right to dispose of or inherit property. It provides punishment for those who absent themselves without passports.

In Prussia a subject loses his nationality, first, by discharge at the subject's request; second, by sentence of competent authority; third, by living 10 years in a foreign country; fourth, by marriage, if a female, with a foreigner. Subjects who emigrate without obtaining a discharge are punished according to laws in that case provided, and if they return to Prussia are considered criminals, subject to punishment from which no citizenship of any nation can liberate them. The obligation to military service is not extinguished by time. After absence of more than ten years if he returns he is held to service. Emigration is not permitted except with express leave of the Government. (Baron Gerolt to Mr. Marcy, July 11, 1853; Baron Schleinitz to Mr. Wright, 6th January 1859.)

* By the jus detractûs, droit de detraction, property to which strangers out of the country succeeded was taxed. By an analogous tax, as the gabelle d'emigration, those who left a country were amerced in part of their goods, immovable or movable. Such odious rights, says De Martens (I. sec. 90.), although existing still, are very generally abolished.

† Heffter, sec. 14, 59.

‡ Precis, &c., (Paris edition of 1858,) sec. 91.

§ Almost all the treaties of commerce contain articles on this subject, and by the greatest part of them foreigners are permitted to quit the state even in case of rupture.

The constitution of the North German Union, 1st July 1867, makes every North German citizen subject to military duty. No substitute is received. Every able-bodied man is to serve three years in the field, four years in the reserve, and then five years in the militia. Colonization and emigration are regulated by the Legislature of the Union. (Executive Document 9, second session Fortieth Congress, pages 16–23.)

The laws of Hamburg make the denationalization of a subject dependent upon his obtaining a discharge from the Government, the payment of a specified sum of money, and evidence of the fulfilment of military service in person or by substitute. (Merg. Dr., June 21, 1850.)

The Grand Duchy of Baden requires an emigrant to obtain the authorization of the Government, to show that he leaves no debts, that the country to which he emigrates will receive him, and that his wife is in accord in regard to emigration. (Encyclo. 19, 19th Siecle. T. 11, p. 433.)

Bremen fully acknowledges her obligations to give protection to all American citizens, making no distinction between naturalized and native citizens of the United States. It holds that desertion from military service in any of the German States comes under that class of offences (crimes) which will justify the surrender; and that no State could complain on the ground that such deserter had become its citizen. It cites the law of the United States to support this view. It does not regard a deserter from military service in the light of a political refugee, nor his act a political offence; and claims that desertion would be a crime in native as well as naturalized citizens. (Mr. Schleiden, minister &c., November 21, 1859.)

The laws of Hanover allow emigration with parents of children to the age of 21 years; those who emigrate without parents, up to the year preceding that when conscription takes place, and even in that year, upon proof that the emigrant betters his condition. Those who are within the age of military conscription, not yet in military service, are allowed to emigrate when their departure does not endanger the rights of others liable to service, or who give security for a substitute, in case young men should be called into service. (W. Reitzenstein, minister, &c., August 20, 1859.)

The first article of the convention between the United States and the King of Wurtemburg, October 3, 1844, provides that "every kind of droit d'aubaine, droit de "retraite, and droit de détraction, or tax on emigration, "are and shall remain abolished between the two con- "tracting parties, their States, citizens, and subjects."

The convention with Saxony has the same provisions.

The treaty with Prussia, March 14, 1829, provides that the inhabitants of the respective States of the high contracting parties—

"Shall be at liberty to sojourn and reside in all parts whatsoever of said territories in order to attend to their affairs, and shall enjoy, to that effect, the same security and protection as natives of the country wherein they reside, on condition of submission to the laws and ordinances therein prevailing."

The Russian Government so far satisfies its subjects or so exercises its power as to restrain their emigration. In either case its municipal law is innocuous to other nations, and upon this subject at least does not materially affect the interests or rights of the United States. The same remark is substantially true of France.

Review of Foreign Municipal Legislation.

There is one element of harmony that pervades foreign legislation upon this subject. The emigration of a subject is held to depend upon the consent of his Government. But the practice of the Governments in this matter varies so much as to show a substantial difference of principle. It does not appear that the consent of Great Britain, express or implied, is actually withheld from the multitudes who emigrate from her shores, or that she makes any exertion to prevent their departure, while in some of the German states the regulations are such as to imply the consent of the Government to the large emigration which seeks, in the provident language of their rulers, to improve their condition by establishing a new home in other lands. Such especially is the fact in Baden, Bremen, Hanover, and perhaps other states.

The French decrees admit a favourable interpretation also. The decree of 1811 was a war measure, established when France was in contest with the whole of Europe, and that of 1859 when fighting for the unity and freedom of Italy. Considered as interpretations of the rights of nations in a period of war, they furnish no reasonable ground of complaint. There is nothing in them that compels the French Government to insist upon them in a period of profound peace. On the contrary, it is but just to assume that an enlightened ruler like the Emperor of France, who has so constantly appealed to the people as the support and authority of his Government, and who has so largely contributed to the late reorganization of the State system of Europe, which has been characterized by the most eminent opponents of the empire as the grandest revolution of modern history, will recognize the difference between a period of war, when nations contend for their existence, and a state of profound peace, as to the absolute power of the Governments of modern times over the rights of subjects. The reserved right of assent or dissent which European states claim ought to be considered, not upon the basis of the political systems of the middle ages, but in the light of modern ideas and necessities.

Effects of Emigration on Governments.

The history of the past twenty years has greatly changed the relations of nations to each other and those of Governments to their subjects; and among the active and powerful agents in this revolution none is to be compared in its results with that of emigration. Every State has participated in it, and the most important of them have sought and found in it security and relief. This is especially true of the English Government. India and America have borne from her millions of her surplus population. Colonization extended her power, and the independence of the States she planted contributed much to her commercial supremacy. It has not only strengthened her outward power, but relieved her of the evil of an overcrowded kingdom. She was taught by her own writers that her people would be too numerous for her means of support, that labourers would exceed the demand for labour. Nothing quieted this universal apprehension so much as plans for extensive emigration. Except in the case of her colonies the Government had done little directly to encourage it. Private enterprise had directed its movements and supplied its necessities. But it became necessary to elevate emigration from a private enterprise to a public and national measure. Committees were appointed by the House of Commons which recommended national systems of emigration; schemes of colonization like those practised by earlier nations, by which, for the relief and security of the empire, whole communities were to be deported at once and occupations and homes provided for them, were advocated in Parliament and by public journals. Advances for this purpose were proposed from public taxes to be repaid by emigrants. It was estimated in Parliament that an annual appropriation of 240,000*l.* would be required to carry off the surplus of unemployed people, who would otherwise be an intolerable burden to the Government. Although this was done under the pretence of colonization, it was in reality a plan of deportation or emigration, without special regard to the countries to which the emigrants should be carried. The famine of 1848 made it necessary that the excess of Irish population especially should be reduced by emigration. The officers of the Government were authorized to borrow money for the purpose of advancing loans to such emigrants, to be repaid in five or seven years, and immense sums were raised for this purpose upon this public authority. Under the influence of such measures emigration increased from the British empire from 83,000 persons in 1831 to 336,000 in 1857, and has continued to increase to this day.

The result was an immediate relief to the destitute, and increased work and wages for those in want. This was conspicuous in Ireland, where excess of population over the supply of food and of employment led to disorder, crime, and public discontent. "From Ireland," says an eminent authority, "the tide of emigration was "directed not so much to the colonies as to the United "States, which they seemed to consider as their home "next to their own island." The great emigration from 1846 to 1854, which alarmed English politicians and threatened to depopulate Ireland, it is said again, "only "redounded to the public advantage by raising wages "and improving the condition of those who remained." "Of all those who have left our shores none have been "so greatly benefited as the Irish, whose sole possession "and inheritance was the sad one of deportation. For "them no work was too arduous, no difficulty too "great; and in their new homes they roused themselves "like giants from the sleep of years."

This exodus of a nation accomplished all that was anticipated, and has been a subject of universal congratulation among English statesmen. England profited by it in many ways. The money remitted by her emigrants in 10 years, from 1848 to 1858, through English commercial banking houses, upon their own statements to the Government, was about ten million pounds sterling (9,937,000*l.*), nearly fifty million dollars, or five millions yearly. These remittances have probably been trebled in the 10 years succeeding 1857. Thus the opponents of these Irish people found their deportation advantageous, while their friends were encouraged to hope for their speedy and complete regeneration.

The interest of the British Government in this national enterprise was beyond considerations of pecuniary advantage. Had she forbidden the emigration of her subjects, as she was bound in honour to do if she intended to enforce her claim to their service upon her theory of indefeasible allegiance, it would have added ten or twelve millions to the population of Ireland, and to that extent increased the evils of labour without employment, people without food, of misery and crime, the precursor of riot or revolution, and she would have been compelled to choose between a change of her policy towards Ireland or the extinction of an entire race of her people by violence. From such evils she has been preserved by the beneficial results of peaceful emigration to America. It was with good reason that Lord Ashburton described this emigration as "the " modern means by which the population of the world " found its level, for the benefit of all and eminently " for the benefit of humanity."

Emigration from the German States has been nearly in equal proportions, though prompted by very different motives. But it has been attended with equally beneficial results.

Europe has exported to the United States since 1790 6,640,000 of its subjects. They and their descendants now number more than twenty millions. She has received from them in remittances of money 50,000,000*l.* sterling. She monopolized the carrying trade which was thus created. Mr. J. J. Sturz, a German author, long connected with this interest, says that of 1,070 round voyages between Europe and North America made in 1865, by about 90 steamships belonging to 15 European steamship companies (ten English, three French, two German), there was but one voyage made under the American flag.* The same writer reported 22 new steamers on the stocks in Europe destined for this trade. A table from the Bureau of Statistics, appended to this report, shows that for the quarter ending September 30, 1867, the number of emigrants brought to the United States in European vessels was 86,797 (including 15,306 from British America, imported there in European vessels), and only 8,225 in American vessels. The character of the people gives another indication of the advantage that foreign Governments derive from this emigration. Steerage passengers crowd the vessels from Europe to America, but they take none back from America to Europe. And this is done under the eye of foreign Governments. Every possible aid, public and private, with statute regulations and official protection and subsidy, has been given to this work, so essential to public security and profitable for private enterprise.

It is, therefore, a continuing prosperity for Europe, political, economical, and financial. The disparity between European and American participation therein is likely to be perpetual. No preparation is made by American governments, state or national, or by her steamship owners or navigators, to share in this traffic, which numbers 350,000 passengers yearly, and is not unlikely, under the stimulus of public and private enterprise, to reach half a million.

In the presence of such facts is it to be asked whether European governments have "consented" to the exodus of these nations from her shores? Is an emigrant who came here in the steerage, and returns a regenerated man to the home of his fathers to be told that he "is a deserter," has been absent without consent and knowledge of his government, and is to serve the balance of his life in her armies or to work out his share of her debts incurred in his absence? Is a family of the second or the third generation—for such is the law—to be told that they, too, owe service to the government from which they escaped without leave, and can never return to the hearthstones or the graves of their ancestors? The pretension is preposterous, and the inquiry offensive to justice and decency. Every state is bound to know what is done within its jurisdiction, at least what it does, and to accept the legitimate consequences of its acts.

The emigrants of Europe it may be were sent here to die; but it was also possible they might live. There was at least a chance for that. Their return to a country which they had abandoned because of its excess of population and its scarcity of employment and food, could not reasonably have been expected. No stipulations were made of that character at least. It was possible that here in America they would find vacant space, comfortable shelter, healthy food, remunerative employment, and thus preserve, at least, the life God gave them —the only valuable thing they brought with them. Having escaped death by famine, and conquered for themselves a home and freedom, if not fortune and fame; having been counted among rulers in this country; who is able to satisfy them that they are here without authority, and that upon the theory of the oath made by the land barons to William the Conqueror and Charlemagne in the Middle Ages, they are yet subjects of the states they and their fathers abandoned because life was a burden, and now owe them service of mind and heart, of life and limb? Allegiance is not due to a state unable or unwilling to protect its subjects. Incapacity or disinclination is in itself an absolution from the obligation.

But it is not necessary to show the active participation of governments in this history to relieve emigrants from this bondage of feudal allegiance. It is a well settled principle of public law that sovereigns and subjects are bound by acts which receive their implied sanction. Silence in this case is the equivalent of express consent. It is implied when it is manifested by signs, acts, or facts, or by inaction or silence, which indicate consent. The law of nations is founded upon the general consent of nations, whether it be express, tacit, or presumed (Heffter, p. 3.) The sources of international law are conventions or treaties expressly or tacitly made. The latter have their origin in the actions or customs of states. (Klüber, pp. 5–183.) A nation can pledge its faith tacitly in making treaties as well as by express declaration. It is enough that its faith is given. The manner is unimportant. (2 Vattel, p. 231.)

When a nation is discontented with public administration it has a right to reform it. But if they are themselves silent and obedient they are judged to approve the conduct of their superiors, and a fragment of the people cannot resist it. (1 Vattel, 164, 199.) Blackstone says that "the consent of the crown to corporations which " exist by force of common law is implied. Kings are " presumed to have given their concurrence. The City " of London, which has long existed, is looked upon as " having the consent of the Crown; for though no " charter can be shown the law presumes one, and that " it may have been lost or destroyed." (3 Commentaries, 129.) The silence of a nation is received as its consent, when it has liberty to accord or refuse it." (Pinheiro Ferreira.)

This is universal law. To deny it would unsettle all compacts, public and private. If this doctrine be good against a people who have not power to control what they may dislike, or against defunct monarchs who cannot deny such presumptions, it is better against Governments who are present with power to inhibit and prevent acts which they do not approve. It will not be denied that emigration from Europe to the United States has been accompanied by the tacit consent, at least, of its rulers, and has therefore an authority in law as substantial as the convention and treaties to which public faith has been tacitly pledged, or the city of London, whose charter cannot be shown.

Great Britain has not for purposes of her own transplanted 4,000,000 subjects to this country, whom she could neither employ nor educate, nor feed nor govern, without knowing it; nor without knowing that when here they were likely to remain; that they were not to demand of her protection and support. She knew the separation was permanent, and she comprehended her interest in that fact. She could not doubt that being present residents they were likely to adopt the customs and become a part of the country. This was a result contemplated by Great Britain. It was the nature of the transaction. She was bound to take notice of the fact, because in recognizing the independence of the American States, she had been compelled to study the character of their Government. She knew, as they knew, that they would here find employment, become educated, possess land, create new industries, acquire wealth, obtain social distinction, receive important public commissions, participate in the Government, and be numbered among its rulers.

She knew this, because she had seen this history enacted by the colonists before the Revolution, and all along up to the war of 1812. Great Britain must have been conscious that when they came to prosperity and power they would cherish the memories of what they had enjoyed, and as well as what they had suffered. If she had capacity to consent to anything she consented to all this—emigration, naturalization, expatriation; and in absolving her Government from the burden of protection she abandoned all claim thereafter to their subjection or service. This is as clear as if done "with the united concurrence of her Legislature."

* Suggestions for the Encouragement of Emigration, by J. J. Sturtz, Washington, D. C., 1866.

The Authority of Municipal Legislation.

Lord Palmerston, in his despatch to Mr. Bancroft, cites with admiration Mr. Justice Story as authority for the doctrine which "every nation has hitherto "assumed, that its laws extend to and bind natural-"born subjects at all times and at all places;" that "every nation has an exclusive right to regulate persons "and things within its own territory according to its "own sovereign will and pleasure;" and that "in "speaking of the right of a State to bind its own native "subjects everywhere, we speak only of its own claim "and exercise of sovereignty over them, and not of its "rights to compel or require obedience to such laws "on the part of other nations." And Lord Palmerston considered this exposition of public law as conclusive against the American theory of allegiance and the rights claimed for its naturalized citizens. Americans recognize the truth of these declarations of Mr. Justice Story; but they reject Lord Palmerston's deduction therefrom. What Americans claim is that a State which cannot employ, support, protect, and govern all her people, and for that reason regulates and accomplishes the deportation of that portion least able to support themselves, forfeits her right to govern them anywhere as exclusively her own subjects; and that in this case the doctrine of intrinsic and indefeasible allegiance comes to an abrupt and final termination by mutual consent and necessity.

American Law and Precedents.

Foreign Governments attach much importance to the fact that the laws of the United States, as interpreted by its judicial tribunals, sustain their claim to perpetual allegiance. This is one of many embarrassments that attend this difficult and delicate question. The President, in his last annual message, refers to this subject:—

"The attention of Congress is respectfully called to a singular and embarrassing conflict of laws. The executive department of this Government has hitherto uniformly held, as it now holds, that naturalization, in conformity with the constitution and laws of the United States absolves the recipient from his native allegiance. The courts of Great Britain hold that allegiance to the British Crown is indefeasible, and it is not absolved by our laws of naturalization. British judges cite courts and law authorities of the United States in support of that theory against the position held by the executive authority of the United States. This conflict perplexes the public mind concerning the rights of naturalized citizens and impairs the national authority abroad. I called attention to this subject in my last annual message, and now again respectfully appeal to Congress to declare the national will unmistakably upon this important question.—Page 32.

Yet, justly considered, the American interpretation of public law on this subject, elementary or judicial, adds nothing to the authority of Blackstone. The jurisdiction of courts does not extend to the enactment of laws. It is limited to their just interpretation. Judges are often governed less by reason than by precedents. "The doctrine of the law, then, is this," says Blackstone, "that precedents and rules must be followed unless "flatly absurd or unjust. If the reason of a decision "cannot be discovered, yet we owe such deference to "former times that we are bound to suppose they did "not act wholly without consideration." "I will "servilely follow in the footsteps of my predecessors," said one of the most eminent English judges. The obsolete claim of inalienable allegiance may well be sustained by such absurd doctrines of legal construction. There is no American authority which cites this doctrine that does not rest it upon English law. The common law of England at the American Revolution is by some authorities accepted as law in the United States until changed by legislation. There has been no legislation upon the subject of expatriation, because the Constitution of the Government rests for its authority avowedly upon the voluntary consent of its subjects. American law authorities, receiving the common law of England before the Revolution as American common law, as some jurists do, the theory of indefeasible allegiance might be considered as having some colour of law, because it was indisputably, at the time of the Revolution, a pretension of the common law of England. It is in this manner that it has been treated in this country. Elementary writers recognize this law because it is a part of our legal history; and a class of lawyers, who subordinate reason to precedent, and a few public men who have cited their views without indorsing them, have held that the English doctrine was law in this country, upon the theory, which has no just foundation, that everything that was law in England before, was law in America after the Revolution. But it has not been so authoritatively declared by the legislative, executive, or judicial officers of the Government.

"It is the doctrine of the English law," says Judge Kent, "that natural-born subjects owe an allegiance "which is intrinsic and perpetual, and which cannot be "divested by any act of their own." But he cites the writers on public law as generally in favour of an opposite doctrine. Suggesting that the better opinion is that in absence of any legislative act on this question the rule of common law prevails, he also declares that "some "relaxation of the old stern rule of the common law is "required and admitted under the liberal influence of "commerce."

Judge Story, in the case of the Santissima Trinidad, (7 Wheaton, 283,) evaded the question of expatriation, giving no decision thereon, but said, "it was perfectly "clear that it could not be done without a bonâ fide "change of domicile under circumstances of good faith." The references to this subject in American judicial decisions are chiefly in cases where the plea of naturalization or expatriation is fraudulently made to support unjust claims to property, or to justify acts of war against nations with which we were at peace. In the case of Williams, 1804, cited in 2 Cranch, 84, Chief Justice Ellsworth ruled that upon this subject the common law of the country remained as before the Revolution. But this was a case where a citizen of the United States, in evasion of its laws, accepted a French commission, and made war upon England, justifying his wrong by pleading naturalization in France. His defence was manifestly an evasion, and the just purpose of the court was to show that no such defence could be recognized for such purposes. "It was difficult," the Chief Justice said, "to restrain our own citizens from "acts which would involve us in war." Williams was justly convicted and imprisoned. The decision of the court maintained the integrity of the Government in its treaty stipulations with England at a time when she was at war, though we were at peace, and ought not to be cited by Englishmen against the principles of public law that lie at the foundations of American Government. But it has one important feature. It is a distinct recognition, even at that early day, that the emigration from Europe, and the expatriation of its citizens was with the consent of the European Governments. In countries so crowded with inhabitants, said the Chief Justice, there is necessity for emigration, while in America we have no inhabitants to spare. (Niles's Register.)

It will be difficult to find an authority of American law writers or a decision of American courts in which the doctrines of perpetual allegiance is recognized, except as a tradition of English law; or a case in which it has been regarded with favour, except for the purpose of preventing private injustice or the injury of the public peace. It has no authority in this country except as an element of English common law, existing at the time of the Revolution. There is nothing American in the oath of the land barons of England in 1086, nor in the feeble paraphrase of that obligation by Blackstone.

The opinion of American jurists and legislators on this subject is well expressed by Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, in a letter to Lord Ashburton, August 1842, upon the right of expatriation:—

"A question of such serious importance ought now to be put to rest. If the United States give shelter and protection to those whom the policy of England annually casts upon their shores—if, by the benign influences of their Government and institutions, and by the happy condition of the country, those emigrants become raised from poverty to comfort, finding it easy even to become landholders, and being allowed to partake in the enjoyment of all civil rights—if all this may be done, (and all this is done under the countenance and encouragement of England herself,) is it not high time, my lord, that, yielding that which had its origin in feudal ideas as inconsistent with the present state of society, and especially with the intercourse and relations subsisting between the Old World and the New, England should at length formally disclaim all right to the services of such persons, and renounce all control over their conduct?"

In this statement Mr. Webster regards the doctrine against which he protests not as American but as English law.

Effect of this Theory on the People of the United States.

The American people are perfectly conscious that every nation has a perfect right to frame its municipal laws to meet its own necessities. This municipal right is recognized, because it cannot be known otherwise what is required for the public safety. It has not, however, the same elevation as other branches of public law. It is in the nature of police regulations. But even in this view it is not entirely independent of public opinion and authority. Excessive cruelty or injustice in its provisions would justify interference. Every household has the same immunity, but its authority must be so exercised as not to impair the peace of other households; and the municipal legislation of a nation should be so framed as not to disturb, much less to impair or destroy, in others rights common to all nations. Legislation that does this—municipal or otherwise—is against the law of nations and of God. The municipal legislation of Great Britain has this effect upon the people of this country. Under such circumstances this Government is remanded to that general and permanent attribute of nations, denominated the right of self-preservation, which implies not only the right negatively of defence and security against external aggression, but positively of making such regulations generally as may maintain and promote the national welfare and prosperity. (Reddie's International Law, 190.) The authority for internal municipal legislation can never justify a state in disregarding the principles of universal law, public and private, the law of nations and of nature, when it operates, as in this case it does, to deprive a people of privileges conceded to the citizens of all civilized states.

The United States have a population of 35,000,000. The free people, in 1790, numbered 3,250,000. With an annual increase of births over deaths, estimated at one and thirty-eight hundredths per cent., they would now number 9,250,000; add 4,000,000 emancipated people, and the aggregate of the population existing in 1790, with their descendants, is 13,250,000. The balance of the people, 21,750,000, are emigrants and their descendants.

If this portion of our people—more than twenty millions—are subjects of the several States of Europe and service is due to them; if they have no right to defend themselves or their adopted country in the event of war with Europe; if, unstained by crime and free of all offence, they are in consequence of this claim of service debarred from travel and from intercourse with civilized nations; or subject to arrest and compulsory service in armies organized to fight against their own Government, then the United States has no independent existence. It may have numbers, industry, commerce, letters, science, invention, courage, enterprise, wealth, prosperity and power; but it is not independent.

Its dreams of equality are delusions and its sacrifices have been in vain. Every State in Europe will have its garrison if these claims are admitted in every part of the Union. The able-bodied portion of three-fifths of our population could be summoned to fight for Governments with which they have no connexion and against those with which their fortunes are indissolubly united, and they would be accounted traitors if found in the ranks of its armies. We have received, educated, employed, enriched, enfranchised that portion of the people of Europe which its rulers cast off, to find them in their strength incapable of defending their country or lawful resistance to public enemies.

They would be exposed to arrest and compulsory military service, or punishment, not only if found in their native country, but in any civilized nation with which their native Governments might have treaties of extradition. Martin Kozsta was a native of Hungary residing in Turkey with the consent of its Government; his surrender was demanded by Austria under an interpretation of treaties rejected by Turkey, and would have been surrendered and imprisoned but for the forcible intervention of the Government of the United States. The intimate association of those who are claimed as subjects of foreign Governments is such as to put in peril the rights or peace of all. Its absurdity if applied to this large portion of our people is palpable. But the injustice of its application to individuals is equal to the absurdity of its application to nations.

Remedies.

The injustice of this principle is more apparent than the remedy. But that there is a corrective for so great a wrong cannot be doubted. It is not in vain to labour for a reconsideration of this great question by European Governments more in the light of reason and less in the spirit of feudal philosophy. The solution of this important international problem belongs to men who have capacity to divine the right in law and the courage to assert its power. That such men are to be found among those who occupy the proud eminence of royal or popular favour cannot be doubted.

There is one quarter of the world to which we look with hope. Those who have evoked from the labyrinth of German politics, which have been to all students of history in one sense a mystery and in another a puzzle—who, from the elements of anarchy, have in an instant and by a word called into being a new creation already recognized as a permanent empire, and which promises at a day not distant to unite a race long divided, and to cement a power in central Europe long needed, that may number sixty million people: to those to whose genius and success is due the North German Union we have a right to turn for the justice we demand.

In the foundation of a new Power she has wisely submitted her plans to the approval of the people. She has made petty interests that formed petty governments subservient to great principles that are the only basis of great nations. She has united the people who speak the same language and who reverence the same historic past. She seeks to hold them together by consent, not by force. The constitution of 1867 is prophetic of the future. The Republic of the New World might adopt with profit many of its wise and just provisions. She knows how important emigration is to civilization and to liberty. She felt in the great struggle which terminated at Sadowa the priceless advantages of the Germanic emigration to the north which gave to her a friend and an ally in Russia. She counts not less than two million native-born children in the republican family of the United States, and of their descendants nearly six millions more. She will understand how dearly they cherish the glorious memories of the "Fatherland." She can comprehend the advantage of an ally and friend in the New World equal in spirit and strength to that which supports her in the Old. The concession we ask is not worth to her the parchment upon which it is written. Her conventions and treaties closely approach it. The legislation of some of the lesser German States, as interpreted by their rulers, require but the definition of a single word to secure to Americans all they ask of Germany.

But whatever may be her decision or that of other States, the point we make will be conceded. That the rights we claim can be permanently denied; that the question at issue will be settled against us; that it is to remain long unsettled is impossible.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have entered upon the consideration of the question only by the direct order of the House. It has received the considerate attention which its great importance demands, and the result of its deliberations is embraced in a bill herewith submitted for the consideration of the House. Nothing can be more apparent than that legislation does not alone furnish a remedy for the evils of which the country complains. Local legislation is as powerless to effect the reforms we desire as it is to justify the wrongs inflicted upon American citizens by other nations. But it is indispensable as a first step that statute declaration of the rights we claim should exist. It is also important that distinct proclamation of the limitations to the rights we claim should be made. The project of a law which is submitted herewith seeks to accomplish this result. It also proposes that when all the resources of the Government shall have failed to produce a recognition by other Governments of the principles of public law so long maintained by this, in regard to the rights of naturalized citizens the President shall be invested with the same authority within our jurisdiction as to subjects of other Governments, that foreign States enforce upon American citizens within their jurisdiction. In case of collision, reprisal, or war, a State is justified in detaining a foreigner against his will. (Von Martens, Law of Nations, 87.) But it is not anticipated that such proceedings will be required. It cannot be that in this age, when all the political traditions of the middle ages are tumbling, that Europe will rush to extremities to sustain a claim repudiated by every authority of law, humanity, experience, civilization, and justice.

N.

Nationality Statutes.

25 Edw. III. Stat. 2. A.D. 1350.

A Statute for those that be born beyond Sea.

Our lord the king, at his parliament holden at Westminster at the Utas of the purification of our Lady, the year of his reign of England the five and twentieth, and of France the twelfth, considering the great mischiefs and damages which have happened to the people of his realm of England, as well because that the statutes ordained before this time have not been holden and kept as they ought to be, as because of the mortal pestilence that late reigned, and willing to provide, for the quietness and common profit of his said people, convenient remedy; therein, by the assent of the prelates, earls, barons, and other great men, and all the commons of his said realm summoned to the said parliament, hath ordained and established the things underwritten, videlicet.

Because that some people be in doubt, whether children born in parts beyond the sea, out of the ligeance of England, should be able to demand any inheritance within the same ligeance or not, whereon a petition was made heretofore in the parliament holden at Westminster, the seventeenth year of the reign of our said lord the king, and was not at the same time wholly assented; our said lord the king, willing that all doubts and ambiguities should be put away, and the law in this case declared and put in certain, caused the said prelates, earls, barons, and otherwise men of his council, assembled in this parliament, to be charged to deliberate upon this point; all of whom with one assent have said, that the law of the crown of England is, and always hath been such, that the children of the kings of England, in whatsoever parts they be born, in England or elsewhere, be able and ought to bear the inheritance after the death of their ancestors; which law our lord the king, the said prelates, earls, barons, and other great men, and all the commons assembled in the said parliament, do approve and affirm for ever.

And in respect of other children born out of the legiance of England in the time of our said lord the king, they be of one mind accorded, that [Henry, son of John de Beaumond, Elizabeth, daughter of Guy de Bryan, and Giles, son of Ralph Dawbeny, and others whom the king will name], which were born beyond the sea out of the legiance of England, shall be henceforth able to have and enjoy their inheritances after the death of their ancestors in all parts within the ligiance of England, as well as those born within the same ligeance. And that all children inheritors, which henceforth shall be born out of the ligeance of the king, whose fathers and mothers at the time of their birth be and shall be at the faith and ligeance of the king of England, shall have and enjoy the same benefit and advantage, to have and bear inheritance within the same ligeance as the other inheritors aforesaid in time to come; so always that the mothers of such children passed the sea by the licence and will of their husbands. And if it be alledged against any such born beyond the sea that he is a bastard, in case where the bishop ought to have cognisance of bastardy, it shall be commanded to the bishop of the place where the demand is, to certify the king's court where the plea thereof dependeth, as of old times hath been used in the case of bastardy alledged against them which were born in England.

7 Anne, Cap. V. A.D. 1708.

An Act for naturalizing foreign Protestants.

Whereas the increase of people is a means of advancing the wealth and strength of a nation; and whereas many strangers of the Protestant or reformed religion, out of a due consideration of the happy constitution of the government of this realm, would be induced to transport themselves and their estates into this kingdom, if they might be made partakers of the advantages and privileges which the natural-born subjects thereof do enjoy, be it enacted, &c.

All persons taking the oaths, and making and subscribing the declaration appointed by 6 Ann. c. 23, shall be deemed natural-born subjects (s. 1.) No person to have the benefit of this Act unless he have received the sacrament, &c. (s. 2.)

II. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the children of all natural-born subjects born out of the ligeance of her Majesty, her heirs and successors, shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be natural-born subjects of this kingdom, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever. (See this clause explained, 4 G. II. c. 21.)

IV. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all persons born out of the ligeance of her Majesty, her heirs or successors, who shall qualify themselves in the Courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, within the kingdom of Ireland, or at some general quarter sessions of the peace, to be held for the county where he or they do or shall inhabit, reside, or settle within the said kingdom, in like manner as persons are by this Act required to do within the kingdom of Great Britain, all and every such persons shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be her Majesty's natural-born subjects of the said kingdom of Ireland, to all intents, constructions, and purposes, as if they, and every of them, had been or were born within the said kingdom of Ireland. (This Act repealed, 10 Ann. c. 5, except what relates to the children of her Majesty's natural-born subjects born out of her Majesty's allegiance.)

10 Anne. A.D. 1711.

An Act to repeal the Act of the seventh year of her Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act for naturalizing foreign "Protestants," (except what relates to the children of her Majesty's natural-born subjects born out of her Majesty's allegiance.)

Whereas an Act of Parliament was made and passed in the seventh year of her Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act "for naturalizing foreign Protestants:" and whereas divers mischiefs and inconveniencies have been found by experience to follow from the same, to the discouragement of the natural-born subjects of this kingdom, and to the detriment of the trade and wealth thereof; be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the before-mentioned Act, and all the matters and things therein contained (except so much of the said Act by which the children of all natural-born subjects born out of the allegiance of her Majesty, her heirs, and successors are to be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be natural-born subjects of this kingdom), shall be and is hereby repealed, annulled, and made void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever; provided nevertheless, that such repeal shall not in any sort prejudice or impeach the naturalization of any person who have been or shall be naturalized at any time before the fourth day of February which shall be in the year of our Lord 1711, pursuant to the directions of the before-mentioned Act. (See 4 G. II. c. 21, which explains 7 Ann. c. 5, s. 2.)

4 Geo. II., Cap. XXI. A.D. 1731.

An Act to explain a clause in an Act made in the seventh year of the reign of Her late Majesty Queen Anne, for naturalizing foreign Protestants, which relates to the children of the natural-born subjects of the crown of England, or of Great Britain.

Whereas by an Act of Parliament made in the seventh year of the reign of her late Majesty Queen Anne, intituled, "An Act for naturalizing of foreign Protestants," it is, amongst other things, enacted, that the children of all natural-born subjects, born out of the ligeance of her said late Majesty, her heirs and successors, should be deemed, adjuged and taken to be natural-born subjects of this kingdom to all intents, constructions and purposes whatsoever: and whereas in the tenth year of her said late Majesty's reign another Act was made and passed to repeal the said Act (except what related to the children of her Majesty's natural-born subjects, born out of Her Majesty's allegiance): and whereas some doubts have arisen upon the construction of the said recited clause in the said Act of the seventh year of Her late Majesty's reign: now for the explaining the said recited clause in the said Act, relating to children of natural-born subjects, and to prevent any disputes touching the true intent and meaning thereof. May it please your most excellent Majesty that it may be declared and enacted, and be it declared and enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that all children born out of the ligeance of the crown of England or of Great Britain, or which shall hereafter be born out of such ligeance whose fathers were or shall be natural-born subjects of the crown of England, or of Great Britain, at the time of the birth of such children respectively, shall and may, by virtue of the said recited clause in the said Act of the seventh year of the reign of Her said late Majesty, and of this present Act, be adjudged and taken to be natural-born subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever.

II. Provided always, and be it further enacted and declared by the authority aforesaid, that nothing in the said recited Act in the seventh year of Her said late Majesty's reign, or in this present Act contained, did, doth, or shall extend or ought to be construed, adjudged, or taken to extend, to make any children born or to be born out of the ligeance of the crown of England, or of the crown of Great Britain, to be natural-born subjects of the crown of England, or of Great Britain, whose fathers at the time of the birth of such children respectively were or shall be attainted of high treason, by judgment, outlawry or otherwise, either in this kingdom or in Ireland, or whose fathers at the time of the birth of such children respectively, by any law or laws made in this kingdom or in Ireland, were or shall be liable to the penalties of high treason or felony, in case of their returning into this kingdom or into Ireland without the licence of His Majesty, his heirs, or successors, or of any of His Majesty's royal predecessors, or whose fathers at the time of the birth of such children respectively, were or shall be in the actual service of any foreign prince or state then in enmity with the crown of England, or of Great Britain; but that all such children are, were, and shall be, and remain in the same state, plight, and condition to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever, as they would have been in if the said Act of the seventh year of Her said late Majesty's reign, or this present Act had never been made; anything herein, or in the said Act of the seventh year of Her said late Majesty's reign, contained to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.

III. Provided always, and be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any child, whose father at the time of the birth of such child was attainted of high treason as aforesaid, or was liable to the penalties of high treason or felony, in case of returning into this kingdom or Ireland without licence as aforesaid, or was in the actual service of any foreign prince or state then in enmity with the crown of England or of Great Britain (other than and excepting always out of this proviso all children of such persons, who went out of Ireland in pursuance of the articles of Limerick) hath come into Great Britain or Ireland, or any other of the dominions belonging to the crown of Great Britain, and hath continued to reside within Great Britain or Ireland, or other the dominions aforesaid, for the space of two years, at any time between the fifteenth day of November in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eight, and the twenty-fifth day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty-one, and during such residence hath professed the Protestant religion; or, if any child, whose father at the time of his or her birth was within any of the descriptions before mentioned, hath come into Great Britain or Ireland, or any other of the dominions belonging to the crown of Great Britain, and professed the Protestant religion, and died within Great Britain or Ireland, or any other of the dominions aforesaid, at any time between the said sixteenth day of November in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eight, and the said twenty-fifth day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty-one; or if any child, whose father at the time of his or her birth was within any of the descriptions before mentioned, hath been and continued in the actual possession or receipt of the rents and profits of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments in Great Britain or Ireland, for the space of one whole year, at any time between the said sixteenth day of November in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eight, and the said twenty-fifth day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty-one, or hath bonâ fide, and for good and valuable consideration, sold, conveyed, or settled any lands, tenements, or hereditaments in Great Britain or Ireland, and any person claiming title thereto, under such sale, conveyance or settlement, hath been and continued in the actual possession or receipt of the rents and profits thereof for the space of six months, between the said sixteenth day of November in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eight, and the said twenty-fifth day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty-one, every such child shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be and to have been a natural-born subject of the crown of England, or of the crown of Great Britain, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever; anything herein contained to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding.

13 Geo. III. Cap. XXI. A.D. 1773.

An Act to extend the provisions of an Act made in the fourth year of the reign of His late Majesty King George the Second, intituled "An Act to explain a clause in an Act "made in the seventh year of the reign of Her late Majesty "Queen Anne, for naturalizing foreign Protestants, which "relates to the children of the natural-born subjects of the "Crown of England or of Great Britain, to the children "of such children."

Whereas divers natural-born subjects of Great Britain, who profess and exercise the Protestant religion, through various lawful causes, especially for the better carrying on of commerce, have been, and are obliged to reside in several trading cities and other foreign places, where they have contracted marriages and brought up families: And whereas it is equally just and expedient that the kingdom should not be deprived of such subjects, nor lose the benefit of the wealth that they have acquired; and therefore that not only the children of such natural-born subjects, but their children also should continue under the allegiance of His Majesty, and be intituled to come into this kingdom, and to bring hither and realize, or otherwise employ their capital; but no provision hath hitherto been made to extend farther than to the children born out of the ligeance of His Majesty, whose fathers were natural-born subjects of the Crown of England, or of Great Britain; May it therefore please Your most excellent Majesty that it may be enacted; and be it enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that all persons born, or who hereafter shall be born, out of the ligeance of the Crown of England or of Great Britain, whose fathers were or shall be, by virtue of a Statute made in the fourth year of King George the Second, to explain a clause in an Act made in the seventh year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Anne, for naturalizing foreign Protestants, which relates to the natural-born subjects of the Crown of England or of Great Britain, intitled to all the rights and privileges of natural-born subjects of the Crown of England or of Great Britain, shall and may be adjudged and taken to be, and are hereby declared and enacted to be natural-born subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever, as if he and they had been and were born in this kingdom, anything contained in an Act of the twelfth year of the reign of King William the Third, intituled, "An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, "and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject," to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.

II. Provided always, and be it enacted and declared by the authority aforesaid, that nothing in this present Act contained shall extend, or be construed, adjudged, or taken to extend to make any persons born, or to be born out of the ligeance of the Crown of England or of the Crown of Great Britain, to be natural-born subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, contrary to all or any of the provisoes, exceptions, limitations, and restrictions contained in the aforesaid Act, made in the fourth year of the reign of His said late Majesty, or to repeal, abridge, or alter the same; but all such clauses shall be, and remain in the same state, plight, and condition, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever as they would have been if this present Act had never been made.

III. Provided also, and be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that nothing in this present Act contained shall extend, or be construed, adjudged, or taken to repeal, abridge, or anyways alter an Act made in the fifth year of the reign of His late Majesty King George the First, intituled, "An Act to prevent the inconveniences arising from "seducing artificers in the manufactures of Great Britain "into foreign parts;" nor to repeal, abridge, or any ways alter, any law, statute, custom, or usage whatsoever now in force, concerning aliens' duties, customs, and impositions, nor to cause any privilege, exemption, or abatement relating thereto, in favour of any person naturalized by virtue of this Act, unless such person shall come into this realm and there inhabit and reside, and shall take and subscribe the oaths, and make, repeat, and subscribe the declaration appointed by an Act made in the first year of the reign of His late Majesty King George the First, intituled, "An Act for the "further security of His Majesty's person and government, "and the succession of the Crown in the heirs of the "late Princess Sophia, being Protestants; and for extin-"guishing the hopes of the pretended Prince of Wales, and "his open and secret abettors," in such manner and form, and at such place and places as are in and by the said Act directed, and also receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the usage of the Church of England, or in some Protestant or reformed congregation within this kingdom of Great Britain, within three months before their taking the oaths in the said Act mentioned; and shall, at the time and place of taking and subscribing the said oaths, and of the making, repeating, and subscribing the said declaration, produce a certificate signed by the person administering the said sacrament, and attested by two credible witnesses, whereof an entry shall be made of record in the court and courts respectively wherein such oaths shall have been taken and subscribed, without any fee or reward.

IV. Provided always, and be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that no person shall be enabled hereby to defeat any estate, right, or interest which upon the last day of this session shall be lawfully vested in any other person, or to claim or demand any estate or interest which shall hereafter accrue, unless such claim or demand be made within five years next after the same shall accrue.

ALPHABETICAL INDEX TO MEMORANDUM.

[The Figures refer to the Pages.]

A.

Abela, Grazia, 75.
Aberdeen, Lord, 70.
Acts of Parliament, 6, 7, 8, 9, 15, 60 (Addenda I.) 93, (Addenda N.), 107.
Act of Parliament. Naturalization by, 7, 8.
Act. United States' Non-Importation, 32.
Adams, Mr., 36.
Adams, Mr. C. F., 48, 49.
Adams, Mr. J. Q., 36.
Agents of naturalized British subjects. Protection to, 76.
Ali, Agha, 72.
Albert, Lucien (French conscription), 57.
Aliens Committee, 8.
Aliens in United States, 18.
Aliens liable to trial for treason, 40.
Aliens. Mexican, law, 70, 71.
Allegiance. British, 5, 14, 15, 37, 40, 41, 60, 72, 75.
Allegiance. British subjects taken prisoners in United States' service, 35.
Allegiance. Danish, 65.
„ Declaration of Prince Regent, 35.
„ Natural and local. Blackstone on, 14.
„ Oath at New Orleans, 43.
„ Opinions of Sir W. Scott, 32.
„ Opinion of Sir J. Nicholl, 32.
„ Proclamation as to, 1814, 37.
„ United States', 1783, 29.
Amiens, Peace of, 31.
Amthor (Renunciation of United States' naturalization), 57.
Ancram, Mr., 75.
Anderson, Mr. Percy, 43.
Anguila, 12.
"Ann," case of, 15, (Addenda C.) 86.
Antenati, status of, 1783, 29.
Antigua, 10,
Argentine Republic, 61. Laws, 62.
Arguimban, Messrs., 74.
Army Bill. French Debate on, 24.
Arrests in Ireland, 1848, 40.
Ashburton, Lord, 39.
Aslan, J., 76.
Aslan, T. G., 76.
Austria. Correspondence with Great Britain, 62.
„ Correspondence with United States, 56.
„ Naturalization, 25, (Addenda H.) 92.
„ Martin Kozta, 56.
Azeglio, Marquis, 70.

B.

Bahamas, 10.
Bancroft, Mr., 40, 41.
Banks, General, 51.
Barbados, 10.
Barker, Vice-Consul, 69.
Barnard, Mr., 52, 53.
Bates, Attorney-General, 17, 45, (Addenda E.) 87.
Bathurst, Lord, 35.
Bavaria. Laws, 26.
„ Correspondence with United States, 57.
Bayard, Mr., 36.
Behne, Mr., 53.
Belgium. Correspondence with Great Britain, 62.
Belgium. Laws, 27.
Benson, Dr., 47.
Bergen, Mr., 40.
Berlin Decree, 33.
Bermuda, 10.
Bernstorff, Count, 73.
Bigelow, Mr., 58.
Bischoffsheim Mr., 8.
Bismarck, Count, 54.
Black, Attorney-General, 57.
Blackwell, T., 48.
Blockades, 38.
Blockade-runners, 47.
Borgerbrev, 65.
Born, Mr., 53.
Bosdet, A., 68.
Bosdet, C., 68.
Boyer, Mr., 51.
Braga, Senhor, 66.
Brand, Mr., 53.
Bransby, Mr., 64.
Brazil. Correspondence with Great Britain, 63,
„ Laws, 63.
Bremen, Correspondence with United States, 56.
British-born sons of Americans, 47.
British Columbia, 10.
British Guiana. Militia in, 66. Naturalization, 10.
British Laws, 5–15.
Bruce, Sir F., 49.
Buchanan, Mr., 40.
Buchanan, Sir A., 71, 74.
Buchanan, President, 58.
Buenos Ayres. Correspondence with Great Britain, 61.
Buenos Ayres, 67.
Burgher-recht, 28.
Burghership, 68.
Burke, 49.
Burke, Colonel, 48.
Butler, General, 43.

C.

Caicos Island, 13.
Calimachi, Mr., 76.
Canada. Fenians in, 48.
„ Naturalization in, 10.
Canning, Mr., 33.
Cape of Good Hope, 11.
Casaubon, Mr., 68.
Cass, Mr., 54.
Cassaro, Prince, 69.
Cassavetti, Mr., 76.
Castlereagh, Lord, 34.
Cavesford, John, 48.
Census, United States, 18.
Certificates of British Naturalization. Restrictions in, 9; forms (Addenda I.), 95.
Certificates, United States' Naturalization (Addenda B.), 86.
Chanler, Mr., 51.
"Chesapeake." Affair of, 33.
Children of Aliens born in British territory, 47, 70, 71.
Chinese, of British origin. Distinctive dress to be worn in China, 64.
Christie, Mr., 61.
Cicero, quoted, 41.
Circulars, BritishPassports, and protection (Addenda K.), 96.
Citizenship, United Statds', 45.
Citizenship, Attorney-General Bates' Opinion on, (Addenda E.) 87.
Citizenship, State, 18.
Cittadinanza, 18, 28.
Civil Service. Employment in foreign, does not affect British nationality, 64.
Civil War in United States, 41.
Claimants, Venezuelan, 77.
Clarendon, Lord, 48, 67.
Clark, Mr., 48.
Clark, Elijah, 16.
Clay, Mr. C. M., 59.
Clay, Mr. H., 36.
Cochener, Mr., 58.
Code. Austrian, 25, (Appendix H.) 92.
Code. Italian, Revised, 1866, 27.
Code. Napoléon, 19, 20, 22, 61.
Coke, Lord, on Allegiance, 15.
Colombia. Correspondence with Great Britain, 64.
Colonial Naturalization, 10.
Colonial Naturalized Subjects. Issue of Passports to, Regulations, 13, 14, Commissioners, British, at Ghent. Instructions to, 36.
Commissioners, United States', at Ghent. Instructions to, 36.
Common Law, 5, 6, 60.
Confederate States, 44, 46.
Confederate States. Circular to Consuls in, 43.
Confederate States. Consuls expelled, 46.
Congress, International, 51.
Congress. Proceedings in, 49.

Conscription. Argentine, 61, 62.
„ Austrian, 62.
„ Brazilian, 63.
„ Buenos Ayrean, 62.
„ Colombian, 65.
„ Costa Rican, 60.
„ Confederate (see Confederate States).
„ Danish, 59.
„ Dutch, 71.
„ French, 24, 57, 58, 68.
„ „ M. Treitt's Report, 21.
„ „ Debate on Army Bill, 24.
„ German States, 55.
„ Grecian, 69.
„ Guatemalan, 69.
„ Hamburgh, 68.
„ Italian, 27, 70.
„ Norwegian, 71.
„ Portuguese, 72.
„ Prussian, 25, 52, 73.
„ Spanish, 29, 59, 74.
„ Swiss, 75.
„ United States', 41, 43, 45.
„ Venezuelan, 77.
Conscripts. Forced, taken prisoners, 46.
Constitution. United States', 16.
„ Spanish, 28.
„ Brazilian, 63.
„ Venezuelan, 77.
Consuls in Spain. Circular to, 74.
Consuls. British resident abroad cannot be naturalized, 9.
Coppell, Mr., 44.
Corfu, 69.
Costa Rica, 60.
Costa Rica. Correspondence with United States, 60.
Costello, 49.
Cowley, Lord, 67.
Crampton, Sir J., 74.
Crossthwaite, Consul, 73.
Crowther, Mr., 71.
Crutchett, Mr., 46.
Cuba, 58.
Cuppa, Messrs., 76.
Cushing, Attorney-General, 17. (Report. Addenda A., 78.)

D.

Dale, Mr., 53.
Dale, Vice-Consul, 60, 71.
Dawkins, Mr., 62.
Debate in House of Representatives, 1814, 36.
Declaration of Independence, 29.
Declaration of Prince Regent, 1813, 35.
Decree, Berlin, 33.
Decrees, English and French, 33, 34.
Decree (French), 1811, 19, 22, 23.
Decree, Milan, 34.
Delpierre, Victor, 57.
D'Empaire, A., 77.
Denization, 8, 9.
Denmark. Correspondence with Great Britain, 65.
„ „ „ United States, 59.
Deserters, 34, 38.
Diamond, J., 49.
Dodgshun, Mr., 68.
Domicil, 30.
Doria, Mr., 62.

E.

Edwardes, Mr., 77.
Eggeston, Mr., 135–150.
Elliot, Mr., 70.
European Central Railway Company, 75.
Everett, Mr., 53.
Expatriation. Austrian, 25. (Addenda H., 92.)
„ Bavarian, 26.
„ Brazil, 63.
„ British, 14, 41, 75.
„ British Commercial, 15.
„ French, 19, 22. (Addenda D., 87.)
„ Italian, 28.
„ Prussian, 25, 55. (Addenda G., 91.)
„ Russian, 59.
„ Spanish, 28.
„ United States', 17, 40, 53, 54, 57. (Addenda A., 78.)
„ Wurtemburg, 26.

F.

Fagan, Mr., 77.
Faulkener, Mr., 58.
Fenians in Canada, 47.
„ Ireland, 48–50.
Foden, Mr., 47.
Forced Loans, 70.
Foreign Affairs Committee, Congress, 50–52. (Report of, Addenda M., 98.)
Foreman, W., 71.
Foster, Mr., 34.
Fournier, Messrs., 75.
Fox, Mr., 32.
France. Correspondence with Great Britain, 66.
„ „ „ United States, 57.
„ Laws of, 19–24.
Frankfort, 55–68.
French. British Guiana Militia, 66.

G.

Galatz, 76.
Gambier, Lord, 36.
Geneva, 75.
Germany. Correspondence with Great Britain, 68.
„ „ „ United States, 55.
Ghent. Negotiations at, 36–38.
„ Treaty of, 38.
Giro, Mr., 76.
Goldberg, B., 59.
Goulburn, Mr., 36.
Gray, Mr., 46.
Greece. Correspondence with Great Britain, 69.
Grenada, 10.
Grenville, Lord, 31.
Griffith, Mr., 64.
Grimm, Mr., 68.
Guatemala. Correspondence with Great Britain, 69.
Gutowsky, 63.

H.

Habeas Corpus. Ireland, 47.
„ United States, 42.
Hall and Hoare, Messrs., 70.
Hamburgh, Laws of, 27.
Hamilton, Mr., 46.
Hanoverians, 61–74.
Hansard, Mr., 46.
Hanse Towns, 68.
Harris, Admiral, 75.
Harrowby, Lord, 32.
Hawkesbury, Lord, 31–32.
Healey, John, 48.
Hesketh, Mr., 63.
Heslop, Mr., 47.
Hesse, 68.
Hill, Miss, 47.
Hofer, Mr., 54.
Honduras, 69. British, 11.
Hong Kong. 11.
Hood, Mr., 61.
Hornby, Sir E., 76.
Hostages, 35, 38.
Howard, Mr., 63.
Howard de Walden, Lord, 62, 72.
Howick, Lord, 31.
Hoy, Mr., 42.
Hudson, Mr., 70.
Hynes, T., 48.

I.

Illegitimate children, 70, 77.
Impressment, 1792, 1814, 30–38.
„ 1818, 38.
„ 1842, 39.
„ 73.
Indian Civil Service. Persons cannot be naturalized in order to enter, 9.
Intended citizens, 43, 45.
„ United States' Passports refused to, 42.
„ Martin Kozta, 56.
Ionian Nationality, 69, 77.
Ireland, 1848, 40.
„ 1866, 47.
Irish Laws, 7.
Italy. Correspondence with Great Britain, 69.
„ Laws of, 27.

J.

Jackson, Mr., 34.
Jacnel, 49.
Jamaica, 11.
Jefferson, President, 31.
Jenckes, Mr., 51.
Jenkins, Mr., 47.
Jerningham, Mr., 63.
Jews. British in Russia, 73.
Judd, Mr., 54.

K.

Keogh, Justice, 49.
King, Mr., 30.
Knocke, J., 52.
Kozta, Martin. Case of, 56.

L.

Landowners, 45.
Lawrence, Mr., 17.

Laws. Austria, 25. (Addenda H., 92.)
„ Bavaria, 26.
„ Belgium, 27.
„ Brazil, 63.
„ British, 5–8.
„ „ Present Law, 8. (Addenda I., 93.)
„ Columbia, 64.
„ Colonial, 10–13.
„ Denmark, 65.
„ French, 19–23.
„ Hamburgh, 27.
„ Irish, 7.
„ Italy, 27.
„ Netherlands, 26.
„ Prussia, 25. (Addenda G., 91.)
„ Russia, 26, 73.
„ Spain, 28.
„ Switzerland, 27.
„ United States, 16–18.
„ Venezuela, 78.
„ Wurtemburg, 26.
Le Coq, 53.
Levant. Protection to British subjects in, 76.
Liaño, Sabino de, 59.
Liston, Mr., 31.
Lopez Expedition, 58.
Lynch, R., 49.

M.

McCafferty, 49.
Macdonald, Æneas, 16.
McKirwan, 48.
McMahon, 49, 50.
Madison, Mr., 30.
Mahometan. Maltese girl become, 75.
Malet, Sir A., 68.
Manteuffel, Baron, 53.
Marcy, Mr., 56.
Maritime Rights, 39.
Marriage, 76.
„ at British Embassy, Paris, 68.
Marshall, Mr., 31.
Martial Law, 47.
Masulipatan Newal, 71.
Matchett, Mr., 46.
Mavrogodato, Mr., 76.
Merchant vessels. Extra-territorial, 32, 36, 40.
Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, 15, 76.
Mercier, Mr., 44.
Messina, 69.
Messina, Mr. Rosario, 70.
Mexico. Correspondence with Great Britain, 70.
Mexico. Laws, 70.
Meyer, Mr., 53.
Milan Decree, 34.
Military Labour, Forced, 44.
Military Service. Liability of aliens to, 73.
„ Treaty provisions, 66.
Militia. British, 73.
„ British Guiana, 66.
„ Dutch, 71.
„ Hamburgh, 68.
„ United States', 41, 43, 45.
Mines, British interests in, 70.
Minors, Alien, in France, 66.
Minors, born abroad, not naturalized by fathers Naturalization, 9.
Minor Children, 42.
Minors in United States, 47.
Mission, Lord Ashburton's, 39.
Mixed Jury. 49. (Addenda F., 90.)
Monroe, Mr., 31, 32, 36.
Monte Video, 71.
Montoya, Mr., 65.

N.

Nagle, W. J., 50.
Natal, 11.
Nationality. Brazil, 63,
„ British, 64, 67, 68, 70, 71, 72, 77, &c.
„ France, 19, 20, 77.
„ Italy, 27.
„ Sardinia, 70.
„ Spain, 28.
„ Statutes, (Addenda N.) 107.
„ Venezuela, 77.
Naturalization. Bavaria, 26.
„ Belgium, 27.
„ British, 5–14.
„ British, Acts of, 1844, 1847, (Addenda I.) 93.
„ British, Certificates of, 9.
„ British Colonial, 10.
„ „ „ Antigua, Grenada, St. Vincent, 10.
„ „ „ Bahamas, 10.
„ „ „ Barbados, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, Grenada, 10.
Naturalization. British Colonial, Bermuda, 10.
„ „ „ British Columbia, 10.
„ „ „ British Guiana, 10.
„ „ „ Canada, 10.
„ „ „ Cape of Good Hope, 11.
„ „ „ Honduras, 11.
„ „ „ Hong Kong, 11.
„ „ „ Jamaica, 11.
„ „ „ Natal, 11.
„ „ „ New Brunswick, 11.
„ „ „ Newfoundland, 12.
„ „ „ New South Wales, 12.
„ „ „ New Zealand, 12.
„ „ „ Nova Scotia, 12.
„ „ „ Prince Edward's Island, 12.
„ „ „ Queensland, 12.
„ „ „ St. Kitt's and Anguila, 12.
„ „ „ Sierra Leone, 12.
„ „ „ South Australia, 13.
„ „ „ Tasmania, 13.
„ „ „ Trinidad, 13.
„ „ „ Turk's Island and Caicos Island, 13.
„ „ „ Victoria, 13.
„ „ „ Western Australia, 13.
„ Denmark, 65.
„ France, 23.
„ „ Statistics, 24.
„ of Frenchmen abroad, 19.
„ Hamburgh, 27.
„ India, 14.
„ Ionian, 69.
„ Ireland, 7.
„ Italy, 27.
„ Netherlands, 26.
„ Prussia, 25, 73.
„ Russia, 26, 73,
„ Switzerland, 27.
„ United States', 16, 17, 42, 43, 60.
„ „ Present Laws, 16 (Addenda B.), 85.
„ „ Protection Act, 1868, 52.
„ „ Renunciation of, 57.
„ Wurtemburg, 26.
„ Draft Article in Treaty, 1818, 38.
Naturalized British Subjects. Protection to, 62, 68, 70, 76, &c. (Addenda K., 96.)
Naturalized British Subjects. Sons of, born in England, 65.
„ „ Children born at sea or abroad, 69.
„ „ Zwingers Marriage at Paris Embassy, 68.
Naturalized Seamen, 30–34.
Naval Service. Naturalization by, 76.
Netherlands. Conscription, 71.
New Brunswick, 11.
Newfoundland, 12.
New Granada. Correspondence with Great Britain, 64.
New Orleans. Oath, 43.
„ Police, 47.
New South Wales. 12.
New Zealand, 12.
Nicaragua, 69.
Nicholl, Sir J. Opinion, 32.
Norway. Conscription, 71.
Nova Scotia, 12.

O.

O'Leary, Mr., 64.
O'Malia, 48.
O'Mally, 48.
Orders in Council, 1807, 33, 34.
Ownership of British vessels, 15.

P.

Pacifico, Don, 69.
Palmerston, Lord, 40, 41, 61, 70.
Panama. Riot claims, 64.
Passports, 9, 73, 74.
Passports to naturalized British subjects, 9, 13, (Addenda K.) 96.
„ Limitations in, 9.
„ to naturalized Colonials, 13.
„ United States, 42.
Persia. Correspondence with Great Britain, 71.
Peru. „ „ 72.
„
Petition. Nagles, to Congress, 50.
Pierre, Mr., 58.
Piggott, Chief Baron, 49. (Addenda F., 90.)
Pile, Mr., 51.
Pinckney, Mr., 32.
Pitt, Mr., 32.
Pongoski, S., 59.
Portugal. Conscription, 72.
„ Correspondence with Great Britain, 72.
President, 34.

President's Message, 1812, 34.
„ „ 1813, 35.
„ „ 1860, 58.
„ „ 1867, 50.
Prevost, Sir S., 35.
Prince Edward Island, 12.
Prisoners. British Subjects taken in United States' service, 35.
Prize. Vessels of Frenchmen naturalized in United States captured as French, 31.
Proclamation. British, 1807, 33.
„ „ 1814, 37.
„ United States, 45.
Protection. Fraudulent Seamen's, 35.
Protection to British subjects engaged in commercial enterprises with foreigners, 70,
Protection to British Companies abroad, 75.
Protection to sons of British subjects born in foreign countries, 60, 61, 63, 69, 72.
Prussia. Correspondence with Great Britain, 73.
„ „ „ United States, 52.
„ Laws, 25. (Addenda G., 91.)
„ Treaty with United States, 1868, 55.

Q.

Queensland, 12.
Quezada, Messrs. 60.

R.

Rainals, Mr., 65.
Rawlinson, Sir H., 71.
Read, Sir T., 75.
Registration as British subjects, 72.
Renkewitz, Mr., 73.
Representatives. Debate in House of, 1814, 36.
„ „ 1867–8, 49–52.
Retaliation, 35.
Right of search for seamen, 31, 32, 36, 37.
Riotte, Mr., 60.
Robinson, Mr., 49.
Roach, Mr., 75.
Rodocanachi, Mr., 76.
Roon, Baron, 55.
Rush, Mr., 1818, 38.
Russell, Lord, 43, 67.
Russell, Mr., 34, 36.
Russia. Correspondence with Great Britain, 73.
Russia. Laws of, 26.
Ryan, Mr., 40.

S.

St. Croix, 66.
St. Kitts, 12.
St. Lucia, 10.
St. Petersburgh Factory, 74.
St. Vincent, Lord, 31.
St. Vincent, 10.
" Sally," Case of, 31.
Saltieri, Mr., 70.
Salvador, 69.
Sandt, H., 52.
Santillana, D. D., refused Naturalization as being resident abroad in consular service, 9.
Santillana, M., intrepreter at Tunis, given letters of denization, 9.
Sardinian Law, 27.
Saviñon, Señor, 71.
Saxony. Correspondence with Great Britain, 69.
Scarlett, Mr., 70.
Schilizzi, Mr., 76.
Scott, Mr., 45.
Scott, Sir W. Opinions, 32.
Seamen. (See Impressment.)
Seamen. Proclamation recalling, 1807, 33.
Seamen serving in United States' Navy, 35.
Seijas, M., 77.
Sellers, Mr., 44.
Seward, Mr., 42, 54, 55, 59, 60.
Shaver, Mr., 44.
Sheil, Mr., 71.
Sherman, Judge, 49.
Sherwin, Mr., 46.
Schneider, Mr., 58.
Sierra Leone, 12.
Smidt Boie, 59.
Smith, Mr., 34.
Smith, P., 70.
Sofio, R.E., 70.
Sons of naturalized citizens, 42, 43, 46.
South Australia, 13.
Spain. Conscription, 59.
„ Correspondence with Great Britain, 74.
„ „ „ United States, 58.
„ Laws, 28, 61, 62.
Spence, Mr., 63.
State citizenship, 18.
Statistics. France, 24.
„ United States, 18.
Story, Justice (quoted), 49.
Stratford, Mr., 77.
Stuart, Mr., 43. John and Benedict, 69.
Swan, Mr., 71.
Switzerland, 27.
„ Conscription, 75.
„ Correspondence with Great Britain, 75.

T.

Tasmania, 13.
Temple, Sir W., 69
Terry, James, 68.
Theologo, Messrs., 76.
Theologo, P., 76.
Theologo, S., 76.
Thile, Baron, 54, 55.
Thornton, Mr., 62.
Thrasher, Mr., 58.
Todry, Mr., 58.
Tolen, Ignacio, 59.
Toronto. Arrests at, 49.
Tousig, Simon (Domicil), 57.
Trade Laws. Denmark, 65.
„ Russia, 74.
Treason. Doctrine of, 40, 41.
Treaties. Clause in, as to military service, 66.
Treaty with United States, 1783, 29, 30.
„ „ 1794, 30.
„ draft, 1804, 32.
„ not ratified, 1806, 33.
„ of Ghent, 1814, 38.
„ draft, 1818, 39.
„ United States and Prussia, 1868, 55.
„ Italian, 70.
„ Swiss, 75.
Treitt, M. Report on French law, 21.
Trinidad, 13.
Tunis. Correspondence with Great Britain, 75.
Turkey. Correspondence with Great Britain, 76.
Turkish Rayahs naturalized in England. Protection in Egypt to, 76.
Turk's Island, 13.
Twiss, Sir Travers. Law of Nations, 17.
Two Sicilies. Laws, 27.

U.

United States. Laws, 16, 17.
United States. Correspondence with Great Britain, 29.
„ Correspondence with other countries, 52.

V.

Venezuela. Correspondence with Great Britain, 77.
Venice, 62.
Vertu, P. B., 70.
Victoria, 13.
Voters, 43, 44.

W.

Walewski, Count, 61, 66.
„ on effect of naturalization abroad on French conscription, 20.
Walewski, Julien Colonna, 67.
Walne, Mr., 76.
War proclaimed, 1812, 34.
Warren, 49.
Webster, Mr., 39, 53, 58.
West Australia, 13.
West, Mr., 47, 50.
Wheaton, Mr., 52.
Widows. Status of, 44, 73.
Wilson, Mr., 51.
Wisconsin. Conscription, 44.
Wissembourg. Judgment. Zeiter's case (Addenda D.), 87.
Wolff, Mr., 74.
Woodward, Mr., 51.
Wright, Mr., 53, 54.
Wyke, Sir C., 69.

Z.

Zeiter's case (French conscription), 21–58, (Addenda D.) 87.
Zwinger, Mr., 68.

APPENDIX No. II.

DISABILITIES OF ALIENS.—REPORTS FROM FOREIGN STATES.

The accompanying circular was sent from the Foreign Office to Her Majesty's representatives at European Courts and in the United States :—

" Foreign Office, June 16, 1868.

" I HAVE to instruct you to furnish me, with as little delay as possible, with a report for the Naturalization Commission, on the disabilities, if any, to which aliens residing in ——— are subjected by ——— law;" and the following despatches were received in reply :—

AUSTRIA.

MY LORD, Vienna, June 23, 1868.

IN compliance with the instructions contained in your Lordship's despatch of the 16th instant, I addressed a note to Baron Beust, copy of which I have the honor to enclose, requesting the information desired by Her Majesty's Government as to the disabilities of aliens, at the earliest convenience of the Austrian Government, but as some time will probably elapse before I shall receive an official reply, I instructed Monsieur Winiwarter, the legal adviser to Her Majesty's Embassy, to furnish me with the Austrian law on the subject.

I enclose a copy of Monsieur Winiwarter's reply.

I have, &c.

The Lord Stanley, M.P. BLOOMFIELD.
&c. &c. &c.

M. LE BARON, Vienna, June 22, 1868.

H. M. G. being desirous to obtain information for the use of the Naturalization Commission now sitting in London respecting the disabilities, if any, to which aliens residing in Austria are subjected by Austrian law, I have the honor to request your Excellency's good offices in procuring the information required as soon as it can be conveniently furnished by the Imperial Government.

I avail, &c.

(Signed) BLOOMFIELD.

H. E. The Baron de Beust,
&c. &c. &c.

YOUR EXCELLENCY, Vienna, June 22, 1868.

IN answer to the letter 21st instant your Excellency addressed me, I have the honor of submitting to your Excellency a memorandum containing the most important disabilities to which aliens residing in Austria are subject by Austrian law. I must state at the same time that no particular law exists by which all these disabilities could be ascertained.

There exist on the contrary many laws which prescribe that for certain professions, positions in life and occupations the Austrian citizenship is required. From these laws, which have been issued at very different periods, I have extracted the enumeration of cases in which aliens do not enjoy the same rights as the Austrian subjects themselves.

I might further state that my information holds only good for the so called German provinces, that is to say for the kingdoms and countries represented by the Reichsrath. With regard to Hungary I can only say that a new law regulating the position of the Hungarian citizen and of foreigners is to be discussed in the two houses, but has not yet passed.

I have, &c.

(Signed) D. WINIWARTER.

The Lord Bloomfield,
&c. &c. &c.

LEGAL ADVICE.

THE rights and the legal position of aliens residing in Austria are essentially regulated by § 33 of the Austrian Civil Code, which runs as follows :—

" Foreigners have in general equal civil rights and " obligations with the natives if the quality of a citizen is " not expressly required for the enjoyment of these rights. " Foreigners must also, in order to enjoy the same rights " as natives, prove in cases of doubt, that the State to which " they belong will likewise treat the citizens of this country " in regard to the rights in question like its own."

According to this law foreigners enjoy the same civil rights with the Austrian citizens, if for the enjoyment of a certain right the qualifications of an Austrian citizen are not expressly required. On the other hand they are subject to the same obligations as the Austrians. There is a fundamental exception from this general rule respecting the citizens of States which do not confer on Austrians the same rights which their own subjects legally enjoy.

A total enumeration of cases in which the Austrian citizenship is expressly required is hardly possible, and therefore I cannot guarantee that the following list of cases in which foreigners are not in possession of the same rights as Austrian subjects, will be complete. I can only say that no case of any importance has been overlooked. Foreigners cannot :—

1. Receive the appointment of public functionaries (official).
2. Nor those of advocates, notaries, or public agents.
3. Foreigners cannot be superiors of religious orders.
4. If a foreigner wishes to commence a public trade or business, it is not sufficient to give notice to the board of trade of his intended project, but a special concession of the home department is besides required.
5. Foreigners cannot be admitted to the military service.
6. They cannot be appointed guardians or committees for Austrian minors or Austrian subjects under committee.
7. They have not the right of constituency for the diets and the Reichsrath.
8. Nor have they the right of being elected as such deputies.
9. They cannot be admitted to the membership of political associations.
10. They are not authorized to act as undertakers, directors, or managers of public meetings, the object of which is the discussion of political affairs.
11. They have not the right of election for the common council and cannot be elected as such members.
12. They cannot obtain the position of a sworn broker (agent of exchange).
13. They cannot exercise the profession of hawker.
14. Physicians, surgeons, and midwives, as well as apothecaries if foreigners, are not admitted to the practice of their respective professions till they have passed the legal examinations of the country.
15. Foreigners cannot be directors of public schools or educational establishments as little can they become professors of a university or of any public institute.
16. The personal capacity of foreigners is in regard of their transactions to be judged of according to the laws of their own country, viz. :—although an Austrian has become of age by completion of his 24th year, a foreigner, however, of 24 years cannot be regarded as of age if the laws of his country requires a greater number of years. In this regard the foreigners may not be able to enjoy the same rights as the Austrians.

Vienna, 22nd June 1868.

(Signed) D. WINIWARTER.

BADEN.

MY LORD, Stuttgart, July 14, 1868.

IN conformity with your Lordship's instructions of the 12th June, I have the honour to inclose herewith translation of a note addressed by Baron Freydorf to Mr. Baillie containing information with respect to the position of aliens in the Grand Duchy of Baden, from which it will be perceived that aliens are practically subject there to no disabilities whatever, except exclusion from political and municipal rights.

I have, &c.

Lord Stanley, M.P. G. J. R. GORDON.
&c. &c. &c.

(Translation.)

Within the whole compass of private rights, especially in respect to the right of acquiring and possessing property of every kind, landed property included, aliens stand according to Baden law upon a footing of complete equality with native subjects.

As regards the right of settlement and of engaging in trade or industry, the Baden Government are entitled, if they please, to demand reciprocity as the condition of admission to such rights. They have, however, never as yet taken any advantage of their authority in this respect, so that in point of fact aliens residing in Baden are subject to no disabilities in regard to the right of settlement, or of engaging in trade or industry.

On the other hand, aliens are of course excluded from political rights, from offices in Church and State, and from such rights as appertain to persons as members of a corporate community.

I avail, &c.

(Signed) FREYDORF.

E. M. Baillie, Esq.
&c. &c.

&c. &c.

BAVARIA.

MY LORD, Munich, July 10, 1868.

MR. FENTON having, on the receipt of your Lordship's Circular Despatch, of the 16th ultimo, applied to the Bavarian Government for the information desired by your Lordship, for the use of the Naturalization Commission, on the disabilities to which aliens residing in Bavaria might be subjected, I yesterday evening received in reply from Prince Hohenlohe the note of the 5th instant and the memorandum of which I have the honour to enclose herewith copies and translations.

This memorandum contains such full particulars on the legal position of foreigners in Bavaria, that I have no occasion to add any further explanations on the subject.

Your Lordship will perceive that Prince Hohenlohe remarks in his note that as the principles of the Bavarian Poor Law and Communal Legislation are at present undergoing a legislative revision, it had been necessary to omit treating, in the memorandum, of the position of foreigners with respect to these two institutions.

I have, &c.

HENRY F. HOWARD.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

(Translation.) Munich, July 5, 1868.

The undersigned has had the honour to receive the note of the 22nd ultimo, by which the Royal British Chargé d'Affaires ad interim, Mr. H. P. Fenton, requested communication of the regulations in force in the kingdom relative to the disabilities to which foreigners are liable in this kingdom. The enclosure contains a review of the legal provisions which are in force in this respect, and the only remark to be made is, that the principles of the Poor Law and of the Communal Legislation are at present undergoing a legislative transformation, on which account a discussion of the position of foreigners with regard to these two institutions has had to be omitted.

I have, &c.

(Signed) PRINCE HOHENLOHE.

Sir Henry F. Howard, K.C.B.
&c. &c. &c.

The Legal Position of Foreigners in Bavaria.

The general principle rules, that a foreigner enjoys equal rights with a native of the country, to which the only exception made is where such exception is legally enacted, or when a royal ordinance applies the principle of retaliation on account of disadvantages to which Bavarian subjects are liable abroad, as compared to persons belonging to the country which imposes the disadvantages.

The legal disabilities relate to :—

I. The Domain of Civil Law and Civil Proceedings.

Whilst a preference to native creditors or debtors is excluded by § 34 of the Code of Priority of the 1st of June 1822, in cases of bankruptcy, paragraph 8 I of the Code of Procedure of the 22d of July 1819, leaves it optional to the defendant, being a native of the country, to require of the foreign plaintiff, when he does not possess any estate situated in Bavaria, the deposit of a security for the future payment of the costs of the lawsuit. With regard to foreigners, and as is the case generally when there is the danger of loss, the Judicial Code affords the security of arrest, which likewise then determines the "forum arresti." In this respect, likewise, international treaties, as, for example, with Wurtemberg, have introduced milder enactments in favour of the subjects of the respective states. Moreover, article 76 of the introductory law to the German Commercial Code places the citizens of the states of the former German Confederation on an equality with natives of the country. Foreigners are likewise capable of acquiring real property on the condition of reciprocity.

II. Penal Law and Penal Procedure.

Foreigners are subject to the Bavarian penal jurisdiction when they have either committed a penal act in the country, or when they shall have been guilty beyond the Bavarian frontiers of such an act against the king, the Bavarian State, or a person belonging to it.—A. 12, Penal Code.

If a foreigner has been condemned in Bavaria on account of a crime, he will be expelled from the country after having undergone his punishment; the same takes place with regard to convictions on account of offences or contraventions in the cases determined by law.—Art. 43, loc. cit.

In actions for libel the demand of a security for the costs from a foreign plaintiff is optional, according to Art. 61, section 3, of the introductory law to the Penal Code.

In respect to foreigners, concerning whom well-founded doubts may be entertained of their appearing before the court if summoned to do so, preliminary arrest is moreover admissible according to Art. 41, section 3, loc. cit., on account of any penal act.

III. In the Domain of the Constitutional and Administrative Law the Foreigner is excluded.

1. As not being in possession of the Bavarian Naturalization (Indigenat) from all civil rights.—§ 9 of the first Edict of the Constitution.

If he acquires the naturalization, it is only after the expiration of six years that he enters into the enjoyment of the above-mentioned rights. The foreigner, as such, is therefore excluded from the active and passive electoral franchise for communal, district, provincial, and parliamentary elections, from admission into State offices and the possession of benefices; he cannot be elected as a juryman, nor as a member of a committee of taxation. Crown and superior court offices, superior military posts, are closed to the foreigner, although it is not the possession of the fullest rights of citizenship, but merely that of naturalization, which gives a claim to many of the above-named rights.

2. The Trade Law of the 18th of January 1868 only reserves in article 2 the sanction of the State for foreign joint-stock companies, branch establishments and other companies established for trading purposes, inasmuch as the provisions of State treaties do not determine otherwise. Even § 21 of the ordinance relative to the hawking trade of the 28th of April of last year places foreigners on a complete equality with the natives of the country, excepting in cases of retaliation. Foreign medical men receive from the provincial governments or from the Ministry of State for the Interior the permission temporarily to practise in the country. Medical men who only sojourn temporarily in Bavaria, and who are entitled to practice in their own country only, have the right of giving consultations, not however that of ordinary practice.—§ 15, Ordinance of the 29th of January 1865, concerning the medical art.

3. Article 10, section 2, of the military law of the 30th of January of this year, prohibits the permanent residence in the kingdom, as foreigners, of those emigrants who have not yet attained their 32nd year.

4. Foreigners are permitted to reside in any commune of the kingdom when they can bring sufficient proof of their nationality and place of legal settlement, and when there is no legal impediment to their residence. The expulsion of a foreigner from a commune is only admissible on the same legal grounds (Article 45 of the Law of Settlement of the 16th April of this year) in virtue of which the expulsion of a Bavarian subject not having a right of settlement in the locality could likewise take place. It is only the Ministry of the Interior which, except in the aforesaid cases, is entitled to expel a foreigner from the country on grounds connected with the internal or external security of the State.

5. Only the person who posseses the Bavarian Naturalization can acquire a right of settlement in a commune of the kingdom; foreigners are consequently excluded from it.—Article 1–10, loc. cit.

A foreign woman, however, who marries a Bavarian, acquires thereby the naturalization (Indigenat) and the settlement of the husband.—§ 3 of annex 1 to the Constitution, and Article 3 of the Law of Settlement.

6. Foreigners can likewise marry in Bavaria when they can prove to the respective district police authorities that, according to the laws in force in the country of the husband, the contracting of this marriage is admissible, and has the same effects as if it had taken place in that country.

If the future wife is a foreigner she has to produce a permission of emigration, if such a permission is necessary according to the laws of her own country for emigration. —Article 34, &c. and Article 39 of the Law of Settlement.

7. Foreigners, independently of cases of retaliation, and with the sole exception of those who carry on a wandering trade, or who belong to the class of journeymen, servants, and trade assistants, require no permit for travelling. —§ 2 of the Royal Ordinance of the 9th of December 1865 respecting passports.

BELGIUM.

No. 96.

My Lord, Brussels, July 4, 1868.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's despatch circular of the 16th instant, instructing me to furnish you with a report on the disabilities, if any, to which aliens residing in Belgium are subjected by Belgian law.

The disabilities under which aliens labour in this country are so various that I found it necessary to apply to the Government for more details than I felt myself competent to afford, but as your Lordship desires that information on the subject should be supplied with as little delay as possible, I herewith transmit copies of two laws which bear directly upon the residence of foreigners in Belgium, and which may be considered as embodying the material features of Belgian practice towards aliens.

The first is a law which is renewed from time to time, the last renewal being on the 7th of July 1865, for a period of three years, investing the Government with the control over the residence of foreigners. The Government exercise the power of sending aliens out of the country in cases, 1st, of vagrancy, or when the resources for subsistence are not proved when required to be declared;

2nd. Of scandalous, immoral, or turbulent conduct offensive to the public.

3rd. Of political proceedings by agitation, writing, or conspiracy against the tranquillity of a friendly State in abuse of the hospitality here afforded them.

The second* law in question passed this year extends the power hitherto in force for the extradition of foreigners accused or guilty of crimes committed in their own countries, and constitutes the basis of the extradition treaties of which copies were forwarded in my despatch of January 20th.

Until April 1865, British subjects were not entitled to hold or inherit freehold property situate in Belgium. At present all foreigners in that respect are placed upon the same footing as Belgians. Further, distinctions between foreigners and natives are made in regard to judicial processes, for instance, in civil actions, a foreigner cannot obtain an order of provisional arrest either against a Belgian or another foreigner; in commercial actions he is under the same disability. But the Belgian can obtain an order of provisional arrest against a foreigner upon a simple petition through his "avoué" to the President of the Tribunal of Première Instance. In all tribunals except the Tribunal of Commerce he can be called upon at a stage of proceedings to give security for costs, unless he has letters of domicile from the King. For a foreigner to acquire the same civil position as a Belgian he requires a letter of domicile from the King. To acquire a position political as well as civil he requires an Act of Legislature. The letter of domicile confers on the foreigner the right of provisional arrest in all cases where a Belgian would have such rights. He cannot be called upon as plaintiff in any action to give security for costs; he is also exempt from provisional arrest except in such cases where a Belgian would not be exempt, for instance, in criminal or correctional proceedings.

The foreigner is not liable to the conscription for the army, nor is active service required of him in the Civic Guard, though, for the latter, he is called upon to contribute a pecuniary amount.

I have, &c.

Howard de Walden.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

* Not printed for the Commission.

MINISTÈRE DE LA JUSTICE.

Loi relative aux Étrangers.*

Léopold, Roi des Belges, à tous présents et à venir, Salut,

Les Chambres ont adopté et Nous sanctionnons ce qui suit:—

Art. I. L'étranger résidant en Belgique, qui, par sa conduite, compromet la tranquillité publique, ou qui a été poursuivi ou condamné à l'étranger pour les crimes ou délits qui donnent lieu à l'extradition, conformément à la loi du 1 Octobre 1833, peut être contraint par le Gouvernement de s'éloigner d'un certain lieu, d'habiter dans un lieu déterminé, ou même de sortir du royaume.

L'arrêté royal enjoignant à un étranger de sortir du royaume par ce qu'il compromet la tranquillité publiqe sera délibéré en conseil des Ministres.

Art. II. Les dispositions de l'article précédent ne pourront être appliquées aux étrangers qui se trouvent dans un des cas suivants, pourvu que la nation à laquelle ils appartiennent soit en paix avec la Belgique:

1°. A l'étranger autorisé à établir son domicile dans le royaume.

2°. A l'étranger marié avec une femme belge, dont il a des enfants nés en Belgique pendant sa résidence dans le pays;

3°. A l'étranger décoré de la croix de Fer.

Art. III. L'arrêté royal porté en vertu de l'art. 1er sera signifié par huissier à l'étranger qu'il concerne.

Il sera accordé à l'étranger un délai qui devra être d'un jour franc au moins.

Art. IV. L'étranger qui aura reçu l'injonction de sortir du royaume sera tenu de désigner la frontière par laquelle il sortira; il recevra une feuille de route réglant l'itinéraire de son voyage et la durée de son séjour dans chaque lieu où il doit passer. En cas de contravention à l'une ou l'autre de ces dispositions, il sera conduit hors du royaume par la force publique.

Art. V. Le Gouvernement pourra enjoindre de sortir du royaume à l'étranger qui quittera la résidence qui lui aura été désigné.

Art. VI. Si l'étranger auquel il aura été enjoint de sortir du royaume rentre sur le territoire, il pourra être poursuivi et il sera condamné, pour ce fait, à un emprisonnement de quinze jours à six mois; et à l'expiration de sa peine, il sera conduit à la frontière.

Art. VII. La présente loi ne sera obligatoire que pendant trois ans, à moins qu'elle ne soit renouvelée.

Promulguons la présente loi, ordonnons qu'elle soit revêtue du sceau de l'Etat, et publiée par la voie du Moniteur.

Donné à Laeken, le 7 Juillet 1865.

Léopold.

Par le Roi:
Le Ministre de la Justice,
Victor Tesch.

Scellé du sceau de l'Etat:
Le Ministre de la Justice,
Victor Tesch.

* Chambre des Représentants. Session de 1864–1865:—Documents parlementaires. Exposé des motifs et texte du projet de loi. Séance du 17 Novembre 1864, p. 108. Rapport. Séance du 7 Juin 1865, p. 833–836. Annales parlementaires. Discussion générale. Séances des 22 Juin 1865, p. 1235–1246; 23 Juin p. 1247–1257; 24 Juin, p. 1259–1270; 27 Juin, p. 1271–1283; et 28 Juin, p. 1285–1296. Discussion des articles o adoption. Séance du 29 Juin, p. 1297–1311.

Sénat:—Documents parlementaires, Rapport, Séance du 30 Juin, 1865, p. lxxii. Annales parlementaires. Discussion générale, Séance du 4 Juillet 1865, p. 526–527. Discussion des articles et adoption. Séance du 5 Juillet, p. 529–530.

My Lord, Brussels, July 16, 1868.

With reference to my despatch of the 4th instant, I have the honour herewith to enclose a copy of a note which I have received from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, affording the information regarding the disabilities which affect aliens in this country, which was desired for the use of the Naturalization Commission in your Lordship's despatch of the 16th ultimo.

I have, &c.
Howard de Walden and Seaford.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

My Lord, Bruxelles, 13 Juillet 1868.

Sous la date du 20 Juin dernier votre Excellence m'a exprimé le désir de recevoir des renseignements sur les incapacités legales auxquelles sont soumis, en Belgique, les étrangers qui y résident.

En ce qui concerne les droits politiques, my Lord, les étrangers en sont exclus. Ils ne sont ni électeurs ni eligibles pour la formation des corps politiques. Ils ne peuvent être nommés à des fonctions publiques ni être témoin dans un acte notarié. (Art. 9, L. 25 Ventose an XI.)

L'étranger naturalisé est assimilé au Belge. Toutefois la loi exige la grande naturalisation pour être électeur ou éligible pour la formation des Chambres Legislatives. (Art. 1 et 41 de la loi du 3 Mars 1831.)

Quant aux droits civils, l'étranger jouit en Belgique des mêmes droits que ceux qui sont accordés aux Belges par les traités de la nation à laquelle l'étranger appartient. (Article 11 du Code Civil.)

L'étranger qui a été admis par autorisation Royale à établir son domicile en Belgique y jouit de tous les droits civils tant qu'il continue d'y résider. (Article 10 du même code.)

En dehors et abstraction faite des cas prèvus par ces deux dispositions la condition des étrangers n'est déterminée par aucune règle bien certaine, et est diversement appreciée dans la doctrine et la jurisprudence.

Pour ce qui est des incapacités auxquelles ils peuvent être soumis la loi n'a expressément determinée que la suivante:

L'étranger demandeur dans un procés en matière civile est tenu de donner caution pour le paiement des frais et dommages-intérêts résultant du procès, à moins qu'il ne possède en Belgique des immeubles d'une valeur suffisante pour assurer ce paiement (Article 16 du Code Civil). L'étranger est passible de la contrainte par corps pour l'exécution de tout jugement de condamnation, conformé ment à l'Article 10 du 21 Mars 1859.

Aux termes de l'Article 11 de cette loi, il peut même être arrêté provisoirement avant le jugement de condamnation, en vertu d'une ordonnance du Président du Tribunal de Ire instance: mais la legislature se trouve actuellement saisie d'un projet de loi portant l'abolition de la contrainte par corps même à l'egard des étrangers.

L'étranger débiteur n'est pas admis au bénéfice de la cession de biens (Article 905, c. Proc. Civile).

Les étrangers ont le droit de succéder, de disposer et de recevoir de la même manière que les Belges dans toute l'étendue du Royaume. Dans le cas de partage d'une même succession entre des cohéritiers étrangers et Belges, ceux-ci prélèvent sur les biens situés en Belgique une portion égale à la valeur des biens situés en pays étrangers dont ils seraient exclus à quelque titre que ce soit en vertu des lois et coutumes légales. (Loi du 27 Avril 1867.)

L'étranger peut être expulsé du Royaume dans les cas prévus par la loi du 7 Juillet 1867 prorogée récemment.

Enfin l'étranger peut être extradét dans les cas prévus par la loi d'extradition.

Veuillez agréer, &c.
(Signé pour le Ministre absent)
le Secrétaire Général,
Baron Lambemont,

Lord Howard de Walden et Seaford, G.C.B.

DENMARK.

My Lord, Copenhagen, June 27, 1868.

With reference to your Lordship's despatch of the 16th instant, I have the honour to enclose a copy of a note which I have received from Count Frijs, in reply to my inquiries on the position of aliens in Denmark.

It appears from the statements of his Excellency that foreigners resident in this country enjoy the same private rights as natives. They are, however, entirely excluded from all political rights whatever, and are debarred from all employments, civil or military, under the crown. His Excellency's note passes in review these disabilities, and seems to contain all the information which I was ordered by your Lordship to procure.

I have, &c.
Charles Lennox Wyke.

The Rt. Hon. Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

Copenhague,
Monsieur le Chevalier, le 25 Juin 1868.

En vous remettant sous ce pli la circulaire dans laquelle Stanley vous demande des renseignements sur la position des étrangers établis en Danemark, j'ai l'honneur de vous informer que pour ce qui regarde les droits particuliers et privés il n'existe aucune différence entre la condition des étrangers domiciliés dans le pays et celle des nationaux. Par contre, les droits politiques sont réservés aux seuls nationaux. Pour entrer au service de l'Etat comme employé, pour prendre part aux élections des membres de la représentation nationale ou des conseils municipaux, enfin, pour siéger dans ces assemblées la qualité de national est indispensable. Cette qualité revient de droit à tout individu né dans le pays, quelle que soit la nationalité des parents, sauf les cas où le séjour des parents n'est que temporaire; autrement il faut qu'une loi spéciale et nominative accorde la naturalisation à celui qui veut l'obtenir.

Je crois devoir encore ajouter, pour compléter les informations dont il s'agit, que d'après les réglements des chapitres de chanoinesses fondés en Danemark la nationalité Danoise est de même requise chez les personnes qui désirent être admises dans ces établissements.

Veuillez agréer, &c.
À Sir Charles Wyke, (Signed) Frijs.
&c. &c. &c.

British Legation, Copenhagen,
My Lord, July 30, 1868.

As a supplement to my despatch of the 27th ultimo, on the position of aliens in Denmark, I have the honour to enclose herewith, at the request of the Naturalization Commission, the written opinion of Mr. Brock, a distinguished Danish lawyer, with reference:

1st. To the oath required of aliens entering on certain professions.

2ndly. Whether the birth in Denmark of the son of an alien constitutes a Danish subject?

Your Lordship will see by the enclosed document that:

1st. The "Borgherskab" or Burgherbur oath was abrogated in 1859. The oath now taken by brokers, translators, &c. is non-political, and limited to the faithful performance of their office.

2nd. The son of an alien born in Denmark is considered a Dane to all intents and purposes, so long as he remains in Denmark.

I have, &c.
The Lord Stanley, M.P. Charles Lennox Wyke.
&c. &c. &c.

Sir, Copenhagen, July 26, 1868.

Your Excellency has asked my opinion on the following questions:—

1st. Is the "Borgerbur" oath still required for entering on certain professions, and, if so, what professions?

2nd. Does the fact of birth in Denmark constitute a son of an alien a Danish subject?

Answer, 1st. The "Borgerbur" oath required by the Danish law for entering on professions of different kinds has been abolished by the law of December 29, 1857. The oath still taken by brokers, translators, and such persons of public trust, that they will faithfully perform the duties imposing on their office, has no influence upon their situation as subjects of the Danish Crown, and is no oath of allegiance.

2nd. The son of an alien, born in Denmark, is regarded a Dane, if he remains here.

I have, &c.
Sir Charles L. Wyke, K.C.B., Gustav Brock,
&c. &c. &c. Advocate of the Supreme Court.

FRANCE.

My Lord, Paris, June 29 1868.

I have the honour to inclose herewith a copy of a report by Mr. Treitt, legal adviser of this embassy, upon the disabilities to which aliens residing in France are subjected by law, which I requested that gentleman to draw up upon receiving your Lordship's despatch of the 16th instant.

I have, &c.
Lyons.

The Right Hon. Lord Stanley,
&c. &c. &c.

La question posée par le Foreign Office est la suivante:

"Quelles sont les incapacités auxquelles les étrangers "résidant en France sont sujets selon la loi de ce pays?"

Il y a une distinction à faire:

1°. Entre les étrangers résidant simplement en France, et

2°. Entre les étrangers admis par autorisation du Gouvernement à établir leur domicile en France.

La loi considère comme étrangers ceux qui sont nés de parents étrangers soit à l'étranger, soit en France, et qui n'ont pas été naturalisés.

La condition des étrangers a varié selon les diverses législations qui ont regné sur la France; mais dans le présent document, la position des étrangers est brièvement exposée, telle que la font les lois, la doctrine, et la jurisprudence actuellement en vigueur.

§ I. Des étrangers simplement résidant en France, et n'ayant ni demandé, ni reçu l'autorisation d'établir leur domicile en France.

Leurs capacités.—Tous les étrangers, sans la moindre restriction ont, en France, le droit de succéder, de disposer, de recevoir; il n'y a aucune distinction entre les biens meubles et les biens immobiliers; l'egalité entre les nationaux et les étrangers est absolue, que les étrangers soient en France ou hors de France. Cet état de choses existe depuis la loi du 14 Juillet 1819, qui a abrogé les Articles 726 et 912 du Code Napoléon, et aboli tous les droits qui frappaient les étrangers, tels que droits d'aubaine, &c.

Cependant cette loi contient une seule restriction qui est toute d'équité:

"Dans le cas de partage d'une même succession entre "des cohéritiers étrangers et Français, ceux-ci prélèveront "sur les biens situés en France une portion égale à la "valeur des biens situés en pays étranger, dont ils seraient "exclus, à quelque titre que se soit, en vertu des lois et "coutumes locales."

Les étrangers comme les Français peuvent acquérir des biens en France, les hypothéquer, les aliéner, et faire à leur égard tous les contrats permis par la loi.

Ils ont le droit de prescription.

Le commerce et l'industrie sont absolument libres pour les étrangers; ils exercent le droit industriel à l'égal les regnicoles et peuvent obtenir toutes espèces de concessions; même celle de mines.

La propriété industrielle, artistique et littéraire a été objet de traités internationaux.

Dans les communes où les étrangers résident, ils participent à certaines jouissances communales, telles que la vaine pâture, la distribution du bois des forêts appartenant aux communes, &c.

En un mot, on peut dire que, en ce qui concerne le statut réel et le droit de propriété, les étrangers sont dans une condition identique à celle des Français.

Quant au statut personnel, ils jouissent de tous les droits de famille comme père, fils, et époux.

Ils ont le droit de chasse et de pêche et de port d'armes.

Ils ont la liberté du culte et la liberté individuelle et impriment leurs opinions comme les Français eux mêmes.

Des auteurs accreditès soutiennent qu'ils peuvent se créer une famille légale par l'adoption d'enfants selon les lois de France, qu'ils peuvent être tuteurs et jouir de tous le droits dont la loi a entouré la protection de la famille.

Leurs incapacités.—Mais les étrangers sont exclus de toutes les fonctions politiques gouvernementales. Ils ne peuvent être temoins dans certains actes authentiques puisque la loi a dit: Les temoins seront majeurs Français, du sexe masculin, &c.

Ils ne peuvent être arbitres dans les litiges parceque l'arbitrage en fait des juges temporaires.

Il faut aux étrangers une autorisation spéciale pour exercer la pharmacie, la chirurgie, ou la médecine.

Les emplois publics, comme prêtres dans les divers cultes, comme directeurs de postes et d'autre positions, qui exigent un serment au chef de l'Etat, sont interdits aux étrangers; c'est pourquoi ils ne peuvent être ni avocats, ni notaires, ni avoués, &c., &c.

Ils ne font point partie de la garde nationale, ni de l'armée, ni d'aucun jury.

Si les étrangers sont demandeurs en justice, le défendeur peut leur demander la caution judicatum solvi, à moins qu'il ne s'agisse de matières commerciales, où cette caution n'existe pas. Avant la récente abolition de la contrainte par corps, les étrangers pouvaient être arrêtés préventivement.

En cas de faillite, les étrangers jouissent des mêmes droits que les Français, seulement ils ne sont pas admis à la cession de leurs biens à leurs créanciers pour se liberer ainsi de toutes leurs dettes.

D'éminents juristes pensent que même l'état de guerre ne suspend point contre l'étranger son droit d'actionner le Français devant les tribunaux de France pour des obligations, même contractées à l'étranger.

En matière civile, le tribunal Français peut refuser sa juridiction à deux étrangers, mais en matière commerciale, deux étrangers ont droit à la justice Française dans tous les cas.

Enfin la loi du 3 Décembre 1849 (Article 7) autorise le Gouvernement à expulser du territoire de l'Empire les étrangers qui y voyagent ou y résident.

Ce droit du Gouvernement est arbitraire et absolu.

§ II. Des étrangers domiciliés ou admis à l'exercice des droits civils par autorisation gouvernementale.

L'étranger, à moins d'obtenir des lettres de grande naturalisation accordées seulement à de grands services exceptionnels, ne peut être naturalisé en France qu'après un stage de dix* années qui courent du jour ou le Gouvernement lui a accordé le domicile.

L'admission au domicile fait cesser en faveur de l'étranger qui l'a obtenue certaines incapacités qui frappent l'étranger simplement résidant. L'admission au domicile n'enlève pas la qualité d'étranger, mais il donne aux enfants nés en France de parents étrangers, le droit de réclamer à leur majorité la qualité de Français, sans autre formalité que de se soumettre aux charges des lois françaises, tels que le recrutement, &c. (Article 9 du Code Napoléon.)

Les étrangers admis au domicile jouissent de tous les droits civils; ce sont les termes formels de l'article 13 du Code Napoléon; il en résulte que même, avant la loi du 14 Juillet 1819 ci-dessus rapportée, l'étranger domicilié était capable de recevoir, de disposer, &c., comme le Français lui-même; il peut procéder en justice sans être soumis à la caution judicatum solvi.

Il est admis au bénéfice de la cession de ses biens à ses créanciers pour se libérer de toutes ses dettes.

Avant l'abolition de la contrainte par corps, l'étranger domicilié n'y était sujet que dans les mêmes cas que le Français; et il pouvait lui-même exercer la contrainte par corps contre les étrangers.

Bref, sauf les droits politiques, l'étranger domicilié jouit des droits civils comme le regnicole; cependant comme il est toujours étranger, il ne peut être témoin dans certains actes authentiques ni être arbitre puisque l'arbitrage est une juridiction.

Le domicile acquis en France ne délie pas l'étranger des obligations que le statut personnel de son pays lui impose ni de ses devoirs envers sa mère patrie.

Le droit de domicile peut être retiré à une étranger par le Gouvernement sur un avis du conseil d'Etat.

Mais malgré l'admission au domicile le droit d'expulsion écrit dans la loi du 3 Décembre 1849 reste tout entier aux mains du Gouvernement.

Certains pays ont fait avec la France des traités particuliers pour la jouissance des droits civils. Ainsi un traité avec la Sardaigne du 24 Mars 1760 dispense les sujets Sardes de la caution judicatum solvi.

Il y a d'autres traités qui réservent à des pays étrangers le traitement de la nation la plus favorisée.†

Mais de pareils traités sont presque superflus, en présence du petit nombre d'incapacités qui frappent les étrangers en France et qui appartiennent presque toutes à l'ordre politique ou aux fonctions qui entrainent la prestation d'un serment au souverain, car de tout ce qui vient d'être dit on peut conclure que par suite des progrés de la législation et de la jurisprudence il n'y a plus guère de différence entre l'étranger résidant et l'étranger domicilié, si ce n'est que ce dernier n'est plus soumis à la caution judicatum solvi, et que ses enfants nés en France ont une plus grande facilité pour acquérir la qualité de Français.

---

* Reduced to three years by the law of the 29th of June 1867 (Memorandum p. 49) C. S. A. A.

† Suisse, 12 Juillet 1828; Bolivie, 9 Décembre 1834; Porte, 25 Mars 1838; Mexique, 9 Mars 1839; Venezuela, 25 Mars 1843; Nouvelle Grenade, 28 Octobre 1844.

En résumé, l'état et la capacité de l'étranger sont réglés par les lois de son pays; son statut personnel l'accompagne partout; mais en France cet étranger est capable, comme le regnicole, de tout les contrats réels ou personnels reconnus par la loi française; au point de vue du droit privé la condition de l'étranger soit résidant soit domicilié, et la condition du Français ne diffèrent pas beaucoup aujourd'hui.

La jurisprudence tend incessamment à améliorer encore la condition des étrangers; on ne leur refuse plus que les droits qui leur sont expréssement deniés par des lois non encore modifiées; et ils jouissent d'une manière absolue de tous les droits que dérivent du droit des gens.

Fait à Paris le 28 Juin 1868.

(Signé) W. Treitt,
Avocat à la Cour Impériale,
Legal adviser to the British Embassy.

GREECE.

My Lord, Athens, July 16, 1868.

In compliance with the instructions contained in your Lordship's despatch, of the 16th ultimo, I have the honour to transmit herewith to your Lordship a copy of a report drawn up by the lawyer employed by this Legation, on the subject of the disabilities to which aliens residing in Greece are subjected by Greek law.

I have, &c.
E. M. Erskine.

The Rt. Hon. Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

Notice sur les Incapacités Légales des Étrangers en Grèce.

1°. En droit public:

Aux termes de l'Art. 3 du Code Civil Grec, les lois d'ordre public (de police et de sûreté) obligent tous ceux qui se trouvent en Grèce, par suite, les Grecs aussi bien que les étrangers. L'hospitalité, que l'étranger reçoit en entrant dans le pays, l'oblige à respecter les lois et les arrêtés de police.

Comme conséquence de ce principe l'Art. 37 du Code Pénal dispose que, dans tous les cas où les tribunaux de répression soumettait les Grecs à la surveillance de la police, les étrangers sont expulsés du territoire par l'autorité administrative.

Bien qu'en principe général le droit de répression ne puisse s'exercer qu'à raison d'actes commis sur le territoire hellénique, l'Art. 2 du Code d'Instruction Criminelle consacre une extension à cette règle à l'égard des étrangers qui peuvent être poursuivis, jugés et punis en Grèce: 1° pour crimes et délits commis à l'étranger contre un Grec, 2° pour crimes de haute trahison contre l'Etat, pour fabrication de fausse monnaie nationale, ayant cours en Grèce, pour contrefaçon de sceau de l'Etat, ou complicité à ces actes. Mais leur punition présuppose leur extradition ou leur arrestation dans le pays.

Les étrangers ne sont livrés à un Gouvernement étranger pour crimes et délits commis à l'étranger, que s'il y'a une loi spéciale ou un traité à cet égard.

2°. Quant aux droits politiques:

Comme on ne saurait avoir deux patries, on ne peut être citoyen de deux Etats; par conséquent l'étranger ne peut exercer en Grèce les droits qui présupposent la qualité de citoyen. Il ne peut donc être membre de la Chambre des Députés (Art. 70 de la Constitution), des conseils provinciaux (Art. 5 de la loi du $\frac{18}{30}$ Décembre 1836 sur les conseils provinciaux), ou municipaux (Art. 13 de la loi du 27 Décembre 1833 des Communes), ni se présenter aux assemblées électorales en qualité d'électeur (Art. 4 de la loi du 19 Novembre 1864 sur l'élection des députés) ni d'éligible (Art. 70 de la Constitution et même Art. 4 de la loi ci-dessus).

Ils ne peuvent être nommés aux fonctions publiques (Art. 3 de la Constitution) ni exercer la profession d'avocat que la loi hellénique y assimile (Art. 142 de la loi sur l'organisation des tribunaux et du notariat), ni celle de juré.

Aux termes de l'Art. 112 du Code de Procedure Civile, l'étranger ne peut être nommé arbitre.

Quand il s'agit de constater un fait on ne saurait choisir ses témoins; ils sont donnés par les circonstances de temps et de lieu, et tout témoin présent est nécessaire et capable, à moins qu'il ne soit sujet à quelque incapacité naturelle. Les étrangers sont donc admis à déposer comme témoins devant la justice. Il en est de même des témoins des actes de l'état civil. Ici aussi il s'agit de constater un fait: la naissance, le mariage ou le décès d'un individu. Toute personne qui a assisté à ces faits est admise à les constater.

Mais l'étranger ne saurait servir de témoin instrumentaire dans un acte authentique, contrat ou testament public. Ici, en effet, il s'agit moins de rechercher des preuves que d'en créer (Art. 179 de la loi sur l'organisation des tribunaux et du notariat). Les témoins participent ici à la confiance de l'Acte, et cette participation est un motif d'exclusion contre l'étranger qui ne peut remplir de fonctions publiques.

3°. En droit privé:

Nous considérerons l'étranger dans cette partie de notre travail sur deux points de vue: 1°, sous celui de statut personnel; 2°, sous celui de statut réel.

§ 1°. Statut Personnel.

La loi personnelle s'empare de l'homme à sa naissance pour ne l'abandonner qu'à sa mort. Elle lui donne un état, qui le suit en quelque lieu qu'il se trouve.

Ce principe est expressément consacré par l'Art. 4 du Code Civil de la Grèce, aux termes duquel le mariage, les rapports entre ascendants et déscendants, la tutelle et la curatelle sont réglés quant aux Hellènes, même résidant à l'etranger, par les lois helléniques, et, quant à l'étranger, par les lois de son pays.

D'après la première partie de cet article la capacité de l'étranger pour l'acquisition de droits ou pour l'exercice d'actes légaux en général, est jugée conformément à la loi de son pays, et en cela la loi hellénique a confirmé le principe généralement admis par les legislations des autres États de l'Europe, que l'état et la capacité des personnes sont régis par les lois de leur patrie. Mais le dernier § du 2me al. du même article consacre une exception au principe admis en faveur des étrangers. Dans l'intérêt des citoyens Hellènes, les étrangers qui, d'après les lois helléniques auraient la capacité nécessaire pour contracter une obligation, sont reconnus avoir la capacité nécessaire à la validité des contrats passés entre eux et les Hellènes en Grèce, bien que la loi de leur pays leur refuse cette capacité.

§ 2° Statut Réel.

Les immeubles font partie du territoire de l'Etat, et sont par conséquent régis par la loi hellénique. Les étrangers peuvent en devenir propriétaires même sans resider en Grèce, mais ils ne peuvent les acquérir ou en disposer que conformément aux lois helléniques. C'est la disposition formelle de l'Art. 5 du Code Civil. "La possession, la "propriété et les droits réels sur des meubles ou des im- "meubles situés en Grèce sont reglés par les lois hel- "léniques. La succession testamentaire ou ab intestat est "régie par les lois du pays du défunt, à moins qu'il ne "s'agisse d'immeubles situés en Grèce, lesquels sont, à cet "égard, régis par la loi hellénique."

Ainsi l'étranger est soumis à la loi hellénique pour tout ce qui concerne la distinction des biens en meubles et immeubles, la saisie immobilière, les hypothèques, la prescription acquisitive des immeubles ou celle extinctive des actions immobilières.

La succession ab intestat d'un étranger qui se compose d'immeubles situés en Grèce, sera également réglée, pour ce qui concerne ces immeubles, par la loi hellénique d'après l'Art. 5 du Code Civil.

Du reste, aux termes de l'article précité, les effets de la possession, de la propriété, des privilèges et des voies d'exécution sont régis par la loi hellénique même quant aux meubles.

Enfin un étranger ne peut être propriétaire d'un navire hellénique pour plus de la moitié (Art. 4 de la loi du $\frac{15}{27}$ Novembre 1836, de la navigation commerciale).

Droits privés de l'Etranger.

Aux termes de l'Art. 15 du Code Civil, l'étranger qui voudra se faire naturaliser, doit déclarer sa volonté à la municipalité du lieu où il veut établir son domicile, et habiter en Grèce pendant deux ans, s'il est Grec d'origine, et pendant trois ans, s'il appartient à toute autre nationalité. Passé ce délai et après qu'il aura été constaté que l'étranger ne s'est point rendu coupable de crime ou de l'un des délits prévus par l'Art. 22 du Code Pénal, il prétera par devant le Nomarque le serment de sujet Hellène.

L'étranger qui aura rendu des services importants à l'Etat, qui aura introduit dans le pays des inventions ou une industrie utiles, ou qui se distinguerait par des talents extraordinaires peut, dès qu'il aura fixé son domicile en Grèce, être naturalisé par une loi.

Pendant tout le temps qu'il sera nécessaire à l'étranger de resider en Grèce pour la naturalization, il pourra être admis par le Roi à la jouissance des droits civils, et dans ce cas il sera régi pour tous ses rapports légaux par les lois helléniques (Art. 16 du Code Civil).

Les étrangers peuvent contracter mariage avec des Grecs, soit en pays étranger soit en Grèce, en se conformant quant à la capacité aux lois de leurs pays, et quant aux formalités soit à celles consacrées par la loi hellénique, soit à celles usitées dans le pays ou le mariage est contracté (Art. 4 et 7 du Code Civil).

Les mariages mixtes avec des personnes appartenant à une autre communion religieuse sont reconnus valables par la loi du $\frac{15}{27}$ Octobre 1861 sur les mariages mixtes.

L'étranger ne peut être appelé à la tutelle de mineurs Hellènes, ni faire partie d'un conseil de famille les concernant (Art. 30 et 49, § 6 de la loi sur la minorité, la tutelle, etc). Mais il peut être tuteur de ses parents mineurs étrangers comme lui. Peu importe que la loi hellénique considère l'office de la tutelle comme une espèce de charge publique, réservée aux Hellènes seuls. Ce n'est pas la loi hellénique qui défère la tutelle du mineur et qui la régit, comme elle régit tous les autres droits personnels et de famille.

Un étranger peut consolider par l'usucapion une acquisition d'immeuble. C'est un mode d'acquérir qui est permis à tout possesseur de bonne foi.

L'étranger peut stipuler à son profit hypothèque sur des immeubles d'un Grec et en consentir une sur les siens au profit de ses créanciers.

Tout jugement émané d'un tribunal hellénique au profit d'un étranger lui confère le droit d'hypothèque judiciaire sur les biens de son débiteur situés en Grèce. Mais le jugement émanant d'un tribunal étranger ne confère ce droit qu'après avoir été declaré exécutoire par le tribunal hellénique compétent.

Le mariage contracté entre une étrangère et un Grec donne à la femme un titre d'hypothèque légale pour garantie de sa dot qu'elle peut inscrire sur les immeubles de son mari.

La femme Grecque qui épouse un étranger a le même droit sur les immeubles de cet étranger situés en Grèce. Quant à ceux situés à l'étranger, les droits de la femme sont réglés par la loi du pays de son mari.

Un étranger ne peut être nommé capitaine ou officier d'un navire hellénique.

Les trois quarts de l'équipage d'un navire hellénique doivent être pris parmis les Grecs (Art. 5 de la loi du $\frac{15}{27}$ Novembre 1836, de la navigation commerciale).

Les matelots enrôlés en vertu de l'inscription maritime doivent être des sujets Grecs (Loi d'inscription maritime du 24 Octobre 1856).

Aux termes de l'Article 220 du Code de Procédure Civile et de l'Art. 2 de la loi sur le timbre, de 1867, les droits d'indigence sont accordés au plaideur qui, en vertu du certificat du Démarque de son domicile, constate un état d'indigence. Les étrangers ne sont point admis à jouir de ce droit, qui est considéré avoir été introduit par la loi hellénique en faveur des Grecs seulement (Circulaire du Ministère de la Justice du 8 Juin 1837).

Tout étranger peut être poursuivi devant tout tribunal hellénique sans distinction, pour des obligations contractées en Grèce ou à l'étranger envers un Hellène (Art. 28 du Code de Procédure Civile). Et vice-versâ l'Hellène peut être poursuivi devant les tribunaux helléniques pour les obligations contractées par lui en pays étranger envers un Hellène ou un étranger, S'il n'y à point de stipulation contraire dans les traités, l'étranger demandeur qui intente une action contre un Hellène doit, aux termes des Art. 78 et 79 du Code de Procédure Civile, fournir, s'il en est requis, caution pour les frais du procès et les dommages-intérêts. Cette obligation n'existe point dans les affaires de commerce, ou lorsque l'étranger possède en Grèce des immeubles suffisants, ou que le defendeur reconnait une partie de la demande suffisante pour assurer le paiement des frais et des dommages-intérêts.

Tandis que le régnicole n'est soumis à la contrainte par corps que pour dettes commerciales, et, pour les dettes civiles, exceptionnellement en certaines circonstances de suspicion légitime, cette mesure peut être prise contre l'étranger débiteur soit comme mesure conservatoire, soit pour l'exécution d'un jugement même pour dettes civiles en général. Bien entendu qu'elle doit être invoquée par la partie et prononcée expressément par le juge (Code de Procédure Civile, Art. 999, § 1 et 1000).

La contrainte par corps n'est point prononcée dans les affaires civiles contre l'étranger qui possède en Grèce des immeubles suffisants pour assurer le paiement ou qui donne caution.

La contrainte par corps dont le but est de forcer le debiteur au paiement peut être évitée par le régnicole honnête mais malheureux, qui, faisant preuve de bonne volonté, et ne pouvant faire plus, abandonne tout son actif à ses créanciers, en recourant au bénéfice de compétence ou de la cession de biens. Cette mesure est refusée à l'étranger parce qu'il n'est pas possible d'en contrôler la fidélité. C'est la disposition formelle des Art. 688 du Code de Procédure Civile et 575 du Code de Commerce en vigueur en Grèce.

(Signed) G. A. Rhally, Avocat.

HANSE TOWNS.

My Lord, Hamburg, June 26, 1868.

By your Lordship's despatch of the 16th instant, I am directed to report the disabilities to which aliens residing in the Hanse towns are subjected by the local laws. I have accordingly the honour to state as follows:—

The laws of Lubeck, Bremen, and Hamburg, prohibit aliens from exercising the ordinary rights of citizenship, except as undermentioned. They cannot hold any office under the State, nor can they acquire lands or houses in their own names within the territories of the State. Those privileges are reserved to citizens of the State, and to the subjects of the other States of the North German Confederation, who are on the same footing as Hanseatic citizens. But a foreigner can easily purchase land in the name of a citizen as his trustee, and this is not unfrequently done.

At Lubeck and at Bremen aliens are still restricted from carrying on trades unless they have first acquired the rights of citizenship. The Lubeck law of the 20th of November 1866 and the Bremen law of 15th February 1861 had for their object the abolition of guilds, and facilitated the admission of foreigners as citizens at less expense than heretofore. But the condition of citizenship was not removed by those laws.

At Hamburg, however, aliens are no longer under any disabilities in respect of the exercise of trades. A law issued on the 7th of November 1864 declares that trades and industrial occupations may be carried on by foreigners not subjects of the State; and it also reduces the cost of obtaining citizenship by those aliens who desire it. Another law, dated the 30th of December 1867 abolished the exclusive privilege of entering goods in transit, formerly reserved to Hamburg citizens. The alien merchant is, therefore, in as favourable a position as the citizen merchant in any line of business which he may think proper to enter.

There are residing at Hamburg a considerable number of persons who claim the rights of British subjects on account of their birth or descent, but who are Hamburg subjects by having acquired citizenship, or by being the children of citizens, or by having been born within the territory of the State. Such persons assert a double nationality, and appear in the character of a British subject or of a Hamburg citizen, as it suits their purpose. Ought they not rather to lose their British nationality so long as they are the voluntary citizens of a foreign State?

I have, &c.
John Ward.

The Right Hon. Lord Stanley,
&c. &c. &c.

ITALY.

My Lord, Florence, December 19, 1868.

With reference to Lord Stanley's despatch of the 16th of June last, I have the honour to enclose herewith to your Lordship a translation of a report which has been drawn up by Signor Corsi, legal adviser to this mission, relative to the disabilities to which aliens residing in Italy are subjected by Italian law.

I have, &c.
A. Paget.

The Right Honourable
The Earl of Clarendon, K.G.

Translation.

Memorandum on the Laws which regulate the Rights of Aliens in Italy.

The civil capacity of aliens in Italy in regard to their private rights is as follows:

As a general rule "The alien is admitted to the enjoyment of all civil rights accorded to the citizen" (Art. 3 of the Civil Code).

If a citizen has lost his nationality before the birth of a child, the latter is considered a citizen if born in the kingdom and resident there; but he can, within a year of the attainment of his majority, determined by the laws of the kingdom, select the quality of an alien by making a declaration to that effect before the civil authorities of his domicile, or, if he is abroad, before the king's diplomatic or consular agents (Art. 5 of the Civil Code).

"A child born abroad of a father who has lost his nationality before his birth is reputed an alien.

"He can, however, select the quality of a citizen provided he makes a declaration to that effect in accordance with the foregoing dispositions, and provided he fixes his domicile in the kingdom within one year of such declaration.

"If, however, he has accepted state employ in the kingdom, or serves in the army or navy, or has otherwise complied with the terms of the conscription law, without invoking exemption therefrom on the plea of being an alien, he is considered a citizen without further formalities. (Art. 6 of the Civil Code).

"When the father is unknown, the child, born of a mother who is a native, is a citizen."

"If the mother has lost her nationality before the birth of her child, the dispositions of the two preceding articles apply."

If the mother be likewise unknown, the child born in the kingdom is a citizen (Art. 7 of Civil Code).

"A child, born in the kingdom, of an alien father who has been domiciled there for 10 years uninterruptedly is considered a citizen: residence on account of commercial affairs does not constitute domicile."

"He can, however, select the quality of alien, but the dispositions of the two first paragraphs of Art. 6 are applicable to this case (Art. 7 of Civil Code).

"An alien woman married to a citizen acquires citizenship, and retains it as a widow (Art. 9 of Civil Code).

"An alien can also obtain citizenship by naturalization granted by law or Royal Decree."

"The Royal Decree is not effective unless registered by the civil authority of the place where the alien intends to fix or has fixed his domicile, and unless he swears before the said authority to be faithful to the king and to observe the statute and the laws of the kingdom."

"The wife and minor children of an alien who has obtained citizenship become citizens, provided they have a fixed residence in the kingdom, but the children can select the quality of aliens by making the declaration mentioned in Art. 5 (Art. 10 Civil Code).

Citizenship is lost:

1st. By a person who renounces it by a declaration to that effect before the civil authority of his domicile, and transfers his residence to a foreign country.

2nd. By a person who, without the permission of his Government, has accepted employment from a foreign Government, or has entered the military service of a foreign power.

"The wife and minor children of a person who has lost his nationality become aliens, unless they continue to reside in the kingdom.

"They can nevertheless regain their nationality in the cases and manner described in the first paragraph of Art. 14 as regards the wife, in the first two paragraphs of Art. 6 as regards the children (Art. 11, Civil Code).

"The loss of nationality, as described in the preceding Art., does not imply exemption from the obligations of military service, nor from the penalties inflicted on those who bear arms against their native country (Art. 12, Civil Code).

"The citizen who has lost his nationality from any of the causes mentioned in Art. 11, regains it, provided:

"1. That he returns to the kingdom with a special permission from the Government.

"2. That he renounces his foreign nationality, the employment or military service taken abroad.

"3. That he declares before the civil authorities that he intends fixing, and really does fix, his domicile in the kingdom within the space of one year (Art. 13, Civil Code).

"A woman who marries an alien becomes an alien whenever by the fact of marriage she acquires the nationality of her husband.

"If left a widow, she regains her nationality if she resides in the kingdom, or if she returns there and declares in both cases before the civil authorities that she wishes to fix her domicile there (Art. 14, Civil Code).

"The acquisition or resumption of nationality in the preceding cases only takes effect from the day succeeding that on which the prescribed conditions and formalities are fulfilled (Art 15, Civil Code)."

The law of the 15th November 1865, for the regulation of the civil status, ordains:

Art. 44. "In the registers of citizenship are inscribed:

1°. "The declarations of a reputed alien who desires Italian nationality.

2°. "The declaration of a reputed Italian subject who selects the quality of an alien.

3°. "Declarations renouncing Italian nationality.

4°. "Declarations relative to fixing, or the intention of fixing, domicile in the kingdom.

5°. "Declarations relative to the transfer of domicile from one commune of the kingdom to another.

Art. 45. "In the said registers are transcribed the royal decrees conferring nationality.

Art. 46. "The declarations mentioned in Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Art. 44, are received by the civil authorities of the domicile of the person making them, if he resides in the kingdom, and by the diplomatic and consular agents if abroad.

"The said agents transmit, within three months after the date given them, copy of the declarations they have received to the ministry of foreign affairs, whence they are forwarded to the civil authorities of the last domicile of the person making the declaration; or, in default of that, of the last known domicile of the father.

Art. 47. "The declarations mentioned in No. 4 of Art. 44 must be made before the civil authority of the place in which the person making the declaration resides, or intends residing.

Art. 48. "The declarations mentioned in Nos. 1 and 2 of Art. 44 must explain the circumstances of their origin.

"The person making the declaration must further prove, by the production of his certificate of birth, or of a notarial document, that he has attained majority according to the laws of the kingdom.

Art. 49. "The declaration contained in No. 4 of Art. 44 " must explain the motive of its origin and the object in " view.

"When a declaration is made by a widow in accordance with Art. 14 of the Civil Code, she must prove her widowhood by producing a certificate of the death of her husband.

Art. 50. "Before transcribing the decree conferring nationality, the civil authority must demand from the " alien an oath, according to the special rites of the religion " he professes, that he will be faithful to the King and will " observe the statute and laws of the realm.

"The fulfilment of this formality must appear on the register.

Art. 51. "If the civil authority is requested to register " said decree after a lapse of more than three months from " its date, he must refuse to accept the oath and to register " the decree."

With reference to the influence of foreign laws on personal capacity and family relations, Art. 6 of the law of the 25th June 1865 ordains: "The personal status and capacity and " family relations are regulated by the laws of the country " to which the persons belong."

As to matrimony, however, attention must be paid to the following articles of the Civil Code:—

Art. 100. "A marriage celebrated in a foreign country " between subjects, or between a subject and an alien, is " valid, provided it be celebrated according to the estab- " lished custom of that country, and provided the subject " has not contravened the dispositions contained in section " 2 of chapter I. on this matter.

"The marriage must be notified within the realm in accordance with Arts. 70 and 71. If the subject has not residence in the realm, the notification must be made in the commune of his last domicile.

Art. 101. "A subject, who has contracted marriage abroad, " must, within three months after his return to his native " country, cause his marriage to be registered by the civil " authority of the commune in which he takes up his resi- " dence, under pain of a fine to the extent of one hundred " lire (francs).

Art. 102. "The capacity of an alien to contract marriage " is determined by the laws of his country.

"But an alien is subject to the impediments contained in " section 2 of Chapter I. on this matter.

Art. 103. "An alien desirous of contracting marriage in " the realm must present to the civil authority a declaration " from the competent authorities of his country, proving " that according to the laws of his country there is no " obstacle to the intended marriage.

"If the alien resides in the realm he must further make the notification required by the dispositions of this code."

The influence of foreign laws of property is explained in Art. 7 of the said law of 25th June 1865 as follows:

"Personal property is subject to the law of the proprietor's country, unless the law of the country where it is situated disposes otherwise.

"Real property is subject to the laws of the place where it is situated.

Art. 9 of the same law refers as follows to the form of deeds:—

"The extrinsic form of deeds executed between living persons, and of wills, is determined by the law of the place where they are made. The disposers or contractors may however adopt the forms of their own national laws, provided the latter are common to all the parties.

" The substance and effects of testamentary donations " and dispositions are considered as being regulated by the " laws of the disposer's country. The substance and effects " of obligations are considered as being regulated by the " law of the place in which the deeds were drawn, and if " the contracting aliens belong to the same country, by " their national laws. In every case the proof of a contrary " desire holds good."

Alien successions are regulated by Art. 8 of this law, as follows:—

" Legitimate and testamentary successions, however, " whether with reference to the order of succession, or " with regard to succession rights, and the intrinsic " validity of the dispositions, are regulated by the law of " the person deceased, whatever may be the nature of the " property, and without regard to the country of its " situation."

For the forms of procedure, and the influence of foreign sentences in the realm, Art. 10 of the same law ordains:—

" The competency and the forms of procedure are regu- " lated by the law of the place where sentence is given.

" The proofs of obligation are determined by the laws of " the place where the deed was drawn.

" The sentences pronounced by foreign tribunals in " civil matters will be executed in the realm, if declared " capable of execution according to the forms established " by the code of civil procedure, and if not opposed to " international stipulations.

" The manner of execution of deeds and sentences is " regulated by the law of the place where execution " ensues."

A general clause, placed at the end of this law (Art. 12), prevents a too extensive application of its various dispositions from clashing with the laws in force in the realm, and says:—

" Notwithstanding the stipulations of the preceding " articles, the deeds and sentences of a foreign country, as " well as private dispositions and agreements, can in no " case be derogatory of the prohibitive laws of the realm " which concern persons, property, or deeds, nor of the " laws which in anyway regard public order and morality."

The mode of citing aliens before the tribunals is traced in the following articles of the Code of Procedure:—

Art. 105. " An alien who has no domicile in the realm " may be cited before the judicial authority of the realm " even when absent from it.

1°. " In a question regarding real or personal property " situated in the realm.

2°. " In a question of obligations arising out of contracts " or deeds executed or to be executed in the realm.

3°. " In every other case in which there is reciprocity.

Art. 106. " Besides the cases indicated in the preceding " articles an alien can be cited before the judicial autho- " rity for obligations contracted abroad.

1°. " If he has his residence in the realm, though not " actually there.

2°. " If he happens to be in the realm, though having " no residence there, provided he be personally cited.

Art. 107. " When an alien has no residence, dwelling, or " chosen domicile in the realm, and no place has been fixed " on for the execution of the contract, personal or real " action as regards personal property, (l'azoine personales " d' reale su beni mobili), takes place before the judicial autho- " rity of the place in which the plaintiff has his residence " or domicile."

With reference to commercial relations, the stipulation of Art. 3 of the civil code above cited, which concedes to aliens the same rights as to subjects, independently of political treaties, is to be observed.

Anonymous foreign commercial companies carrying on business in the realm must be authorized by the Government like Italian ones.

A law of the 20th October 1860, allows French anonymous companies recognized in France to operate in Italy, and to have legal standing without any special authorization.

Two diplomatic conventions concluded on December 5, 1867, with England, and on December 8, 1867, with Russia, repeat similar dispositions as regards English and Russian commercial companies, but in the Russian convention insurance companies are excluded.

A French decree dated in September 1860, and the above-mentioned conventions grant full reciprocity to Italian companies in those States.

These and in general all other foreign commercial societies (accomandite collective), must publish their charter in the chancery of the tribunal of commerce of the district in which they choose a domicile.

With reference to questions of criminal law the Sardinian code has hitherto been applied in all parts of the realm except Tuscany.

The above-mentioned law of the 25th June 1865, in Art. 11, contains the following general dispositions: criminal laws, and those of police and public security, are binding on all persons who may be within the territory of the realm.

The criminal code contains the following dispositions:

Art. 5°.—" The native of the kingdom who commits on " foreign territory a crime against the security of the " realm, or who forges the seal, the monies, bank notes, " obligations of the state or documents of public credit " equivalent to money, is to be tried and punished in the " realm according to the provisions of the present law."

Art. 6°.—" The native of the kingdom who commits on " foreign territory a crime against another native of the " kingdom, or against a foreigner, when he returns to the " realm, is to be judged and punished according to the " penalties established by the present law, which, however, " may, according to circumstances, be diminished by one " degree.

" The same rule will be applied to the native of the " kingdom who commits on foreign territory a crime " against another native of the kingdom, provided the " injured party commences an action against him.

" The same rule will also apply if the crime be committed " on foreign territory against a foreigner, provided that in " the country to which the foreigner belongs the same " treatment is extended to inhabitants of the kingdom."

Art. 7°. " The foreigner who on foreign territory com- " mits a crime against the security of the state, or forges " the seal, the monies, bank notes, obligations of the state " or documents of public credit equivalent to money, and " who is arrested within the realm, or is given up by " foreign governments, is to be judged and punished " according to the provisions of the present law."

Art. 8°. " The foreigner who commits on foreign terri- " tory, either against a native of the realm or against " another foreigner, any of the crimes indicated in Articles " 596—600 exclusively, if arrested in the realm or given " up by other Governments, is to be judged and punished " according to Art. 6, provided the crime shall have been " committed within half a miriametre of the frontiers of " the realm, or, in case the crime has been committed at a " greater distance from the frontiers, when the culprit " brings into the realm monies or effects which he has " stolen."

Art. 9. " Besides the cases mentioned in the preceding " article, the foreigner who on foreign territory commits a " crime against a native of the realm and then enters the " royal states, is to be arrested, and the authorisation of " the king's government having first been obtained, an " offer of his surrender is to be made to the Government " within whose jurisdiction the crime has been committed, " in order that he may be tried there. But if that Govern- " ment should refuse to receive the culprit, he is to be " judged and punished in the royal states, according to " Art. 6.

" The same rule applies to crimes committed by a " foreigner against an inhabitant of the realm in a foreign " country, when under similar circumstances an inhabitant " of the realm would be punished in the country to which " the foreigner belongs, except in case of civil actions."

Art. 10.—" Articles 6, 8, and 9 are not to be applied " when the culprit shall have been tried and sentenced in " the country where the crime has been committed, and in " case of his having been condemned, shall have there gone " through the term of punishment."

Art. 11.—" No culprit can be surrendered to any state " without the order of the king's Government."

In the Tuscan provinces, where, as has been already said, there still exists the penal code promulgated by the Grand Ducal Government in 1853, the regulations respecting foreigners are as follows:

Art. 3.—" 1. Whoever commits a crime on Tuscan " territory, whether he be a Tuscan subject or not, is pun- " ishable according to the provisions of the present law."

2. " However, soldiers in the service of the state do not " come under the above head, insomuch as crimes com- " mitted by them are punishable according to the military " laws."

Art. 4.—" A Tuscan subject is punishable according to " the present law also for crimes committed out of the " Tuscan territory.

" (a.) Against another Tuscan;

" (b.) Against the internal or external security of the " state;

" (c.) Forgery of monies or documents of public credit " having legal or commercial circulation in " Tuscany;

" (d.) Forgery of the seal of a public authority or of a " public office of the Grand Duchy, or of the " instruments used in making it."

" The same rule applies to crimes committed by Tuscans " out of Tuscany against a foreigner; but in such cases

" (a.) For the punishment of death is substituted im- " prisonment (' ergastolo ');

" (b.) For imprisonment (' ergastolo ') is substituted the " penitentiary (' Casa di Forga ') for 20 years;

" (c.) The penitentiary can be reduced within the legal " limits; and

" (d.) If the crime is punishable with less than the " penitentiary, not only may the punishment be " diminished, as laid down under letter c, but " moreover the person injured must bring the " action against the culprit."

Art. 5.—" When arrested in Tuscany, or given up by " other Governments, a foreigner is liable to punishment " under the present law, when beyond the limits of the " Tuscan territory he has been guilty of a crime

" (a.) Against the internal security of the state;

" (b.) Forgery of monies or of public papers of credit in " Tuscany; or

" (c.) Forgery of seals of a public authority, or of a " public office of the Grand Duchy, or of the " instruments for making them."

" The same rule applies to crimes committed by foreigners " out of Tuscany against a Tuscan; but in such cases are " applied the limitations laid down in sec. 2 of the preceding " Article."

Art. 6. " In the cases foreseen in sec. 2 of Art. 4, and " sec. 2 of Art. 5, acts are not to be punishable which, al- " though punishable in Tuscany, are not liable to punish- " ment in the country where they are committed."

Art. 7. " If the Tuscan subject, as mentioned in Art 4, " or the foreigner as mentioned in Art. 5, has, beyond the " Tuscan frontiers, suffered the punishment inflicted by law " on his crime, no criminal proceedings can be taken against " him in the Grand Duchy."

" But if, condemned out of Tuscany, he has not gone " through his punishment, or has only done so in part, he " is liable to be tried again in Tuscany, but at his trial the " amount of punishment he may already have gone through " will be taken into consideration."

Art. 8. " The rules laid down in Arts 4 and 5 are to be " observed in every case where there are no others laid " down by special public conventions between Tuscany and " other states."

Art. 9. " No Tuscan subject can be given up to another " state for any crime whatever, whether committed in Tus- " cany or elsewhere."

As regards criminal proceedings, the following are the provisions of the various articles of the code applicable to foreigners.

Art. 34. " For crimes and offences punishable according " to Articles 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the Criminal Code in the " kingdom, the place of domicile, or of arrest, or of surren- " der of the accused determines the competency of the " court, and a preventive arrest may be made" ("E si fa " luogo a la Prevenzione)."

" However, the court of appeal may, on the demand of the public ministry or of the other parties, send the affair before the court or tribunal nearest to the place where the crime or offence has been committed."

Art. 35. " The court or tribunal competent to take cognizance of the crimes mentioned in the preceding article, may make use of acts made abroad.

" These acts may moreover serve to determine the indemnity due to the injured party in the case of crimes committed abroad which are not punishable in the kingdom." (C. S. 33.)

Art. 36. " Whenever a judge receives notice of an action or a denunciation about a crime committed abroad, which can be adjudicated on in the kingdom, he must give notice of it to the ' Procureur du Roi,' who will call upon the ' Procureur Général ' under whom he is placed." (C. S. 34.)

Art. 853. " When in criminal proceedings it is necessary to proceed to the examination of witnesses or to the drawing up of deeds with foreign judicial authorities, or to demand the arrest and extradition of a criminal who may be in a foreign country, the person drawing up the accusation must inform the court (' Sezione d'accusa ') to which he belongs, and the court where necessary will make the demand in the customary form, and will forward it through the public ministry, with the necessary documents, to the Ministry of Grace and Justice, in order that it may ensure the carrying out thereof.

" The extradition of an accused person may also be " demanded directly by the Government of the King."

" When the extradition of an accused person can be ob- " tained from a foreign Government only on sworn testimony, " the judge who hears the case may examine on oath the " witnesses whose depositions are required; of these depo- " sitions a separate volume is to be made which will serve " for the demand of extradition. At the trial, however, " these witnesses must again be sworn in the manner laid " down by the law." (C. S., 832.)

Art. 854. " When in criminal matters it is necessary to " draw up acts of accusation at the request of foreign " judicial authorities, it shall be done by the Court of " Appeal in the ' Sezione d'accusa,' and by the judge " appointed by it.

" In such case witnesses may, if required, be examined " on oath." (C. S., 833.)

Art. 855. " No alteration is made in the rules in force " for communications between the authorities of the " kingdom and those of foreign Governments on matters " concerning criminal jurisprudence, and the special con- " ventions now in force are to be observed." (C. S., 834.)

" In the cases in which, according to the provisions of " the criminal code, the tribunals of the state are compe- " tent to take cognizance of crimes committed by subjects " in foreign countries, when they return home, the act of " accusation and the documents necessary to prove and " maintain the guilt of the accused may be drawn up; but " he cannot be summoned or arrested until he returns into " the country."

In the International Treaties there are special dispositions respecting the enjoyment of civil rights accorded to the subjects of each contracting state separately; but, if exception is made of the stipulations exempting foreigners from any forced loans which may be raised in the kingdom, it may be said that they have been placed there more to satisfy the contracting powers than because they were necessary, for the provisions of law, as above explained, are framed on the most liberal principles of international law.

Such are, both in matters of private and of criminal law, the rules affecting foreigners in Italy.

(Signed)

Avo. Corsi.

Florence, December 10, 1868.

NETHERLANDS.

My Lord, The Hague, July 10, 1868.

On receipt of your Lordship's despatch of June 16, I lost no time in soliciting of this Government full information respecting the disabilities, civil and political, under which aliens resident in the Netherlands labour.

M. Roert Van Limburg in his reply, copy of which I have now the honor to enclose, makes frequent reference to the "Code Civil" and to the "Code de Procedure Civil" in force in this kingdom. Of these works no translations from the Dutch exist, a want that, however, is the less felt as the whole body of Statute law of this country is based on the "Code Napoléon" promulgated in 1810.

Of the recent Dutch legislation on this subject to which M. Roert Van Limburg calls attention, I have appended translations of those laws and articles the bearing of which upon the condition of an alien in Holland is not sufficiently explained in the text of his Excellency's despatch.

In the event of the members of the "Naturalization Commission" requiring further information on this subject, I would venture to refer them to M. de St. Joseph's "Concordances entre les Codes Civils Étrangers et le Code Napoléon," a work published at Paris in 1856, and furnished with an excellent index, showing at a glance the divergencies of legislation in different countries on any given point.

I have, &c.

E. A. J. Harris.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.

La Haye, le 7 Juillet 1868.

Monsieur le Ministre,

En réponse à votre office de 20 Juin dernier, par lequel vous avez exprimé le désir d'être renseigné au sujet des incapacités (disabilities) dont la loi frappe les étrangers résidant dans les Pays Bas, j'ai l'honneur de porter à votre connaissance que ces incapacités sont de deux espèces, et concernent, les unes l'exercice des droits politiques, les autres la jouissance des droits civils.

Quant aux droits politiques, les étrangers n'en ont pas la jouissance. Ils ne peuvent être nommés à des fonctions publiques qu'exceptionnellement conformément aux dispositions de la loi du 4 Juin 1858. Ils peuvent même lorsqu'ils résident dans le Royaume, sans avoir été assimilés aux Néerlandais en vertu de l'Article 8 du Code Civil, être extradés (voyez l'Art. 19 de la loi du 13 Août 1849). Enfin la loi du 14 Mars 1819 établit une distinction entre les Néerlandais et les étrangers par rapport à la délivrance des lettres de mer. Toutefois l'étranger qui a habité le pays pendant un an, est, aux termes de l'Art. III. 2°, assimilé à cet égard aux Néerlandais.

En ce qui concerne l'exercice des droits civils, les étrangers sont, au contraire, assimilés en général aux nationaux. L'Art. 9 de la loi, contenant des dispositions générales de législation, déclare le droit civil du royaume applicable aux étrangers comme aux Néerlandais, pour autant que la loi n'établit pas expressément le contraire. Cette restriction s'appliquant aux étrangers en général rend toutefois nécessaire de distinguer entre les exceptions qui s'appliquent à tous les étrangers, par conséquent aussi à ceux résidant dans le royaume, et celles qui ne sont applicables qu'aux étrangers ne résidant pas, ou n'ayant pas de domicile connu dans les Pays Bas.

À la première catégorie de ces exceptions appartiennent celles d'après lesquelles un étranger n'est admis à succéder soit par le testament soit ab intestat, ni à acquérir par voie de donation que pour autant que les mêmes avantages sont assurés aux Néerlandais par la législation du pays de cet étranger (Articles 884, 957 du Code Civil); et en outre celles résultant de l'Art. 152 du Code de Procédure Civile, d'après lequel tous étrangers, demandeurs principaux ou intervenants, sont tenue, si le défendeur le requiert, avant toute exception, de fournir caution de payer les frais et dommages-intérêts auquels ils pourraient être condamnés, et de l'Art. 155 du même code, lequel exclut du bénéfice du prodéo les étrangers indigents, à moins qu'une convention spéciale ne leur assure ce bénéfice.

Les exceptions de la seconde catégorie résultent des Art. 127 (relatif aux citations), 585 10° (relatif à la contrainte par corps), 710 1° (qui exclut les étrangers du bénéfice de la cession de biens), et 768 à 770 (relatifs à l'emprisonnement pour dettes et à la saisie des biens) du Code de Procédure Civile. Aucune de ces dernières exceptions ne s'applique toutefois aux étrangers assimilés aux Néerlandais conformément à l'Art. 8 du Code Civile, à l'égard desquels la règle posée par l'Art. 9 précité de la loi contenant des dispositions générales de législation est en tous points applicable en ce qui concerne l'exercice des droits civils.

Espérant, Monsieur le Ministre, que les renseignements qui précèdent pourront suffire au but qu'à en vue votre Gouvernement, je saisis cette occasion pour vous renouveler l'assurance de ma haute considération.

(Signé) Roest Van Limburg.

Vice-Admiral Harris,
&c. &c. &c.

(Translation.)

Law of June 4, 1858.

We, William III. &c.,

Having considered Article 6 of the Constitution, and consulted our Council of State, and deeming it desirable to determine the eligibility of aliens to Government employ, whether civil or military, have decreed as follows:—

Article I.

Aliens are eligible for Government employ, as—

a. Consul-General, Consul, or Consular Agents.
b. Chancelier or servant in missions, Consulates General, and Consulates.
c. Chief, subordinate, teacher, or official in the Government establishments for education, arts, and sciences.
d. Official in the Telegraph department.
e. Official connected with steam machinery.
f. Employé in mines.
g. Director and Commissary of Government entrepôts.
h. Controller and Inspector of Small Arms.
i. Die-sinker at the Mint and Government offices.
k. Engraver for any Government department.

Article 2.

Aliens who have served or are serving in the army or the navy, may, if furnished with an honourable discharge, after 12 years actual service, be appointed clerk, skipper, or guager, in the Revenue department, watcher, porter, or boom-closer in fortresses, toll-keeper, sluice-keeper, employé in military hospitals, and in the clothing, camp, equipments, commissariat, or military baking departments.

Article 3.

Aliens in Civil Government employ at the time of the coming into operation of this law are likewise eligible for appointment to any office mentioned in Article 2.

Article 4.

Aliens appointed previous to this law's taking to effect any office or employ other than those mentioned in Article 1, may retain such office or employ, but may not receive advancement in the public service unless naturalized according to law.

Given at the Loo, June 4, 1858.

(Signed) William.

(Countersigned) J. K. Van Goldstein.

(Translation.)

Article 19 of the Law of August 13, 1849.

The enactments of this law are not applicable to aliens who, under Article 8 of the "Code Civil," are assimilated to Netherlands subjects; and, with reference to this law, those aliens are considered admitted to Netherlands citizenship who are domiciled within the kingdom and married to Netherlands women, or who having been married to Netherlands women have by them had issue born within the Netherlands.

(Translation.)

Extracts from Code of Civil Procedure.

No. 127. An alien may, even when not domiciled in the Netherlands, be cited before a Netherlands tribunal for crimes committed by him against a Netherlands subject either within or without the limits of the kingdom.

No. 585.—10°. Aliens not domiciled within the Netherlands are liable to imprisonment for debt for any debt contracted with a Netherlands subject.

No. 710.—1°. Aliens not domiciled within the Netherlands are excluded from participating in the advantages of cession of property.

No. 768. Aliens not domiciled within the Netherlands may, without sentence in a court of justice, be seized for debts due to a Netherlands subject on an order of the justices of the arrondissement.

No. 769. Bail (on good securities for both debt and costs) may be accepted.

No. 770. Aliens, non-domiciled, are liable to seizure for debt, if payment of a debt on application is not made in eight days.

(Translation.)

Article 8 of the Code Civil.

Aliens are assimilated to Netherlands subjects in the two following cases:—

1°. When, in virtue of permission from the King, they have established their domicile in the kingdom, and made the communal administration acquainted with such permission.

2°. When after having established their domicile in a commune of the kingdom, and retained it in the same commune for six years, they shall have announced to the communal administration their intention to establish themselves in the kingdom.

PORTUGAL.

My Lord, Lisbon, August 22, 1868.

In reply to your Lordship's despatch of the 16th of June, I have the honour to inclose copy and translation of a note dated the 8th instant, and of its inclosure, addressed to me by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in answer to my application to him for information as to the disabilities of aliens in this country.

In the inclosure above referred to, your Lordship will find a statement of the rights as well as of the disabilities of aliens in Portugal.

I have, &c.

Ch. A. Murray.

The Rt. Hon. Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

Foreign Department, Lisbon, August 8th, 1868.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND EXCELLENT SIR,

IN addition to the note which my predecessor addressed to your Excellency on the 16th of July last, I have the honour to forward to your Excellency the inclosed copy of the report made by the Councillor and Assistant Attorney General to the Crown attached to the Department of the Interior, wherein the rights and powers to which foreigners are entitled in Portugal are summarily stated.

Having thus complied with the wish expressed by your Excellency in your note dated the 24th of June last,

I am, &c.

(Signed) CARLOS BENTO DA SILVA.

Copy.

Rights and Powers enjoyed by Foreigners in Portugal.

1. All foreigners residing or travelling in Portugal possess the same rights and are subject to the same civil duties as Portuguese citizens, as far as regards any acts which are to be carried into effect in this country, except in such cases in which either an express law or a special treaty shall provide otherwise (Civil Code, art. 26).

2. The status and civil capacity of foreigners are to be regulated according to the law of their own country (art. 27th).

3. If met with in these realms they can be sued before the Portuguese justices on account of any engagements entered into with Portuguese in a foreign country—the case of any special treaty excepted (arts. 28 & 30).

4. They can be sued by other foreigners before the Portuguese justices for any engagements entered into in this country, if met with there—the aforesaid case excepted (arts. 29 & 30).

5. Any judgments given in foreign courts of justice upon any civil rights between foreigners and Portuguese can be carried into execution before the Portugese tribunals (art. 31), provided they are examined and confirmed in any of the Tribunals of 2nd Instance of the kingdom, after hearing the parties, and in the presence of the representative of the Crown, unless there should be a treaty stipulation providing otherwise, or whenever the parties expressly consent to the execution of such judgments by a written agreement signed by them before the proper judge; namely that of the domicile of the person against whom judgment is to be carried out, and in his absence that of the place where the property is situated ("Reforma Judiciaria," Judicial Reform, art. 567 and respective paragraph).

6. Foreigners can become naturalized if they are of age, both by the law of their country and by Portuguese law, provided they are able to maintain themselves either by the work of their hands or by any other means of subsistence, and shall have resided during one year in Portugese territory, unless they should be the descendants of Portuguese blood, and should have come for the purpose of establishing their domicile in this kingdom; because in such a case one year's residence is not requisite, which may also be dispensed with by the Government in the case of a foreigner married to a Portuguese woman, or in the case of any one who shall have performed or may be called to perform any important service to the nation (Civil Code, arts. 19 & 20).

7. Letters of naturalization are granted by the Executive Power (Constitutional Charter, Art. 75, § 10), but are only valid after being registered in the Municipal Chamber of the district where a foreigner shall have established his domicile (Civil Code, Art. 21).

8. All foreigners who are naturalized are Portuguese citizens (Constitutional Charter, Art. 7, § 4), enjoying as such all the political rights appertaining to them, such as voting at elections, &c. (Art. 63 of the Constitutional Charter). They cannot, however, be elected deputies (Art. 68, § 2), nor succeed to the Crown (Art. 89), nor be a Minister of State (Art. 106), nor a Councillor of State (Art. 108).

Lisbon, July 29th, 1868.

CONTO MONTERO.

True copy.—OLIMPIO JOAQUIM OLIVEIRA.

True copy.—Department of State for Foreign Affairs, 8th of August 1868.

(Signed) EMILIO ACHILLES MONTEVERDE.

PRUSSIA.

MY LORD, Berlin, October 17, 1868.

I HAVE the honor to transmit herewith the translation of a note, dated the 7th instant, from Baron Thile, enclosing a report which I was instructed by your Lordship in your despatch of June 16th to furnish for the use of the Naturalization Commission, on the disabilities to which aliens residing in Prussia are subjected by Prussian law.

A translation of this report, by Mr. Harris, Lord Brabazon, and Mr. O'Conor, is likewise enclosed.

I have, &c.

The Lord Stanley, M.P., &c. &c. &c. AUGUSTUS LOFTUS.

(Translation.)

Berlin, October 7th, 1868.

In compliance with the desire expressed in his Excellency Lord A. Loftus' note of June 20th of this year, the undersigned has the honor to transmit herewith a summary of the principles applicable to foreigners as regards their legal status in the Prussian territory.

The undersigned avails himself, &c.

(Signed) THILE.

(Translation.)

Summary of the Principles applicable to Aliens as regards their legal status in the Prussian Territory.

According to the provisions of the General Prussian Body of Laws, the laws of this country are applicable to aliens living or carrying on business in Prussia in the same manner as to the Prussians themselves.

§§ 34. 22 of the introduction to the General Common Law. Ministers and residents of Foreign Powers, as well as those employed in their service, are excepted; for whom are reserved the immunities which belong to them by international law, and by the existing Conventions with different Courts. Page 36, as above cited.

The provisions relative to the application of this principle in criminal or civil suits will be hereafter stated.

The exceptional position of the "personnel" of a Legation has reference only to their exemption from the jurisdiction of the native penal and civil tribunals, and to the obligations which the laws of the country impose on aliens, not, however, to the rights which aliens can generally acquire within this country. In this respect the "personnel" of the Legation is in a similar position to other aliens.

Aliens enjoy all the privileges of Prussian subjects in the carrying on of business duly authorized.

(§ 41 of the Introduction to the General Body of Law.)

Whenever the respective Foreign State has not, to the disadvantage of aliens generally, or to the subjects of this State in particular, imposed burthensome regulations.

In this case retorsion can occur, from which aliens cannot escape by the abandonment of their rights to natives.

§§ 43 and 44 of the Introduction to the General Body of Law.

The right to retorsion becomes especially applicable whenever in the bankruptcy in the State to which the foreign creditor belongs similar privileges to those enjoyed by its own subjects are not accorded to subjects of that State (s. 3. Statute respecting bankruptcy, of May 8, 1855).

A. Whenever aliens and natives have put an attachment on the estate of their debtors, and that attachment gives in the country of the aliens an advantage to the latter.

S. 87. Part I. Title 29 of the general statute respecting tribunals.

The right of retorsion must not be put into operation by the Courts of the First Instance without the sanction of the legally appointed authorities.

S. 44 of the Introduction of the General Body of Law.

I. The entry of aliens into the Prussian dominions, their residence therein, or their departure therefrom, is not restricted by any burthensome formalities.

§ 2 B. of the law respecting passports for the North German Confederation.

They are authorized to take up their abode without being naturalized (§ 13 of the law respecting the acquisition and loss of the quality of a Prussian subject, of the 31st of December 1842, Law Collection of 1843, page 15), but in this case they can be required to state the period during which they may continue in their previous relations as subjects.

§ 14. Above cited.

II. Aliens are limited in the exercise of political rights.

A. They cannot take part in the representation of the country.

§ 7 of the regulations for the formation of the 1st Chamber (House of Lords), of the 12th of October 1854 (Collection of Laws 541), and § 8 of the regulations respecting the selection of Deputies of the 2nd Chamber (House of Deputies), of the 30th May 1849 (Collection of Laws, 205).

B. With respect to the political municipal privileges, the principle prevails according to the municipal laws prevalent in different parts of the country, that—

a. In towns the acquisition of citizenship, i.e., the right of participation in the municipal elections, as well as of the qualifications for undertaking unpaid posts in the municipal representation, is dependent upon the qualification as a Prussian; on the other hand, aliens can on the same presumption as natives, i.e., by the acquisition, for instance, of a local domicile, become municipal members without the right of citizenship, and thereupon take equal part in all the affairs and duties of the municipal members, with exception of the before-mentioned rights consequent on citizenship.

In the towns of the Duchy of Holstein (Holstein municipal regulations of the 11th of February 1854), aliens, on the same condition as natives (independence, respectability, and settlement in the town), are capable of acquiring the right of citizenship, provided the permission of their residence is not forbidden for police reasons, and that they have complied with the special existing regulations respecting the establishment of aliens. These regulations tend to the effect that aliens arriving in the country should not merely apparently and temporarily, but really settle down in the place. He (the alien) must not retain his own residence in another place, and must, when married, establish his household in the place, together with his wife and children, so that he (as the royal statute of the 23rd September 1796 says) can "be looked upon as our own subject."

Aliens who are unmarried and without a household establishment must as a security that they intend to remain in the place, and before receiving the right of citizenship, deposit 200 thalers as bail, which will be returned to them only after a lapse of five years, provided they have during the interim resided in the place and followed a civil calling; otherwise it goes to the municipal fund.

Besides this, the special regulations specified by the charter of the 5th of November 1841 (Chronological Collection of the Sleswig-Holstein Ordinances of 1841, page 243), with respect to the settlement of aliens, must be complied with.

The right of citizenship qualifies forthwith for every kind of civil employment in the place, also for the municipal elections, the municipal offices and duties (mandate), and compels the acceptance of the latter.

Residents in a municipality but without the right of citizenship are (Schutznerwanth) under the especial protection of the Government.

These enjoy such municipal privileges as are not exclusively attached to the right of citizenship, and are obliged to pay the municipal taxes (and by statute not at a less rate). Aliens can only become (Schutznerwanth) under the especial protection of the Government when they have complied with the above-mentioned special regulations respecting domicile in a place. In the Holstein country towns the same principles essentially prevail as in the towns and country towns of Sleswig.

b. Also in the country municipalities (Landgemeinde) the general principle prevails, according to the municipal regulations existing in the different parts of the country, that aliens can only obtain complete municipal rights after they have first obtained the right of citizenship. In the municipality of Hanover, however, owners of property, farms, and dwelling houses in general, can exercise the right of municipal electors, and so also, if they are aliens, without being settled there when they have acquired the right to reside in the respective municipality, which again presupposes the acquisition of the rights of a subject.

In the municipalities of the Sleswig-Holstein Duchies, by the decree of the 22nd of September of last year (Law Collection, page 1,603), relative to the right of election, the local regulations existing in each municipality are in the bulk maintained. These local regulations rest mostly on custom.

C. Relative to participation in the provincial and district representation, the qualification of being a Prussian on the part of an owner of landed property is not required.

The Royal Order in Council of the 28th of May 1809, which is in force in the eight older provinces, with the exception of the Rhine Province, makes the acquisition of nolle property and manor houses by aliens subject to a special concession from the Minister of the Interior, which is dependent upon taking an oath of allegiance. By Royal Order in Council, also, of February 15, 1858, it is ordered in accordance with the Decree of March 28, 1809, that the acquisition of a Rittergut by an alien must, before a special permission can be accorded, be subject to this condition, that the owner of the property must only exercise the rights appertaining to the same, especially that of attendance at Quarter Sessions, by means of a delegate who is to be chosen from these privileged owners of property (Rittergutsbesitzer) accustomed to the personal exercise of these rights. In the Rhine Provinces the Royal Order in Council of May 31, 1847, only states that aliens who possess land in the Rhine Provinces are not permitted to exercise the rights of privilege attached to the property until they have taken the oath of allegiance. With regard to capability of election, actively and passively, to the Circuit, Communal, and Provincial Sessions in towns and parishes, the condition of being a Prussian subject is in general attached, in accordance with II. B. of the above-cited Regulations, as such capability is made subject to the possession of right of citizenship or membership of the parish.

In the Regulations issued in the year 1867 for the newly acquired provinces respecting the Circuit and Provincial Constitutions, there exist no express provisions touching the necessity of being a Prussian subject in order to exercise the rights of landownership in regard to electing and being elected.

As far as our laws are silent upon this subject, aliens may be looked upon as authorized to exercise these rights. Without doubt those who are in a similar position to natives in respect to being large landed proprietors are not compelled to obtain a special concession or to take the oath of allegiance.

D. Aliens, having powers of policial supervision, are not permitted to exercise their authority in person, but must appoint a native delegate to superintend the police of the place (§ 7 of the law respecting the rural local magistracy in the six old East Provinces of April 14, 1856. Collection of Laws, 354). The appointment to situations under the State and also to the post of consul.

§ 6. Statute of December 31, 1842. Legal Code for 1843, page 15. Royal Order of Oct. 17, 1847, page 375. Royal Order of Jan. 27, 1862, p. 95.

§ 7 of the law on the organization of the consulates of the Confederation of November 8, 1867.

Federal Laws, page 137.

The right to act as jurymen in criminal suits.

§ 62, Decree of Jan. 3, 1849, Legal Code, 14.

Art. 56, Law of Dec. 3, 1852, p. 209.

The right to act as arbitrators in civil suits is not attached to domicile (Indigenat), but is nevertheless not allowed to persons living abroad.

§ 41. Introduction to General Statute respecting tribunals.

III. Aliens, with the exception of the Corps Diplomatique, are subject in like manner as natives to the indirect taxes, as also to the land tax payable on lands and houses appertaining to them in this country.

They are liable to the class and income taxes, subject to the modifications mentioned above in § 6 and 18 of the law of May 1, 1851. Legal Code, 193.

In regard to their legal rights in private affairs, aliens are permitted in Prussia to acquire both personal and real property, as also to carry on business of all kinds. As participators in an inheritance within this country they possess equal rights with natives. No deduction shall be made from inheritances falling to aliens, unless the Government of the alien raises a like tax on inheritances accruing to aliens.

Royal Order of April 11, 1822. Legal Code, page 181.

With reference to the acquisition of property by aliens, the three following limitations are in force:—

I. Donations, inheritances, and legacies cannot be left to foreign corporations and public institutions without royal permission.

5. 11. Law relating to donations and bequests to institutions and companies, of May 13. Collection of Laws, page 49.

2. Foreign corporations and other authorized persons, especially joint stock companies, are not permitted to acquire real property within the Prussian State without royal permission.

Law of May 4, 1846. Collection of Laws, page 235.

3. Estates and manor houses belonging to the nobility cannot be acquired by foreigners without the permission of the Minister of the Interior. Royal Decree of March 28, 1809, page 7.

With regard to real property situated in Prussia, it is subject to the laws of the jurisdiction in which it may be placed, without regard to the person of the proprietor.

§ 32. Introduction to general body of law.

Every negotiation thereon must consequently be carried out in the form required by the laws of this country.

§ 115. I. 5. Body of law.

The personal qualifications and rights of foreigners (jura status), are generally judged in accordance with the laws of their country.

§ 23. Introduction to body of law.

If, however, that law should as regards competency to enter into relations under the cognizance of the law differ from the Prussian law, then the competency of the contracting parties with respect to such relations entered into in these countries, and with respect to the concluding of contracts, shall be determined by the law with which the subject shall the best comport.

§ 26, 35. Introduction to body of law.

Especial regulations apply to the following cases:—

1. Foreigners who are desirous of contracting a marriage in Prussia, either with a native or a foreigner, must in addition to fulfilling the other legal requirements prove by a certificate, properly attested by the local authorities of their home, that they are permitted by the laws of their country, without hindrance to their state allegiance, to contract a marriage abroad, or that they have received in accordance with these laws the necessary permission for the contracting of the proposed marriage.

The ministers of justice, religion, and the interior are nevertheless empowered, as well in particular instances as with regard to the legislation of particular States, to permit to their subjects generally the production of such a certificate.

§ 1 and 2. Law of March 13, 1854.
Collection of Laws, p. 123.

2. The carrying on of business is usually permitted to aliens as well as to natives, but—

a. The right of owners of mercantile ships to hoist the flag of the North German Confederation is confined to those foreigners who are naturalized.

§ 1. Law of October 28, 1867.

Confederation Laws, p. 35.

General Order of March 25, 1868, relative to keeping the ship's log. Judicial Ministerial Paper, p. 95.

b. Aliens must obtain permission of the minister in order to carry on through agents in Prussia insurances and emigration undertakings.

§ 2. Law of May 14, 1853.
Collection of Laws, p. 293.
§ 7. Law of May 7, 1853.
Collection of Laws, p. 430.

C. Foreign agents in default of an international treaty can only carry on a permanent trade with the permission of the Minister of Commerce; likewise—

D. In accordance with § 12 of the law of hawking, of April 28, 1824, the alien is in general only allowed to carry on the trade of the pedlar under greater restrictions than the native.

3. Foreigners can only be appointed guardians to native wards with the consent of the Minister of Justice, when in all matters relating to the trusteeship, with the permission of their own foreign law, they have submitted to the authority of the courts exercising jurisdiction over guardians and wards.

§ 156, 157. Part II. 18 Common Law.

V. With reference to the administration of the civil and criminal code, the jurisdictional stipulations concluded with separate States come next into operation.

Apart from such stipulations the following principles are in force:—

A. In criminal cases.

a. Foreigners are subject to the Prussian criminal code, if they commit in Prussia a crime, misdemeanor, or excess, or abroad an action which in the Prussian code would come under the heads of high treason or false coinage.

§ 3 and 4. Criminal Code of April 14, 1851.

b. There is this particular difference between the punishment of a native and a foreigner, that in those cases in which a native would be sentenced to police supervision, a foreigner would be banished from the country (§ 29 in book above cited), and the return of an alien thus banished is punishable with three months to two years imprisonment.

§ 115, as above cited.

c. Aliens who fail to pay the fine affixed to smuggling are at once arrested, if they are found in the country, and the punishment of imprisonment fixed by law is carried into effect if they do not at once pay or find security, whilst the alternative punishment of imprisonment is only enforced against a native when the amount of the fine has not been procured by means of an execution on the property of the defrauder.

§ 54, 55. Law of January 23, 1838.
Collection of Laws, p. 89.
§ 24. 25. Law of July 29, 1867.
Collection of Laws, p. 1275.

d. With regard to procedure, the same regulations apply to aliens and natives; but in cases in which a private suit is instituted for examination and punishment, alien private suitors must pay higher fees than natives; if in their native state foreigners and natives are not placed on the same footing.

§ 492 of the law of June 25, 1867, touching the laws relating to penal punishment and procedure in those portions of the country annexed in the year 1866.

In time of war aliens are subject to the jurisdiction of courts-martial in two cases.

aa. Foreign officers attached in time of war to the Prussian army, and their suite; and

bb. All aliens who by traitorous conduct at the seat of war bring danger or hurt to the Prussian troops; but in this latter case this extraordinary tribunal only comes into operation when the king or the general in his name gives the order for the assembly, and makes it publicly known.

§ 18. Nos. 2 and 4 of the martial law of April 3, 1845. Collection of Laws, 333.

E. In accordance with the principles of extra territoriality, the ambassadors accredited to this court, the chargé d'affaires, their wives, and persons belonging to the missions accredited to this court, and their servants, are free from all examination and arrest, except sentence is passed on them by the highest state authority. Courts of justice and police authorities are bound to take every precautionary measure to hinder the accomplishment by any of these persons of a meditated crime.

§ 251, 253, 258. Criminal Code of December 4, 1805.

B. In civil suits.

1. Aliens have the same powers as natives asserting their private claims as plaintiffs before the courts of justice.

There are two exceptions to this principle within the jurisdictional limits of the general statute respecting tribunals.

a. According to the regulations of the general statute respecting tribunals, natives as well as aliens are bound to give security to the defendants in cases where the matter cannot be at once settled. But the defendant can only refuse in a suit with a foreigner to go into court, or to allow the suit to continue if the plaintiff cannot find security.

§ 13. I. 21.

b. Aliens can only obtain the arrest of another alien.

aa. When the summons has reference to a contract concluded or to be carried out in this country.

bb. When the debtor in the deed by virtue of which the arrest is sought has made himself liable either to payment, or arrest in any place.

cc. When the summons originates in a bill of exchange which has fallen due, and the drawer is a merchant who visits the fairs and markets of this country.

§ 88. I. 29. General statute respecting tribunals.

1. According to the regulations of the Hanoverian law in force in the province of Hanover, only aliens are bound as plaintiffs to provide security for the payment of legal costs, in accordance with § 54, 55 of the Hanoverian statute of November 8, 1850 (Hanoverian Code of Laws, page 341).

2. With reference to the obligations of aliens to appear as defendants before the courts of this country, a difference of procedure prevails in the provinces where the civil code or general statute respecting tribunals or where the common law is in force.

a. Within the judicial limits of the civil code, according to Art. 14, every alien, even if he does not live in the country, can be cited before the courts of the country on account of obligations entered into with a native either in this country or abroad.

b. There is, however, a difference in the working of the general statute respecting tribunals which depends upon this, whether personal or real law be put in force against the alien.

1. A personal forum (the forum domicilii) belongs to foreigners in Prussia whenever they have settled there, or are staying in Prussia with that intention. After the cessation of (eximirten) legal status they can be cited on personal matters before the tribunals of the districts in which they have settled, or have declared their intention of settling.

Section 26, 27. I. 2. General Statute respecting Tribunals. Section 1 and 23, Decree of January 2, 1849.

2. Foreigners travelling through Prussia have here generally no personal forum; accordingly they can only be cited before the tribunals of this country in those cases in which a native could be cited before another tribunal as constituting his personal forum.

This is the case:—

a. Whenever plaint is made respecting the completion or cessation of a contract which was concluded in this country, or should be here carried out, the plaint can be instituted just as well before the tribunals of the country of the concluded contract as of the place for its carrying out; but that forum is only established whenever the defendant allows himself to be met with there, i.e., whenever the plaint can be served upon him within the jurisdiction of any such tribunals.

Sec. 148–51. I. 2. General Statute respecting Tribunals.

The last restriction does not apply in plaints respecting bills of exchange. These can be instituted at the place of maturity against any persons responsible for bills.

Sec. 6. Law of February 15, 1850.

Collection of Laws, page 53.

b. Claims arising out of an administration can be presented before the tribunal at which anyone shall have administered a foreign real or personal estate, until the administrator has wound up the administration.

Sec. 154, 155, I. 2. General Statute respecting Tribunals.

c. If anyone has had an attachment served for damages, he must free himself before the judge of the place where the attachment arises, and if he be a foreigner, must on that account give security.

§ 120, I. 2. General Statute Tribunals.

§ 546, I. 14. General Body of Laws.

This regulation has been recently extended to the case of foreigners injuring natives in this country.

§ 8. Supplement to General Statute Tribunals.

d. In the case of attachment.

The order of attachment rendered necessary as security of the plaintiff's claim is admissible before every tribunal within whose jurisdiction the defendant lives or where goods of his are to be found. The hearing of the chief claim belongs to the judge of the personal forum of the defendant whenever he has a personal forum in his native country. With respect to foreigners, the forum determines the attachment as well as the hearing of the chief claim.

§ 179. I. 2, § 76, 88–90. I. 29. General Statute tribunals.

§ 201, 212. Supplement to General Statute Tribunals.

E. In the case of voluntary (declared or tacit) prolongation.

§ 160–165. I. 2.

In the case of obligatory prolongation this takes place—

aa. When aliens cite a native within his jurisdiction in this country, then they can be sued in the same forum (forum reconventionis) by the accused on account of all counter claims, and also when it arises from a claim in a real action relative to a moveable or immoveable property, whereas natives can in this case be sued only in the real forum.

§ 16, 17, and following, I. 19.

bb. In the case of actions for defamation.

When aliens pretend to a claim against a native they can be accused by the latter upon the hearing of their pretended right, which subjects him to the prejudice of a judgment against the pretension before the court to which the hearing of the case would belong.

§ 4. I. 32. General Statute Tribunals.

G. A divorce suit against an alien can in this country only be instituted when an alien who has no house elsewhere, or who conceals such house, has during his residence in this country married a native woman without acquainting her that he did not intend to remain in this country.

§ 129. I. 2. General Statute respecting Tribunals.

§ 38. Supplement to General Statute respecting Tribunals.

B. The real forum is open against natives or aliens possessing moveable or immoveable property for all causes of action having a real right for their basis.

§ 107, 116. I. 2. General Statute Tribunals.

a. In the provinces where the (Landfassinit)? is in force, the bringing forward of personal plaints in foro rei sitæ against an alien proprietor is permissible. Apart from this, even personal claims which arise out of the possession of landed property or out of transactions which in his quality as landed proprietor he had undertaken, can be instituted against the possessors of immoveable property in foro rei sitæ.

§ 112. I. 2. General Statute respecting Tribunals.

Under that head the following cases are included; when a landed proprietor refuses—

a. To fulfil his obligations contracted with his farmer or agent, or

b. To allow compensation for loans and materials employed for the improvement of the estate, or when a proprietor.

c. Disturbs his neighbour in possession.

d. Or sets up a false claim to the actual rights of the adjoining property, or when he in part or wholly alienates landed property, and does not fulfil his contract, or does not give the due quiet possession.

§ 131, as above cited.

B. These legal regulations are extended in favour of Prussion subjects, so that they can raise claims against any alien living in the country and possessing moveable or immoveable property, before the tribunal under whose jurisdiction the property is situated, on account of personal claims, with the object of obtaining payment out of the property he owns in the country.

§ 34. Supplement to General Statute respecting Tribunals.

4. In the courts having cognizance of inheritance there can be instituted against foreign co-heirs—

a. Claims of legatees and of creditors of the testator's estate.

§ 121–4. I. 2.

b. Claims on account of inheritance so long as there remains a portion of the inheritance.

§ 125, as above cited.

5. On requisition of the Prussian courts, execution decreed by foreign courts of law will be carried into effect when there is no doubt as to their competence, or as to the affair in question.

§ 30. I. 2.

Such doubts especially occur whenever the period shall have expired within which, according to the laws of this country, execution by decree can be sought.

§§ 2, 3. I. 24.

Or whenever a kind of execution inadmissible by the laws of the land is sought.

6. The §§ 292–6 of the Bankruptcy Decree of May 8, 1865, contain special regulations for the procedure with respect to native property of a foreign insolvent debtor.

Thus, merchants who have a commercial establishment in this country can obtain an insolvency (particular concurs) in respect of property here; and any other insolvent co-debtor is subject, upon petition of the creditors, to the bankruptcy procedure, which allows the appearance of foreign creditors. The balance remaining after the conclusion of the insolvency or the bankruptcy, as the case may be, is delivered to the foreign bankruptcy judge after the consent of the Minister for Foreign Affairs and the Minister of Justice shall have been obtained.

7. Envoys, chargé d'affaires, and residents of foreign powers accredited to this Court, and the persons in their service, are exempted from the jurisdiction of the tribunals of this country.

§§ 62, 63, 64. I. 2.

If, however, such persons possess real property in this country, they are subject to the regulations under Z. A. But inquiries must be made at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs before the summons is issued, whenever it is not a question of an essentially real action, and whenever the envoy, chargé d'affaires, or his wife even, is the possessor.

This exemption applies to Prussian subjects who enter the service of the envoy during the period of his service; also to Prussian female subjects who shall marry, after compliance with the requisite conditions, with the foreign envoys, or with persons of the higher rank in their suite. The exemption applies to the wives of servants of an envoy only whenever such persons are also in the service of the envoy, or reside with their husbands together in the envoy's house.

§§ 67, 68. I. 2.

C. The above-mentioned regulations, which are in force within the jurisdiction of the "General Decree for the Administration of Justice," come into operation also in those territories in which the Hanoverian "Decree respecting actions at law," of November 8th, 1850, and the common law obtains. The Hanoverian "Decree respecting actions at law," however, recognizes, in accordance with the Common Law, the forum contractus, even when the defendant is, at the time of drawing up of the suit, not within the district of the tribunals.

§ 10, as above cited.

The civil suit respecting forbidden acts belongs unconditionally to that tribunal in the district of which the act occurred.

§ 12, as above cited.

Lastly, the forum reale is recognized only on behalf of such real actions respecting possession, boundaries, and partition, as have for their subject immoveable property; and, further, on behalf of all actions against the possessors of immoveable property considered as such.

Executions arising from judgments passed abroad, and from decisions in arbitration, take place according to the Hanoverian "Statute respecting actions at law," page 533, with the same exceptions which are valid in the case of native subjects; and, further, that statute lays down in a similar manner to the Prussian statute respecting "bankruptcy," at page 605, that a special bankruptcy can be obtained, and the balance of the estate paid over to the foreign tribunal, in respect of native property of the foreign bankrupt, upon petition of the interested creditors.

RUSSIA.

My Lord, St. Petersburgh, July 1, 1868.

With reference to your Lordship's despatch of the 16th instant, instructing me to furnish information for the use of the Naturalization Commission, as to disabilities to which aliens residing in Russia are subjected by Russian laws, I have the honour to enclose herewith a statement on the subject which I have received from Mr. Roebuck, the consulting lawyer of Her Majesty's Embassy, and I also enclose a translation by Mr. Michell, of the law promulgated on the 22nd of February 1864, relative to foreigners residing in Russia who may wish to become Russian subjects, or who, having done so, may wish to resume their original nationality.

I have, &c.
Andrew Buchanan.

Opinion of Mr. Josiah Roebuck, sworn advocate at St. Petersburgh, respecting the disabilities to which aliens residing in Russia are subjected by Russian laws:—

Several restrictions and disabilities with regard to the enjoyment of civil and political rights to which foreigners in Russia were formerly liable, have been abolished since 1860, and the rights and prerogatives of foreigners have since been greatly extended.

Foreigners are thus allowed to trade without taking the oath of allegiance.

They can hold landed property, and as landholders are eligible as members of the rural provincial assemblies, with right of vote.

A foreigner may hold a commission in the Russian army, and take the several ranks in it, and having the rank of Lieutenant General or full General, or of Field Marshal, may be appointed Senator and member of the Council of the Empire.

The disabilities to which foreigners are still subject in Russia are the following:—

1. They cannot acquire the right of hereditary nobility.

2. They cannot hold the office of judge, magistrate, justice of the peace, advocate, or usher of a council of law, nor serve on a jury.

3. Foreigners are not allowed to enter the civil service. An exception is, however, made in favour of professional and scientific men, such as physicians, surgeons, apothecaries, architects, engineers, professors and teachers of the arts and sciences, who may acquire in the service of the state the ranks attached to their respective capacities, and receive decorations which they may acquire, do not confer on them the rights and prerogatives enjoyed by national-born subjects.

N.B. Aliens of the Jewish persuasion are subject to very serious disabilities.

(Signed) J. Michell.

Law of 10-22 of February 1864, relative to Foreigners in Russia.

1. A foreigner must be domiciled in the empire before he can be admitted as a Russian subject.

2. A foreigner wishing to become domiciled in Russia must inform the Governor of the Province in which he wishes to reside of his desire to do so, explaining the nature of his occupation in his own country and the pursuits he proposes to follow in Russia.

On the receipt of such declaration the petitioner is considered to be domiciled in Russia, but will nevertheless be accounted a foreigner until he take the oath of allegiance.

3. Foreigners already resident in Russia, distinguished in art, trade or commerce, or in any other pursuit, may prove their domiciliation by other means than those mentioned in § 2.

4. A foreigner, after being domiciled five years in Russia, may apply to be admitted to Russian allegiance.

5. Foreign married women cannot become Russian subjects without their husbands.

6. The allegiance when sworn to is merely personal, and does not affect children whether of age or minors previously born. Those born after the adoption of Russian nationality are acknowledged to be Russians.

7. Specifies rules to be observed in petitioning the Minister of the Interior to be admitted to Russian allegiance (documents and declarations required).

8. It is optional with the minister to grant the above petition or not.

9. An oath to be taken.

10. Mode of taking oaths.

11. In special cases the period requisite to constitute a domicile may be shortened.

12. Children of foreigners not Russian subjects born or educated in Russia, or if born abroad, yet who have completed their education in a Russian upper and middle school, will be admitted to Russian allegiance should they desire to do so, a year after they have attained their majority.

13. The children of foreigners wishing to become Russian subjects will be admitted on the same terms as their parents.

14. Foreigners in the Russian military or civil service, or ecclesiastics of foreign persuasion will be admitted to Russian allegiance without period of domicile.

15. A Russian subject marrying a foreign husband, and therefore considered a foreigner, may on the death of her husband or in case of her divorce return to her former allegiance.

16. The children in the above case are treated as in § 12.

17. Foreign women marrying Russian subjects and the wives of foreigners who had become Russian subjects are admitted as Russian subjects without taking oaths of allegiance. Widows and divorced wives retain the nationality of their husbands.

18. Special enactments relative to colonists, foreign agricultural labourers, Bulgarians, etc., remain in full force.

19. Foreigners admitted to Russian nationality are placed in repect to their rights and obligations on a perfect equality with native Russians.

20. Provides for the speedy transaction of business in connection with the adoption of Russian nationality.

II. Transitional Measures.

1. Foreigners who shall have already adopted Russian nationality may return at any time to their former nationality on payment of all claims against them (government, private, and other claims).

2. Those who throw off their Russian allegiance may either quit the country or remain in Russia, enjoying equal rights with other foreigners; they must provide themselves with national passports if in European Russia and belonging to a country in Europe, within a year; if residing in Siberia or having to obtain such passports from any other quarter of the globe, within two years.

On the lapse of such dates, without production of passports the foreigner must either leave the country or resume his Russian nationality.

3. Exception in cases of desertion and

4. Annuls all enactment compelling Russian women married to foreigners to sell their immoveable property in Russia, with the exception of certain kinds of property which as foreigners they still have no right to possess. With respect to the enactment concerning the payment of three years' dues and export duties by foreigners wishing to leave their Russian nationality, that law is abrogated in respect to those countries which shall adopt a reciprocity in such matters.

III. Abrogating law obliging foreigners to take oaths of allegiance prior to marriage with Russian women and requiring them to ask permission of the Emperor to contract marriage with a Russian woman of the orthodox faith.

SAXONY.

No. 39.

My Lord, Dresden, September 4, 1868.

With reference to your Lordship's circular despatch, of the 16th June last, directing me to report on the disabilities to which aliens residing in Saxony are subjected by Saxon law, I have the honour to inclose in copy and translation the information which has been kindly furnished me on the subject by the Saxon Government.

I have, &c.
J. Hume Burnley.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

(Translation.)

In reply to the note of H.B.M.'s Chargé d'Affaires of the 22nd June last relative to the disabilities to which aliens residing in Saxony are subjected, the undersigned has the honour to make the following communication.

The exercise of political rights in Saxony in their immediate relation to the State, as, for instance, the right of voting and being elected for the Diet as well as to the Municipalities, as, for instance, the right of election of representatives for town and country implies Saxon citizenship.

For the exercise of certain professions such as that of a lawyer, a notary public, and medical practitioner, it is likewise necessary to be a Saxon subject.

The regulations of our legislature respecting penalties to which aliens are subject as regards the civil law may be seen from the annexed document, which is a summary of the regulations respecting aliens contained in the Civil Code, concerning the acquisition and the laws of citizenship in the kingdom of Saxony of the 2nd July 1852, as well as in the Penal Code.

To obviate mistakes it is to be observed that the 12th paragraph of the Civil Code has been left out because it does not bear on the question, as it only prescribes that the mother of an illegitimate child may enforce her rights for the support and education of the child, although the conception may have taken place in a country the laws of which do not recognize such claims.

With respect to civil proceedings at law, aliens are only in the following cases placed on a different footing from the natives.

1.

Claims which by mutual agreement are to be settled in the country, or which it would be difficult to prosecute abroad, may in default of payment be recovered by the native from the alien who has no landed property in the country, either by arrest, inhibition of passport, or seizure of an adequate portion of the alien's property, provided the claim is to a certain degree established, and provided the alien does not voluntarily enter into recognizances. On the other hand the arrest of a native supposes a greater risk of losing his claim and lays him under the stricter obligation of proving it.

(See the order of process of 1622. Title II. § 1.)

2.

As a general rule the plaintiff, after having obtained a legal sentence against the defendant for the recovery of his claims, before his claims are actually satisfied, is not liable to an action which the defendant may bring against him, n order to get the sentence annulled, nor can the course of law be checked by such a counter suit.

If, however, the plaintiff who has obtained a legal sentence against the defendant, and is prosecuted by the latter for the recovery of what he has been sentenced to pay him, be an alien, the defendant, not to run any risk of loss, is entitled to demand a temporary deposition of the sum in question, making the alien liable to the action brought against him.

(See the order of process explained of the year 1724. Tit. 6, § 1.)

3.

Aliens possessing landed property in this country may, though not resident on it, be prosecuted for the recovery of all personal claims at the place where their property lies.

(See the article for the greater expedition of lawsuits of the 16th June 1583.

Order of process of the year 1622. Tit. 4, § 3.

Order of process explained of the year, 1724. Tit. 4, § 2.)

Whereas natives cannot be cited before the law court of the district in which his property lies unless other circumstances should declare the competency of such a tribunal.

4.

Aliens may for certain claims have recourse to the Elbe Courts, whereas the competency of such Courts respecting the claims of natives depends on certain contingencies.

The mode of proceeding against aliens for such claims has to be simplified and the case to be sooner decided.

(See Regulations concerning the competency of the Elbe Courts of the 11th September 1863. Law Gazette and Ordinances of the year 1863, p. 722 and following.)

5.

Finally, one of the regulations of the law to be noticed is contained in the order of process of the year 1724, according to which regulation the plaintiff is obliged in more important cases to give a security of 30 thalers, with a view of paying the costs arising from the suit.

From this obligation, however, are exempt such as possess anded property in the country, or exercise a trade, or own a mercantile establishment.

It is a question whether any difference should be made between a native and an alien, and whether the same regulation should not also be applied to a Saxon subject who possesses landed property or carries on some mercantile business abroad. In other respects the alien is placed on the same footing as the native respecting civil suits. Regulations such as that contained in the general mining law of the 16th of June of this year, § 16, in virtue of which the alien who owns a mine in this country has to appoint an assignee in the country in order to receive the summons of the respective court of law, have been omitted here as well as other similar regulations, as they are only intended to facilitate transactions between inland courts and aliens.

The Undersigned avails himself, &c.

(Signed) Von Bose,
Acting Foreign Minister.

Dresden, 17th August 1868.

Abstract from the Civil Code.

§ 6. The laws of the country are applicable in the country in as far as public rights, especially public treaties, and the following regulations allow.

§ 7. The enjoyment of rights and liberty of action of a person depends on the laws of the state to which he belongs.

§ 8. The liberty of action of a foreigner is subject to the home laws if his actions render him accountable.

§ 9. The form to be observed in legal transactions is regulated by the laws of the place where the contract is drawn up.

It suffices, however, to observe the laws of the place where the business is to be carried on.

§ 10. The rights to movable and immoveable property as well as the right of possession depends on the laws of the place where such property lies.

§ 11. Aliens are to be judged by the laws of the place where they are to be settled.

§ 13. Marriage and divorce are subject to the laws of the husband's country.

§ 14. Marriage settlements are subject to the laws in force at the husband's domicile at the time of the marriage contract. Such rights are not altered by a change of residence.

Donations between husband and wife are regulated by the laws in force for the time at the place where the husband resides.

§ 15. Paternal authority follows the laws of the country to which the father belongs.

§ 16. Guardianship is subject to the laws of the minor's country.

§ 17. Inheritance is decided by the laws of the place at which the testator last resided. In case of several residences the laws of the last are to be observed.

§ 18. In as far as rights depend upon the option of the parties, they are allowed to avail themselves of other laws than those immediately applicable.

§ 19. Foreign laws are not admissible if they are excluded explicitly or implicitly by the laws of the country.

§ 20. In case the laws of a foreign state make a difference between natives and aliens, this difference is to be taken into account with respect to aliens by the laws of this country if special regulations are not against it. Such reciprocity cannot be evaded by ceding one's rights to another.

§ 1878. An alien, being a minor, and having immoveable property in the country, has to appoint a guardian for it. The foreign guardian of the minor may act as such.

§ 1879. If a foreigner who has a guardian abroad or is under the parential care of a foreigner requires a guardian in the country for some legal purpose or lawsuit, such a guardian may be appointed by the courts of the country.

Abstract from the Penal Code.

Art. 3.

Foreigners who have committed a crime, and are to be tried by a tribunal of the country, are subject to the penalties of this code with the exception of the case mentioned in Art. 8.

Art. 4.

Trial of a foreigner for a crime committed.

(a.) Foreigners enjoying the rights of extra territoriality.

Art. 5.

(b.) With respect to other foreigners, those who are guilty of a crime are likewise to be tried only by order of the ministry of justice if the crime has been committed abroad; but even in this case the order is not requisite.

1st. If the crime has been committed against a state, its authorities, or subjects, or persons who live under its protection or were in Saxony at the time of the crime;

2ndly. If the criminal has settled in Saxony.

Art. 8.

Foreign Penal Laws.

If an offence has been committed abroad by a foreigner, or is, according to Articles 4, 5, 6, brought before a tribunal, he is to be judged by the laws of the country where the offence has taken place, provided it be known or can be proved that the culprit would, according to these laws, either not be punished at all or less severely than by the Saxon laws, or only upon indictment, with the exception of the cases mentioned in Art. 5, No. 1, as well as of offences committed against the king and the royal family, in which cases the present penal code has to be enforced; if in conformity with the above regulations the judge has to refer to a foreign penal law, and this law inflicts upon the culprit a punishment which is inadmissable according to the present law, he cannot go beyond the wording of the law.

Art 9.

Foreign Punishment.

In case the culprit has already been punished for his offence by a competent tribunal of another state he cannot be punished again for the same offence by a tribunal of this country, unless he has at the same time made himself guilty by violating certain obligations incumbent on him towards the country, its sovereign, and his subjects, and then his previous penalty is to be taken into account even in the case of a sentence pronounced by an incompetent foreign tribunal.

Art. 312.

Trade Marks.

Whoever counterfeits with the intention to deceive the peculiar marks of merchants and manufacturers is liable to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding four months, and if the imprisonment is only for two months he has to pay a fine up to 200 thalers; the counterfeiter, however, can only be indicted by the merchant or manufacturer whose trade marks he has forged.

Complaints of foreign merchants and manufacturers respecting such counterfeits can only be attended to if they can prove reciprocity on the part of the state to which they belong.

(Extract from the law respecting the acquisition and loss of Saxon citizenship of the 2nd July.)

§ 9.

Obligation requiring Naturalization.

Every foreigner in the Kingdom of Saxony who desires (a) to become possessed of landed property in town or country, with personal residence;

(b.) or to obtain naturalization according to the forms of municipal law; or

(c.) to exercise in the country a trade or profession which in a town would require naturalization; or

(d.) to hold a municipal office or some other employment in church or school which is not under Government patronage is obliged previously to become a Saxon subject.

Persons mentioned under "d" may apply for it to the respective authorities in whom the patronage is vested.

§ 10.

There is no necessity for naturalization

(a.) for such as hold landed property in Saxony on which they are not domiciled and which is under foreign management;

(b.) for foreigners who acquire landed property in Saxony with habitual residence but usually reside abroad, as long as they continue abroad;

(c.) when a wholesale business or manufacture is established in the country by a foreigner residing abroad.

In the cases b and c, on condition that the obligations of citizenship which are attached to a property or undertaking are fulfilled by a proper native representative.

Foreigners under § 10 (a, b, c) participate in the privileges and duties of a Saxon subject only as far as the nature of their property or trade may admit or be sanctioned by the law.

The rights of political honours in Saxony cannot be exercised by them.

SWEDEN.

My Lord, Stockholm, July 31, 1868.

I have the honour to enclose copy of a letter I have received from Count Wachtmeister, forwarding for the information of Her Majesty's Government a memorandum of the disabilities to which foreigners residing in Sweden are subjected by the Swedish laws.

I have, &c.

The Lord Stanley, M.P. J. Pakenham.
&c. &c. &c.

Monsieur, Stockholm, le 27 Juillet 1868.

Par une note du 24 du mois dernier, M. le Ministre d'Angleterre s'est adressé à M. le Baron d'Ugglas, faisant alors les fonctions de Ministre des Affaires Etrangères, avec la demande d'obtenir pour le compte du Gouvernement Britannique des renseigneme nts complets sur les disqualifications ("disabilities") auxquelles a loi Suédoise assujettit les étrangeres residant en Suède.

Je me vois maintenant à même de fournir ces renseignements, et je m'empresse de vous les transmettre en joignant ci-près le mémoire élaboré sur ce sujet au Ministère de la Justice.

Veuillez, &c.

Mr. Pakenham, (Signé) Wachtmeister.
&c. &c. &c.

(Translation.) P. M.

Relative to the disqualifications to which foreigners settled in Sweden are subject, on the ground of existing Swedish statutes.

Swedish subjects only are eligible for election to the "Riksdag" (the Swedish Legislative Chambers). (See § 22 of the "Riksdag" Regulations.)

It does not appear, either, that foreigners are entitled to take part in the election of members of the "Riksdag," or of members of the municipal administrative bodies. (See § 8 of the statute relative to municipal administration in the rural districts; § 10 of the statute relative to municipal administration in towns; § 4 of the statute relative to church vestries ("Kyrkoråd") and school committees ("Skolråd"); §§ 3, 5, and 7, of the statute relative to the "Lands Ting" (boards elected in provincial districts for the management of local communal affairs), all of the 21st day of March 1862, compared with §§ 6 and 14 of the "Riksdag" Regulations.

Offices of trust and service under the Government may as a rule, only be filled by natural-born Swedish men.

Foreigners may notwithstanding, in certain cases, be called and appointed:

Firstly. To the posts of professors or teachers at the Universities, with the exception of posts for theological instruction; they may also be appointed teachers, or in any other capacity, at other scientific, industrial and artistic institutions, and also to the medical profession.

Secondly. To military posts; not, however, to that of commander of a fortress.

(See § 28 of the Constitution, "Regerings Formen.")

Foreigners belonging to countries in which Swedish subjects are entitled to inherit property also possess the same right in Sweden (see chap. 15, § 2, of the Statute of Inheritance, "Arfda Balken"), so that they may thus become the holders of real and personal estate in the kingdom.

Foreigners may not otherwise hold real and personal estate in Sweden, without the special permission of the King (see the Royal Proclamation of the 3rd October 1829); but there appears to be no legal hindrance to foreigners possessing the usufruct of real and personal estate on lease or otherwise.

Foreigners may not act as the guardians of minors or others. (See chap. 20, § 8, of the Statute of Inheritance "Arfda Balken.")

With reference to the right of foreigners to exercise trade and industry in this country:

Foreigners are permitted to be part owners of vessels registered either for home or foreign trade; but they may not possess more than one-third of the tonnage of Swedish vessels, nor be the managing owners.

Foreigners who have obtained permission of the King to dwell in the kingdom may also, after special inquiry in each case, obtain permission to exercise trade, manufactures, mechanical employments, or any other calling. (See the Royal Statute of the 18th June 1864.)

It should be specially observed that the King possesses he prerogative of adopting foreigners as Swedish subjects y act of naturalization. (See § 28, sect. 2, of the Constiution, "Regerings Formen.")

The manner of such naturalization, and its conditions, re determined by the Royal Statute of the 27th February 858, which enacts generally:

That the rights of Swedish subjects may, on application o the King, be obtained by foreigners who have attained he age of 21, are of good repute, have resided in the ingdom for three years, and who possess the means of upporting themselves.

That such application shall be accompanied by a certifiate of the age of the candidate, the country to which he elongs, the time when he arrived in the kingdom, his haracter, and the religious faith he professes.

And that the candidate, provided the application be ranted, shall, within the term prescribed by the King, and efore the proper authorities, attest that he has ceased to be subject of the foreign power to which he formerly belonged, r otherwise resign, in writing, all the political privileges nd rights he may possess in the said foreign country; nd the candidate shall also take the oath of allegiance to he King as a Swedish subject.

Thus naturalized foreigners enjoy the same rights and rivileges as natural-born Swedes, except in so far that hey cannot be appointed members of the Council of State "Statsråd").

In fidem
GEORGE FRENDBERG APGEORGE,
Sworn Translator.

Stockholm,
30th July 1868.

SWITZERLAND.

MY LORD, Berne, July 4, 1868.

IN obedience to the instructions contained in our Lordship's despatch of the 16th ultimo, I have he honour to enclose herewith, copy of a note dated he 26th ultimo, from the Federal Council, giving an ccount of the disabilities to which aliens residing in witzerland are subjected by law.

I have, &c.
J. SAVILE LUMLEY.

To the Right Hon. the Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

Berne, le 26 Juin 1868.

EN réponse à la note que M. le Ministre de sa Majesté ritannique lui a adressée le 19 courant, le Conseil Fédéral l'honneur d'annoncer à son Excellence que les étrangers ésidant en Suisse ne possèdent aucuns droits politiques, u'ils sont exclus du service militaire, et que, s'il n'existe as des traités, ils ne peuvent dans différents cantons cquérir des propriétés foncières sans la permission du ouvernement Cantonal ou même du Grand Conseil.

Des citoyens Suisses naturalisés ne sont, à teneur de Art. 64 de la Constitution Fédérale éligibles au Conseil ational qu'après cinq ans de possession du droit de cité.

Le Conseil Fédéral, etc. etc.
(Signé) Au nom du Conseil Fédéral,
Le Président,
DUBS.
Le Chancelier,
SCHIESS.

A son Excellence M. Lumley,
&c. &c. &c.

UNITED STATES.

MEMORANDUM by Mr. Carlisle, Counsel to H.M.'s Legation at Washington.—Capacity of Aliens to hold Lands in the United States.

Aliens are expressly made capable of taking, olding, and transmitting lands without residence or ther condition in the States of Ohio, Michigan, and llinois [see Ohio, Rev. St. 1841, ch. 3. Michigan, ev. St. 1837, 8, p. 266, § 26. Illinois, Rev. St. 833, p. 626, § 38]. In other States they are habiliated upon conditions or with modifications. Thus esidence in the State is required in New Hampshire (Rev. St. ch. 120, § 4), and in Missouri (Rev. St. 1845, ch. 6). Residence and the oath of allegiance are required by the constitutions of Vermont (§ 39), and of North Carolina (§ 40), and by a statute of South Carolina (Stat. 1799, 1 Brevard, Dig. 236, Vaux v. Nesbitt, MacCord, ch. R. 362). In New Jersey it is required to be an alien friend at the time of taking (Elmer's Dig. p. 6, Stat. March 13, 1845). So it is in Pennsylvania, but his right to hold by purchase and transmit to heirs is restricted to 5,000 acres, statute of March 24, 1818, Purdor's Digest, p. 57, though the right to take and hold by descent, which is given by an earlier statute is without restriction (Statute, Feb. 23, 1791, Purdor's Digest, 56). A person's declaration of intention to become a naturalized citizen, pursuant to the Statutes of the United States, is required by the laws of Connecticut, Maine, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Tennessee, Arkansas, Indiana, and Missouri. In Connecticut a residence of one year in the State is also a pre-requisite (Stat. 1845, ch. 3), but a special capacity may be granted by chancery after a residence of six months (Rev. St. 1838, tit. 36). In Delaware (Rev. St. 1829, p. 33, 202) and in Tennessee (Stat. 1839. ch. 3, § 1) and in Indiana (Rev. Stat. 1843, p. 414), residence in the United States is required, but without any definite time. In Missouri (Rev. St. 1845, ch. 6) it is sufficient if the party is resident in the United States. In Arkansas (Rev. St. 1837, ch. 7) residence in the State is required in order to take by purchase, but residence elsewhere in the United States is sufficient in order to transmit by descent. In Maine (Rev. St. ch. 91, § 2; ch. 93, § 5, 6, 7), Maryland (Stat. 1814, ch. 79, Dorsey's ed. 625), and Virginia (Stat. 1813, ch. 25, Tate's Dig. p. 24), the title is not complete unless the party's naturalization is subsequently completed. But in Maine his heirs may take by descent if the ancestor dies before the time for being naturalized has arrived. In New York an alien resident anywhere within the United States is enabled to take and hold in fee, and to sell, assign, mortgage, and devise real estate, but not to lease or demise the same, provided he shall have made oath before any officer authorized to take proof of deeds, that he is a resident of and intends always to reside in the United States, and to become a citizen thereof as soon as he can be naturalized, and that he has taken the incipient measures required by law for that purpose, which deposition must be filed in the office of the Secretary of State.

This power to alien and convey is to continue for six years after making and filing such deposition, but no such alien can take or hold lands descended, devised, or conveyed to him previous to him having become a resident of the United States, and having made the above-mentioned deposition. And if he dies within the six years, his heirs being inhabitants of the United States, may take by descent as though they were citizens (N.Y. Rev. Stat. 1846, vol. 2, p. 4, § 16, 17, 18, 19). And by subsequent statute any alien resident in the State of New York, on making and filing the oath above mentioned, is rendered fully capable of taking, holding, and conveying real estate as a citizen (Ibid. p. 56, § 26, 37), and see Kent. Com. 69, 70. Under these statutes the widow of an alien grantee is considered as a purchaser, and is therefore entitled to dower (Sutliff v. Forgey, 1 Cowan 89, 5 Cowan 713, Priest v. Cummins, 16 Wend. 617).

MY LORD, Washington, July 14, 1868.

IN the absence of Mr. Carlisle, the legal adviser of this Legation, and in order to comply with the instruction contained in your Lordship's Despatch of the 16th ultimo, I desired his partner Mr. McPherson to make a report as to the disabilities of aliens in this country; and I have now the honour to enclose copy of a letter he has addressed to me with the report in question, in which he states that more time would be required to draw up a complete report upon the subject; but I believe that the enclosed document contains nearly all that is required by the Royal Commission.

I, however, add a pamphlet* which was in the archives, containing extracts from the laws of the State of New York relative to the tenure of real estate by aliens, and a collection of the enactments of all the states as to the right of aliens to vote, hold office, &c.

I have been unable as yet to procure another copy of this pamphlet, and am therefore obliged to transmit the only one existing in the archives of this Legation.

I have, &c.

EDWD. THORNTON.

The Right Hon. Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

436, D. Street, Washington,
July 13, 1868.

IN compliance with your request I present herewith a report on some of the principal disabilities under which aliens residing in the United States are now labouring. It consists almost exclusively of a reference to the legislation of the United States on the subjects of shipping, patents for inventions, and public lands, and a synopsis of the legislation of the several States in regard to the holding and disposition of real estate by aliens.

There are several other less important branches of the subject which the time limited for the preparation of this report does not permit me to explore, as the law must be looked for in the voluminous statutes of thirty-seven different States. The legislation thus omitted is that in regard to the elective franchise and the holders of office, admission to the bar, acting as executors and administrators, and perhaps some other matters.

I cannot flatter myself that what I here present is without error, but I have availed myself of the best means to make it correct, and have spared no effort on my part to make it so.

I have, &c.

(Signed) J. D. MCPHERSON.

E. Thornton, Esq.
&c. &c. &c.

Ships of the United States.

No vessel is entitled to be registered as a vessel of the United States, or enjoy privileges as such, unless wholly owned by citizens of the United States, and commanded by a citizen.—Act of Congress of 31st December 1792, chap. 7.

This excludes foreigners from the coasting trade and fisheries, as only vessels entitled to registry can be engaged therein.—Act of Congress of February 18, 1793, chap. 8. Also Act of March 1, 1817, chap. 31.

Patents for Inventions.

Aliens may take out patents for inventions. By the Act of Congress of July 4, 1836, the fee required of citizens and aliens who had resided in the United States one year, and declared their intention to become citizens, was thirty dollars; that required of British subjects, not so qualified by residence and declaration of intention, five hundred dollars, and of other aliens not so qualified as aforesaid, three hundred dollars.—Acts of 1836, chap. 357.

But by the Act of March 2, 1861, all laws discriminating as to fees between the inhabitants of the United States and those of foreign countries which shall not discriminate against the inhabitants of the United States are repealed. —Acts of 1861, chap. 88.

Aliens taking out patents in the United States are required to put the article on sale on reasonable terms. —Acts of 1836, ubi supra.

Aliens, unless they have resided one year in the United States and made declaration of intention to become citizens, cannot file caveats to protect inventions not matured, or take out patents for designs.—Acts of 1836, ubi supra; Acts of August 29, 1842, chap. 263.

Public Lands.

Public lands may be purchased by aliens, but will be granted as homesteads, gratuitously, only to citizens, or aliens who have made their declaration of intention to become such.—Acts of May 20, 1862, chap. 75; March 21, 1864, chap. 38; June 21, 1866, chap. 127.

* The substance of this pamphlet is given in Part I. of Mr. Abbott's Memorandum.

Disabilities with regard to Real Estate.

The right of aliens to hold real estate depends on the lex rei sitæ, and that is the law of the state wherein the land lies. In all the states of the Union, except in Louisiana, the common law has prevailed, and aliens are under all common law disabilities, except so far as they have been modified by statute in the respective states.

In two cases questions have arisen as to whether the Federal authority could control or override the laws of the states in this matter:

1. As to the effect of conveyances by the United States to aliens of public lands lying in the states. On this point there has been no adjudication, but it has arisen incidentally in the administration of the land laws, and has been considered as if the right of aliens to hold, after having purchased from the United States, was subject to the state law.—Opinion of Attorney-General Butler of April 18, 1836, 3 Opin. 90; Opinion of Attorney-General Cushing of July 28, 1855, 7 Opin. 351.

2. The second case in which the power of the Federal Government over the matter came in question was under certain treaties, now expired, giving to the citizens of the two contracting governments certain rights of disposition of real estate.—See the Treaty with Great Britain of 1794, and the Treaty with France of 1800.

The existence of any such power in the Federal Government was denied by Attorney-General West in an official opinion given July 30, 1819 (1 Opin. 275). And when the treaty with Bavaria, of January 21, 1845, was submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification, the Senate refused its assent, unless real property were excluded from the operation of the third Article, which provided that "the "citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties shall "have power to dispose of their real and personal property "within the states of the other," &c. &c.—See 9 Statutes, 827; Wheaton's Int. Law, p. 168, note.

In the seventh Article of the treaty with France, of February 23, 1853, any such power in the Federal Government seems to be disclaimed.—10 Statutes, 996; see further on this subject, Wheaton's Int. Law, p. 168, notes.

In 1857 Attorney-General Cushing asserted the power to exist in the Federal Government (8 Opin. 411), but in 1859 the same question being suggested in the Supreme Court of the United States, though not being directly involved in the decision of the same, the Court stated the question to be one of great magnitude, and abstained from considering it.—Fredericksen & al. v. The State of Louisiana, 23 Howard, 445.

With these preliminary remarks, I submit the following synopsis of the legislation of the states.

In making it I have taken the latest compilations and codes of the several States, but have not searched the subsequent statutes for recent modifications, the time allowed for the work not being sufficient for the purpose.

It must be borne in mind that the late seceded states, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee are either now engaged in remodelling their constitutions, or have very recently completed their work. These new constitutions I have not seen.

VERMONT.

In this state no statutory provisions on the subject of alienage have been made, and the common law rules of disability concerning the holding or transmission of real estate prevail.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Any alien resident in this state may take, purchase, hold, convey, or devise any real estate, and the same may descend in the same manner as if he were a native citizen.—Revised Statutes, 1842, title xv. ch. 129, § 4; Compilation of Statutes, 1853, c. 135, § 1.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Aliens may take, hold, convey, and transmit real estate. March 5, 1852; Laws, 1852, ch. 29. No title to real estate shall be invalid on account of the alienage of any former owner or holder thereof, provided that nothing herein contained shall defeat the title to any real estate heretofore conveyed or released by the commonwealth, or by the authority of the same.—March 31, 1852; Laws, 1852, ch. 86; vide Gen. Statutes, 1860, c. 91, § 38.

CONNECTICUT. — (Compilation of 1854, p. 630, Title XXIX., § 6. Revision of 1866, page 537.)

Aliens resident may hold and transmit real estate.

Any alien who is a resident of this state or of any of the United States may purchase, hold, inherit, or transmit real estate in this state, in as full and ample a manner as native-born citizens; and the wife of any alien capable of holding land in this state may take and hold land in this state by devise or inheritance, and shall be entitled to dower in the land of her deceased husband, and the children and other lineal descendants of any person capable of holding land in this state may take and hold such land as heirs-at-law of such ancestor.—Connecticut Law of 1848.

§ 7.

Transfers to and by aliens before 1846 confirmed.

All conveyances and transfers of real estate, or of any interest therein, by deed, devise, or otherwise, hereafter made to any foreigner not authorized by law to hold real estate, and all conveyances and transfers of the same by such foreigner, are confirmed to such foreigner, his heirs or assigns, and made effectual to all intents and purposes, as though such foreigner had been a native-born citizen.—Connecticut Law of 1846, vide Revision of 1866, page, 537, Title XXXVII.

Connecticut Law of 1857.

Aliens non-resident may acquire real estate for mining purposes, &c.

Any alien, not a resident of this state or of the United States, may by deed or otherwise acquire and hold any real estate in this state, for the purpose of quarrying, mining, dressing or smelting ores on the same, or converting the products of such quarries and mines into articles of trade and commerce; but if any real estate so held by any non-resident alien for the purposes aforesaid shall remain without being worked or used for said purposes for a period of 10 consecutive years, all the right and title of any such alien in and to such real estate shall be forfeited to the person or persons from whom the same was last acquired, or his or their heirs, if resident within the United States, and if not so resident, then to the state of Connecticut; but if hostilities shall break out between the United States and the country of which such alien is a resident, or the friendly relations of the two countries shall be suspended, then the time of the continuance of such hostilities, or the suspension of such friendly relations, shall not be computed in making up said period of 10 years.—Revision of 1866, Title 37, § 8, p. 537.

Aliens non-resident may transmit real estate to acquired.

Any real estate, held by any non-resident alien, pursuant to the provisions of the next preceding section, may be transmitted by such alien by deed or otherwise, and inherited from him in the same manner as though he was a native-born citizen; but no alien not a resident of the United States shall acquire any greater title to the said real estate by such transmission or inheritance than he would acquire by virtue of the preceding section.—Law passed in 1857, vide Revision of 1866, Title 37, section 9, page 537.

Rhode Island.—(Revised Statute of 1857, page 351, Title 23, chap. 151, sect. 21.)

Such courts (courts of probate) shall have power to grant petitions of aliens for leave to purchase, hold, and dispose of real estate within their respective towns, providing the alien petitioning shall, at the time of his petition, be resident within this state, and shall have made declaration according to law of his intention to become a naturalized citizen of the United States.

Maine.—(Act of 1854, chap. 64; Laws of Maine, 1854, page 79.)

All conveyances and transfers of real estate, or any interest therein, by deed, devise, or otherwise, heretofore made to or by any alien not authorized by law to hold real estate, are hereby confirmed and made effectual to such alien, his heirs or assigns, to all intents and purposes as though such alien had been a native-born citizen; any such alien, his heirs or assigns, so holding real estate as aforesaid, may sell, convey, and assign any such real estate, or any interest therein, to any citizen of the United States, in the same manner and to the same effect as native-born citizens might do.

An Act additional to this Act was passed on February 9th, 1856, as follows:—

Aliens may take, hold, convey, and devise real estate within this state; and all conveyances and transfers of any interest in such estate, heretofore made by or to any alien, are hereby confirmed and made effectual to all intents and purposes as if made by or to a citizen of this state. —Laws of Maine, 1856, chap. 198, page 231. Vide Revised Statutes of Maine, 1857, Title 7, chap. 73, sect. 2, for abstract of the same.

New York.

When aliens may hold.

Any alien who has come, or may hereafter come, into the United States may make a deposition or affirmation in writing before any officer authorized to take the proof of deeds to be recorded, that he is a resident of and intends always to reside in the United States, and to become a citizen thereof as soon as he can be naturalized, and that he has taken such incipient measures as the laws of the United States require to enable him to obtain naturalization, which shall be certified by such officer, and be filed and recorded by the Secretary of State in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, and such certificate or a certified copy thereof shall be evidence of the facts therein contained. And any alien who shall make and file such deposition shall thereupon be authorized and enabled to take and hold lands and real estate of any kind whatsoever, to him, his heirs and assigns for ever, and may during six years thereafter sell, assign, mortgage, devise, and dispose of the same, in any manner, as he might or could do if he were a native citizen of this state or of the United States, except that no such alien shall have power to lease or demise any real estate which he may take or hold by virtue of this provision until he becomes naturalized.—Act 1834, chap. 272, sect. 15 and 16.

May dispose of lands acquired, but not lease until he is naturalized. 20 Wendell, 230, 216-59

Act of 1845, Lands acquired before qualifying.

Any alien resident to whom real property has or shall be conveyed or devised, before he has made the deposition required by the revised Statutes may, on making such depositions, hold as if he were at the time of the conveyance or devise a citizen.

Laws of 1845, 94, chap. 115, § 1.

The wife of an alien and any woman who has or shall marry a citizen are entitled to dower.

Ibid. § 2.

Heirs, devisees, and grantees of deceased aliens may take, provided that if of full age they make a deposition.

Ibid. §§ 4, 5.

Alien residents may take by grant and devise of alien residents on same conditions.

Ibid. § 6.

Disabilities of alien women are removed by the eighth section, and former grants, devises, demises, leases, or mortgages by aliens are confirmed by ninth section, but such aliens are incapable of voting at any election, or of being elected or appointed to any office, or of serving on any jury.

Ibid. § 12.

This Act extended, 2 Laws, 1857, 229, chap. 576.

Pennsylvania.

From and after the passage of this Act, it shall and may be lawful for all and every foreigner and foreigners, alien or aliens, not being the subject or subjects of some sovereign state or power which is or shall be, at the time or times of such purchase or purchases, at war with the United States of America, to purchase lands, tenements, and hereditaments within this commonwealth not exceeding 5,000 acres, and to have and hold the same to them, their heirs and assigns, for ever, as fully to all intents and purposes as any natural-born citizen or citizens may or can do.

All purchases of real estate made by emigrants resident within this commonwealth, previous to declaring their intentions to become citizens of the United States, and who since purchasing the same have been naturalized in conformity with the laws of the United States on that subject, shall be as valid to all intents and purposes, and shall be construed to vest the title to the said real estate in the purchasers as fully and absolutely as if they had been citizens at the time they purchased the same.

In all cases where aliens have purchased real estate within this commonwealth, and have sold the same, the said sales shall be valid to all intents and purposes, and shall be construed to vest the title to the said real estate as fully and effectually as if the said aliens had been citizens at the time of purchasing the same; and in all cases where any alien residing in this commonwealth who shall have purchased or held real estate therein, and shall have died without having been naturalized, the title thereof is hereby confirmed to his heirs who in case he had been a citizen would have inherited the same, and there shall be no escheat by reason of such alienage: Provided that nothing herein contained shall in any wise affect or impair the vested rights of other individual or individuals.—Dunlop's Laws of Pennsylvania, page 325.

New Jersey.

Any alien not the subject of any power at war with the United States may purchase lands, tenements, and hereditaments within this state, and shall hold the same to him or her, and his or her heirs and assigns, for ever, as fully to all intents and purposes as any natural-born citizen of the United States may or can; but shall not on that account be entitled to vote or to hold any office of trust or profit in this state.—1846, April 10.

All purchases made by such aliens before the passage of said Act confirmed and made as valid as if made after the passage of the Act.

Any such alien to whom any lands in this state may have descended from any ancestor, either alien or not, since January 22, 1817, or would have descended or may or would hereafter, in case such persons claiming by descent were natural-born citizens of the United States, or to whom any lands may have been or may hereafter be devised, shall and may have and hold the same to him, her, or them, and his, her, or their heirs and assigns, for ever, as fully to all intents and purposes as any natural-born citizen of the United States might, may, or can do.—Vide Nixon's Digest of the Laws of New Jersey, 1855, page 6.

Delaware.

An alien residing in this state and having made declarations according to law of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall be capable of taking by deed or will lands, tenements, and hereditaments in fee simple, or for other estate, and of holding and of aliening the same, and upon the decease of an alien having title or right by purchase or descent, according to this Act, to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, the same shall descend and pass in the same manner as if said alien were a citizen of the United States; and it shall be no objection to the kindred, husband, or widow of such alien, or of any citizen deceased, taking lands, tenements, or hereditaments by virtue of the intestate law of this state, that they are aliens, if they at the time of the death of the intestate reside within the limits of the United States; and any such kindred being aliens and not residing within the limits of the United States at the time of the intestate's death shall be passed by, and the effect shall be the same as if they were dead.—Vide Rev. Book, 1852, Tit. 12, sect. 1.

When title to real estate is claimed by descent by a person capable at the time of the descent of inheriting, it shall be no bar or interruption of such descent that the father, mother, or other ancestor through whom the descent is derived was an alien.—Id. sect. 4.

Maryland.

In this state, by the Code of Laws, Art. 481, it is provided that aliens who are actual residents may take and hold land, tenements, and hereditaments, acquired by purchase, or to which they would (if citizens) be entitled by descent, and may sell and dispose of the same; provided, however, that if any male alien shall acquire any title or interest in any real estate, he shall within one year of the acquisition of the same declare his intention of becoming a citizen, and naturalize himself agreeably to the laws of the United States within twelve months after his being capable of becoming a citizen.

Provision is made enabling heirs of such alien to inherit in case of his dying before making such declaration or becoming a citizen after he had acquired property; but such heirs, if male, must comply with the provisions before mentioned. In case of the alien himself, and if infants or non compos mentis, the time for making such declaration, &c., is to be computed from the time such alien shall arrive at age, or become of sane mind. But such shall not be capacitated to hold property as trustee for any alien or foreign corporation. Any free white female born within the United States who has married a citizen of the United States, and actually resides therein, shall have and enjoy all the rights and immunities of a native-born citizen.

District of Columbia.

By law of Maryland passed Dec. 19th, 1791 (Laws of Maryland, Vol. II.), which was adopted as the law of the District of Columbia by an Act of Congress passed 27th Feb. 1801, at which time the Government took possession of the District of Columbia, it is provided that any foreigner may by deed or will to be hereafter made take and hold lands within that part of the territory of Columbia which lies within this state, and the same land may be conveyed by him and transmitted to and be inherited by his heirs or relations as if he or they were citizens of this state; provided that no foreigner shall in virtue hereof be entitled to any further or other privilege of a citizen. This law is still in force in the District of Columbia.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that a person born in a foreign country, who has already become a citizen by naturalization, is not within the provisions of this Act. His after-purchased lands vest in him as a citizen and are transmitted as such, and not in virtue of a capacity acquired under this Act, and therefore cannot be transmitted as lands which he had acquired while an alien might be to relations who are foreigners.

The statute of 11 & 12 William III. ch. 6, was in force in Maryland at the time of the cession, and is still in force in the District of Columbia. It removes the common-law disability of claiming title through an alien ancestor, but it does not apply to a living alien ancestor, so as to create a title by heirship, where none would exist by the common law, if such living alien ancestor were a natural-born subject or citizen.

Ohio.

It is lawful for any and all aliens that now may have, or hereafter shall be entitled to have, within this state, any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, either by purchase, gift, devise, or descent, to hold, possess, and enjoy the same as fully and completely as any citizen of the United States or of this state can do, subject to the same laws and regulations, and not otherwise.

Iowa.

Foreigners who are or who may hereafter become residents of this state shall enjoy the same rights in respect to the possession, enjoyment, and descent of property as native-born citizens.

Indiana.

Any alien who has come or may hereafter come into this state, and who shall have filed in any court of competent jurisdiction the declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, or shall make oath in writing before any officer authorized to take proof of deeds to be recorded that he is a resident of this state, and intends always to be a resident of the United States, and become a citizen thereof so soon as he can be naturalized, shall be authorized and enabled to hold lands to him, his heirs and assigns, which oath must be recorded in the Recorder's office of the county or district in which such lands are situate.

But such alien has no power to convey or devise real estate before he shall be naturalized. If he died within six years without being naturalized, his heirs or devisees, being citizens of the United States, or being aliens and complying with the foregoing provisions, shall take or inherit.

An alien purchasing or acquiring lands when incapable of holding the same, shall hold the same if naturalized before office found, and if he die after having declared his intention to become a citizen, and before naturalization, his widow and heirs, if they have made or shall make declaration of their intention to become citizens, shall take the estate. If an alien die as last aforesaid, leaving no heirs in the country capable of inheriting, his widow and family, on coming to the United States, and making declaration as aforesaid, may take the estate. (Sic.)

Illinois.

All aliens residing in this state may take by deed, will, or otherwise, lands and tenements and any interest therein, and alienate, sell, assign, and transmit the same to their heirs or to any other persons, whether such heirs or other persons be citizens of the United States or not, in the same manner as natural-born citizens of the United States or of this state might do, and upon the decease of any alien having title to or interest in any lands and tenements, shall pass and descend in the same manner as if such alien were a citizen of the United States; and it shall be no objection to any persons having an interest in such estate that they are not citizens of the United States, but all such persons shall have the same rights and remedies, and in all things be placed on the same footing, as natural-born citizens and actual residents of the United States.

The personal estate of an alien dying intestate, who at the time of his death shall reside in this state, shall be distributed in the same manner as the estates of natural-born citizens, and all persons interested in such estate shall be entitled to their proper distributive shares thereof, under the laws of this state, whether they are aliens or not.

Minnesota.

In this state any aliens may acquire and hold lands or any right thereto or interest therein by purchase, devise, or descent; and he may convey, mortgage, and devise the same; and if he shall die intestate the same shall descend to his heirs; and in all cases such lands shall be held, engaged, devised, or mortgaged, or shall descend in like manner and with like effect, as if such alien were a native citizen of this territory or of the United States.

This is done by a statute of the state, which confirms at the same time all titles to lands before conveyed by aliens.

Nebraska.

By a law passed when Nebraska was a territory, the same provisions are made in regard to aliens as are above made in Minnesota, and this is now in force in the state, placing aliens on an equal footing with native-born citizens as far as the holding and transmission of real estate is concerned.

Nevada.

This state, by section 16 of the first article of its Constitution, treats aliens with the greatest liberality. The section is as follows:—"Foreigners who are or who may hereafter "become bonâ fide residents of this state shall enjoy the "same rights in respect to the possession, enjoyment, and "inheritance of property as native-born citizens."

Wisconsin.

No distinction shall ever be made by law between the resident aliens and citizens in reference to the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property (Constitution of February 1849). Any alien may acquire and hold lands, or any right thereto, or any interest therein, by purchase, devise, or descent, and he may convey, mortgage, and devise the same, and if he shall die intestate the same shall descend to his heirs, and in all cases such lands shall be held, conveyed, mortgaged, or devised, or shall descend in like manner and in like effect, as if such alien were a native-born citizen of this state or of the United States. A woman being an alien shall not on that account be barred of her dower, and any woman residing out of the state shall be entitled to dower of the lands of her deceased husband, lying in this state, of which her husband died seised, and the same may be assigned to her or recovered by her in like manner as if she and her deceased husband had been residents within the state at the time of his death.

Kansas.

No distinction shall ever be made between citizens and aliens in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property.—Constitution of 1859; Bill of Rights, sect. 17.

All aliens may take by deed, will, or otherwise lands, tenements, and any interest therein, and alienate, sell, assign, and transmit the same to their heirs or any other persons, whether citizens of the United States or not; and upon the demise of any alien his lands shall descend as if he were a citizen.—Act of February 24, 1864.

Kentucky.

Any person emigrating to this state with intent to reside therein may purchase and hold lands and real estate, and pass the same by descent, devise, or otherwise, as a natural-born citizen of Kentucky.—Act of February 28, 1835.

Oregon.

White foreigners who are or may hereafter become residents of this state shall enjoy the same rights in respect to the possession, enjoyment, and descent of property as native-born citizens.—Const. of Oregon, Art. 1, sect. 31.

A woman being an alien shall not on that account be barred of her dower, and any woman residing out of the state shall be entitled to dower of the lands of her deceased husband, lying in this state, of which her husband died seised, and the same may be assigned to her or recovered by her in like manner as if she and her deceased husband had been residents within the state at the time of his death. —Stat. of Oregon, 1845-1864, chap. 14, sect. 21.

California.

Aliens shall hereafter inherit and hold by inheritance real and personal estate in as full a manner as though they were native-born citizens of this or the United States; provided that no non-resident foreigner or foreigners shall hold or enjoy any real estates situated within the limits of the state of California five years after the time such non-resident foreigner or foreigners shall inherit the same; but in case such non-resident foreigner or foreigners do not appear or claim such estate within the period in this section before mentioned, then such estate shall be sold upon information of the Attorney-General according to law, and the proceeds in the treasury of said state for the benefit of such non-resident foreigner or foreigners, or their legal representatives, to be paid to them by the treasurer of said state at any time within five years thereafter, when such non-resident foreigner or foreigners, or their representatives shall produce evidence to the satisfaction of the treasurer and bondholder of states that such foreigner or foreigners are the legal heirs to and are entitled to inherit such estate.—Stat. of California, 1856, ch. 116 sect. 1.

Michigan.

By the Constitution of Michigan aliens who are or who may hereafter become bonâ fide residents of this state, shall enjoy the same rights in respect to the possession, enjoyment, and inheritance of property as native-born citizens. —Const. 1850, Art. 18, sect. 13.

Missouri.

Aliens residing in the United States who have made a declaration of their intention to become citizens of the United States by taking the oath required by law, and all aliens residents of this state, are capable of acquiring real estate in this state by descent or purchase, and of holding and alienating the same, and shall incur the like duties and liabilities in relation thereto as if they were citizens of the United States.

Aliens acquiring real estate by descent or devise, and incapable of holding the same by reason of their alienage, may sell and convey any real estate so acquired within three years after settlement of the estate of the deceased.—Act of November 17, 1855.; Revised Statutes of 1856, chap. v.

Virginia.

Aliens residing in the state who shall make oath before some court of record in said state, declaring his intention to continue to reside therein, may inherit, purchase, and hold real estate as if he were a citizen of the state, and may alienate and devise the same, and it shall descend if he die intestate, and the alien devisee or heir may take and hold the land, provided he be, or shall within five years become, a resident of the state, and make the declaration above presented of intention to continue to reside therein.

The wife of a citizen of the United States, and anyone whose father or mother was at the time of his birth a citizen, though born out of the United States, may take and hold real estate by devise, purchase, or inheritance.—Code of 1860, Tit. 33, ch. 115, sect. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Florida.

Aliens of any country or nation whatever may purchase, hold, enjoy, sell, convey, or devise any lands and tenements in this state, to the same extent and with the same right as citizens of the United States, and may derive title by descent through aliens.—Acts of Nov. 17, 1829, and Feb. 17, 1833; Digest, Tit. 2, sect. 3 and 1.

West Virginia.

This state, it is understood, has adopted the law of Virginia in regard to this subject. A new code is now in preparation, and not accessible.

Alabama.

There is no modification of the common law in this state in favour of aliens.

Louisiana.

The common law (until recently) has not prevailed in this state. In Phillips v. Rogers, et al., 5 Martin, 752, the Supreme Court of Louisiana awarded to the plaintiff, an alien residing in Ireland, the whole estate, real and personal, of his deceased brother, a resident of that state. It is understood that the common law has been or is about to be adopted in Louisiana.

North Carolina.

There is no modification of the common law in this state in favour of aliens.

Georgia.

The only modification of the common law in respect of aliens is in this—that if land be devised or descend to an alien, it shall be sold by the legal representatives of the deceased, and the proceeds be paid over to the heir or devisee.—Code of 1860, chap. vi. sect. 2628.

Texas.

Any alien being a free white person shall have and enjoy in the state of Texas such civil rights as are or shall be accorded to American citizens by the laws of the nation to which such alien shall belong, or by the treaties of such nation with the United States.

Aliens may take and hold any property, real or personal, in this state by devise or descent from any alien or citizen, in the same manner in which citizens of the United States may take and hold real or personal estate by devise or descent within the country of such alien.

Any alien being a free white person who shall become a resident of this state, shall, in conformity with the naturalization laws of the United States, have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall have the right to acquire and hold real estate in this state in the same manner as if he was a citizen of the United States.—Laws of Texas, 1853–54, chap. 71, sect. 1, 2, 3.

South Carolina.

By an Act of this state any citizen or alien who has entered into any bonâ fide contract, or who has received any grant or deed of conveyance for or relating to any real property in this state, or whose titles are derived from or through aliens, either mediately or immediately, may and shall hold and enjoy the same in fee simple, or for any less estate, according to the nature of his contract, grant, or deed, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding; provided, however, that every alien shall, before he be entitled to the benefits of the Act, declare his or her intention of becoming a citizen of the United States.—Vol. V. Statutes, page 547, s. 1.

By the second section of same Act aliens can devise and convey the property acquired by virtue of the Act to children and grandchildren who were born previously to the acquisition of the property; and in case of non-alienation, or of dying intestate the property, is distributable among their relations under the Distribution Act of the state; provided, however, that the child, grandchild, or distributee to whom the property is conveyed, devised, or distributed, as the case may be, shall within 12 months become a resident of the state, and a citizen thereof as soon as the laws permit.

Arkansas.

Aliens residing in the state who have made declaration according to law, of their intention to become citizens of the United States, are capable of taking by deed or will, and holding, aliening, or devising real estate. And upon the decease of any alien having title by purchase or descent, according to this Act, of any real estate, it shall descend and pass as if such alien were a citizen of the United States, and the husband, widow, or kindred of the deceased alien, or of any citizen may inherit, notwithstanding they are aliens, if at the time of the death they are resident within the United States.—Act of December 6, 1837; Digest of Statutes, 1848, chap. 9.

Tennessee.

An alien may take and hold real estate in this state by purchase, inheritance, or in any other way which may be agreed upon by treaty between the United States and the country of which he is a citizen or subject.

Any alien resident in this state who has legally declared his intention, under the Naturalization Laws, to become a citizen of the United States, may take and hold, dispose of, or transmit by descent any real estate as a native citizen.

An alien who is resident in the United States at the time of the death of an intestate, and has declared, or shall within 12 months thereafter declare, his intention to become a citizen, shall be capable of inheriting the estate of such intestate.

Mississippi.

Aliens residing in this state may acquire and hold real estate therein by purchase, gift, devise, or inheritance, and may, after they have been naturalized according to the laws of the United States, convey the same as other citizens of the United States.

Hereafter whenever any alien residing in this state who may lawfully hold land therein shall die seised or possessed of lands or tenements, the same shall, if such alien shall have been naturalized under the law of the United States, descend to his or their heirs according to the laws of descent in this state; but if such alien or aliens, owning or holding lands within this state, shall die without having been naturalized, then such lands shall be sold as an escheat, in the mode prescribed therefor, and the money arising from such sale shall be paid into the treasury of this state, subject to the claim of the heirs or next of kin of such decedent who shall be entitled thereto, after deducting the expense of converting such lands into money and putting the same into the treasury of said state; provided such heirs or next of kin shall apply for the same within six years from the time such money shall be placed in the treasury of this state.—Rev. Code, 1857, chap. 36, sect. 9.

WURTEMBERG.

My Lord, Stuttgart, June 24, 1868.

I have had the honour to receive your Lordship's despatch of the 16th inst., requiring information as to the disabilities to which aliens are subject in Wurtemberg.

I am able to reply without loss of time that the Wurtemberg Legislation on this subject is extremely liberal and is based entirely on reciprocity. An alien establishing himself in this country can claim by law every advantage and liberty possessed by a Wurtemberg subject desirous of settling himself in a commune to which by birth he does not belong if a similar liberty be granted to Wurtemberg subjects in the country of the alien in question. In a contrary case the law reserves to the authorities the right of refusing to the aliens privileges which would not be enjoyed by Wurtembergers in the foreign country in question, but the exercise of this right by the authorities is very seldom practised, and would be so only under special circumstances.

In the case of an alien purposing to practise any trade or industry in Wurtemberg all that is required is that he shall establish his nationality and furnish proof, if called upon to do so, (and this last does not often occur), of the right of Wurtembergers to do the like in the alien's own country. A case of this nature has, however, lately come before me, where difficulties were thrown in the way of a British subject employing workpeople in a particular fancy manufacture practised successfully in a Wurtemberg town. The individuals who had hitherto had this trade in their hands were jealous of the Englishman's interference and success and the probable consequent rise of prices of labour in the manufacture in question, and notwithstanding the manifest advantage to the town which the competition occasioned, the Englishman was so far incommoded as to be threatened with prohibition of his further proceedings by the authorities there, unless he produced his passport and a certificate from Her Majesty's Legation that a Wurtemberg subject would be permitted to engage in a similar trade in London. The man came to Stuttgart and after being supplied with the papers in question no further obstacle is interposed to his undertaking.

There is a certain latitude in the authority of the police with regard to aliens establishing themselves in Wurtemberg by which if the latter should conduct themselves in a disorderly manner or render themselves obnoxious to the public peace or propriety or even to the Government Authorities they may be summarily sent out of the country, but the same right is exercised by the authorities of any commune in the country against Wurtembergers not belonging to it, and who can be under the above circumstances turned out of the place.

It may therefore be answered to your Lordship's question that no disabilities exist in Wurtemberg against aliens who may purchase real property and inherit the same as freely as natives.

I have instructed Mr. Baillie to report to me upon the state of the law in the Grand Duchy of Baden on the above subject.

I have, &c.
E. C. R. Gordon.

The Right Honourable Lord Stanley,
&c. &c. &c.

APPENDIX No. III.

RIGHT OF ALIENS TO HOLD LANDS.—COLONIAL AND INDIAN LAWS.

MEMORANDUM BY MR. ABBOTT.

Aliens are debarred by the common law of England from holding, inheriting, or transmitting landed property, for, being under a foreign allegiance, they are supposed to be incapable of rendering service and homage to the Sovereign of England, from whom it is a settled principle of tenure that the title to all lands in the kingdom is primarily derived.

That the forfeiture to the Crown of lands held by aliens has been enforced from a very early period appears from 17 Edward the 2nd Stat. 2 cap. 12: "That the king should "have escheats of the lands of Normans, of whose fee "soever they were, saving the service appertaining to the "chief lords of the same fee; and this also was to be "understood, that if any inheritance descended to any "that was born in the parts beyond the sea, whose "ancestors were, from the time of King John, under the "allegiance of the kings of France, and not of the kings "of England, as then late it had happened of the barony "of Monmouth, after the death of John de Monmouth "(whose heirs were of Britain and other places), king "Henry, by the foresaid occasion, recovered many escheats "of Normans' lands out of the fees of other men, and "gave them to be holden of the chief lords of the fee, by "the services due and accustomed therefore."

"An alien is entitled to purchase in fee simple lands, "tenements, or hereditaments, although he cannot hold "them, for, upon office found the king shall have them; "and even on a covenant to stand seised, a use will arise "for an alien; but of course the same result will follow "as in the case of a purchase, and the same would take "effect where an alien purchased lands in joint tenancy; "and the king would, on office found, be entitled to a "moiety."

"With respect to copyholds, it appears to be doubtful "what rights an alien may acquire therein, for the lord is "not to be prejudiced by losing his services and fines; but "it is laid down in Watkins on Copyholds that an alien "cannot be a copyholder; and it should seem that if an "alien purchases any copyhold property it would escheat "to the lord. However, the title of an alien in all respects "will be good against all persons except the Crown in "the case of freeholds, and as against the lord in case "of copyholds."—(Hansard's "Law Relating to Aliens," 1844, pp. 131–133.)

Previously to the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66 aliens could not take houses on lease for a term of years without danger of forfeiture.

The statute 32 Henry the 8th, cap. 16, enacted that no alien strangers, not being denizens, should take any leases of houses, under a penalty of 5*l.*; and all leases granted to strangers, artificers, or handicraftsmen, born out of the King's obeisance (not being denizens) of any dwelling-house or shop within this realm, or any of the King's dominions, are declared to be void, and of no effect; and the person so taking such lease forfeits 100*l.* and the person letting, 100*l.* more; one moiety to the king, and the other to him that will sue for the same.

Lord Coke explains the law as follows: "As to a lease "for years of a house for the habitation of a merchant "stranger, being an alien, whose king is in league with ours, "and a lease for yeares of lands, meadows, &c., upon office "found, the king shall have it; but of a house for habita-"tion he may take a lease for years, as incident to com-"merce, for without habitation he cannot merchandize or "trade. But if he depart or relinquish the realm the king "shall have the lease. So it is if he die possessed thereof, "neither his executors or administrators shall have it, but "the king; for he had it only for habitation as necessary "for his trade or traffique, and not for the benefit of his "executor or administrator. But if the alien be merchant, "then the king shall have the lease for yeares, albeit it were "for his habitation; and so it is if he be an alien enemie "And all this was so resolved by the judges assembled "together for that purpose in the case of Sir James Croft. "Pasch. 29, of the reigne of Queene Elizabeth."

Upon the report of the Aliens Committee of 1843, the law relating to aliens holding personal and leasehold property was amended by the fourth and fifth clauses of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 66.* (Naturalization Act, appended to my memorandum, Addenda I.)

IV. And be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this Act every alien, being the subject of a friendly State, shall and may take and hold, by purchase, gift, bequest, representation, or otherwise, every species of personal property, except chattels real, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, and with the same rights, remedies, exemptions, privileges, and capacities as if he were a natural-born subject of the United Kingdom.

V. And be it enacted, that every alien now residing in, or who shall hereafter come to reside in, any part of the United Kingdom, and being the subject of a friendly State, may, by grant, lease, demise, assignment, bequest, representation, or otherwise, take and hold any lands, houses, or other tenements, for the purpose of residence or of occupation by him or her, or his or her servants, or for the purpose of any business, trade, or manufacture, for any term of years not exceeding twenty-one years, as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes, and with the same rights, remedies, exemptions, and privileges, except the right to vote at elections for members of Parliament, as if he were a natural-born subject of the United Kingdom.

Doubts having arisen whether the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, of 1844, extended to the colonies, an Act was passed in 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 83) declaring that it did not extend to the colonies, and that all laws, statutes, or ordinances duly passed or to be passed within Her Majesty's colonies or possessions abroad conferring the privileges of naturalization within the limits of such colonies were valid, subject to the usual confirmation by the Crown.

The Acts of the Imperial Parliament constituting various colonies with independent legislatures have expressly provided that the local legislatures should have power to deal with questions of land tenure, and certain colonies have accordingly made provisions by which aliens are enabled, within their limits, to hold land either absolutely or on lease.

Canada.

By the Act of the Dominion of Canada (cap. 66 of 1868) no power is given to aliens who have not been naturalized to hold, inherit, or devise lands.

But by a Consolidation Act of Canada (now the provinces of Ontario and Quebec) cap. 8. s. 9, and a later Act, cap. 16 of 1865, aliens have the same power as to holding, devising, &c. lands as natural-born or naturalized subjects of Her Majesty. And the 9th section of the former Act is expressly kept alive by the Act of the Dominion.

In Nova Scotia, aliens were empowered to hold, devise, &c. lands by c. 34 of Revised Statutes, sect. 1, and this section is expressly kept alive by the Act of the Dominion.

In New Brunswick there does not appear to have been any like power conferred on aliens.

Newfoundland.

No power is conferred upon aliens who have not been naturalized, of holding, &c. lands. There is a general Naturalization Act, 20 Vict. c. 8.

Prince Edward Island.

By Act of 22 Vict. c. 4. (1859) aliens are empowered to hold, &c. land up to the limit of 200 acres.

British Columbia.

The colonies of British Columbia and Vancouver Island were united into one colony, "British Columbia," by Imperial Act, 29 & 30 Vict. c. 67.; and by a subsequent Local Act, No. 37 of 1867, s. 10., which applies to the whole colony, aliens are empowered to hold lands as if they had been natural-born British subjects.

Cape of Good Hope.

By an Act, No. 8 of 1856, all former laws, customs, or usages inconsistent with the Act are repealed, and from its

* With regard to the question of aliens holding real property, the Committee reported, "Several of the witnesses examined by the Committee expressed a decided opinion that it would be expedient to "permit aliens to acquire real property in this country with the same "facility as in France and other European states. It is contended that "foreigners are allowed to hold property in the funds to any extent; "that by paying the cost of letters of denization they may acquire a "legal right to hold any extent of land; that the law which forbids an "alien to hold land is openly and easily evaded; and that this law, "with all others to which the State cannot command obedience, would "be much better abandoned and repealed. On the other hand, it has "been remarked that were a better system of conferring native rights "on foreigners adopted, and were the process rendered less expensive "and more expeditious than at present, little practical evil would accrue "from rendering a foreigner's capacity to hold land dependent on natu-"ralization; and that as in Great Britain certain civil and moral "duties are considered to be attached to the possession of landed pro-"perty, which could hardly be performed by non-resident aliens, it "would be well for the State, on this ground, to refuse the capacity of "holding real property to foreigners not domiciled in this country."

promulgation (4th June 1856) aliens may purchase, acquire, and own, fixed property in the colony, in like manner as natural-born subjects. But beyond this nothing in the Act is to be taken as naturalizing any aliens, or bestowing upon them any of the privileges conferred by deeds of burghership.

Natal.

By Ordinance No. 6 of 1856, aliens are empowered to purchase or hold transfers of lands upon certain conditions, viz.:—The right does not extend to a period beyond that of four years from the date of registration of the transfer, and aliens may not alienate, without license of the Governor; and, further, a fine is imposed unless letters of naturalization be taken out within four years from registration of the title.

By Ordinance No. 7 of 1858, aliens are empowered to hold and give transfers of fixed property in the manner of natural-born subjects.

Under the law No. 1 of 1860 any alien who shall be the owner of landed property within the colony and registered in his name of not less a value than 300*l.* is enabled to obtain naturalization without a previous residence of five years, as required from other aliens.

New South Wales.

By the Colonial Act 11 Vict. c. 39, 1847, aliens subjects of a friendly state, may without being naturalized hold every species of personal property, except chattels real. But for the purposes of residence or trade they may hold land and houses for 21 years, with all the privileges of natural-born subjects, except that of voting at elections of members of the Legislative Council.

The law is therefore practically the same as in England.

Queensland.

The position of aliens is regulated by the Aliens Act of 1867 (31 Vict. No. 28), the provisions of which as regards aliens holding lands and houses are similar to those of the aforesaid New South Wales Act 11 Vict. c. 39, of which colony Queensland formed part until its separation in 1859.

Victoria.

The "Aliens Statute, 1865" (28 Vict. No. 256), provides that alien friends resident in the colony may inherit, acquire, hold and dispose of every description of property, whether real or personal, in the same manner as natural-born subjects of the Crown, and all dispositions of property made before the passing of the Act to or by such aliens are declared to be valid.

South Australia.

By the Aliens Act, No. 5 of 1864, every person born of a mother who is a natural-born or naturalized subject is capable of holding real or personal estate.

Alien friends may hold every description of property whether personal or real.

Western Australia, Tasmania.

No power is conferred upon aliens who have not been naturalized of holding lands.

New Zealand.

The provisions of the Alien Act, 1866 (30 Vict. No. 17.), are the same as in New South Wales.

Ceylon.

No power is conferred upon aliens who have not been naturalized of holding lands. Special Acts of naturalization are passed in each case.

Bermuda.

The provisions of the Act, No. 11, of 1857, are practically the same as those in New South Wales.

Bahamas.

By an Act, 25 Vict. c. 15, aliens are empowered to hold lands, houses, &c., for any term not exceeding 21 years, with full rights as natural-born subjects, except right of voting, &c.; and the Governor is empowered to grant licenses to any company formed of aliens to hold lands for the purposes for which such company may be formed.

Jamaica.

The Colonial Act, 14 Vict. c. 40, May 1851, confers the same privileges on aliens with regard to leaseholds as the English Act.

By 22 Vict. c. 1 (November 1858) every "immigrant" (i.e., person introduced at the public expense from certain specified places) who may obtain or become entitled to a certificate of industrial residence, becomes entitled to all the privileges of a natural-born subject within the colony.

Turks and Caicos Islands.

By Ordinance No. 8, of 1857, (passed 17th October 1857 and confirmed 13th February 1858,) aliens may hold lands, salt ponds, &c. (except salt ponds at Turks Island) on lease not exceeding 21 years, which lease may be renewed at the end of the term.

British Guiana.

Letters of naturalization are required to enable aliens to hold property in shipping but not to enable them to hold or bequeath property, or to qualify them for civil rights and duties within the colony.

Barbados.

By a local Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 4), aliens may hold leases for purposes of residence or occupation for any term not exceeding 21 years.

Trinidad, St. Vincent, Grenada, St. Lucia, Antigua, Dominica, Tobago.

No power is conferred on aliens who have not been naturalized of holding lands. In some of these islands, special Acts of Naturalization are passed for each person; in others, as St. Vincent and Grenada, there are general Acts of Naturalization.

Nevis.

By Aliens Act of 1856 (No. 77), alien friends may take and hold lands by purchase or otherwise, as if they were natural-born subjects of Her Majesty.

St. Kitts and Anguilla.

By a local Act, No. 127, February 3, 1857, all domiciled or resident liberated Africans are to be deemed natural-born subjects and capable of holding real or personal estate. As are also the children, wherever born, of a mother a natural-born subject.

Aliens, subjects of a friendly state, may acquire and hold either real or personal estate as effectually as natural-born subjects, but they are not thereby made capable of becoming members of the Council or of the Assembly, nor of voting at the election of members of the Assembly.

Gibraltar.

By Order in Council of 1859 aliens, who have been resident and domiciled for 15 years, or who, if resident and domiciled for less than 15 years, have obtained the Governor's special licenses, may hold lands, as if they were British subjects.

Sierra Leone.

By the Imperial Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 86 (20th August 1853) liberated Africans, domiciled or resident in Sierra Leone, are to be deemed within the colony to be natural-born subjects and capable of holding and transmitting any estate real or personal within the colony. Power is, however, given to the local legislature to alter or repeal any of the provision of the Act so far as they relate to the right to real property.

Honduras.

The Naturalization Act 18 Vict. c. 18 (July 19, 1855) is the same as the South Wales Act.

By the 23d Sect. of the Immigration Act, 24 Vict. c. 5 (1861), every immigrant born out of the British dominions who shall have obtained or become entitled to a certificate of industrial residence is entitled to all the privileges of a naturalized alien, except the capability to become a member of the Assembly, which privilege, however, may be allowed by the superintendent.

Hong Kong.

By the Colonial Ordinance, No. 2 of 1853, aliens may acquire and dispose of real estate within the colony as effectually as natural-born subjects.

[The foregoing information, so far as it relates to the colonies, is in part compiled from the Colonization Circular, No. 27, 1868, issued by the Emigration Commissioners, and has been revised by Mr. Holland, Legal Adviser to the Colonial Office.]

India.

Lord Brougham in the case of the Mayor of Lyons v. The East India Company, cited in "Hansard's Law relating to Aliens," said, with regard to the right of aliens to hold leasehold and freehold property in India, "No instance has "been produced, indeed, it is agreed on all hands that no "instance has ever existed of a forfeiture to the Crown for "this cause. There is no such thing known in those parts "as an inquisition of office, or any analogous proceeding, "or any proceeding whatever for entitling the Crown, or "those exercising its delegated authority, to the real estate "or chattels real of aliens within the district. When those "foreigners die their real estates have descended to their "heirs, or been taken by their devisees, or been administered "as assets by their executors, without any claim ever having "been made by the sovereign power, which would here in "England have been entitled without any office. Eject-"ments have been brought, and the parties in possession "have never been advised to set up the defence that the "lessor of the plaintiff claimed by descent from an alien; "and dower has been assigned to widows alien also."—Moore's Privy Council Cases, vol. i. p. 175.

It appears from the printed "Proceedings of the Government of India Revenue, March, 1868," that a report has been prepared by that Government on the state of the law as to the right of aliens to hold lands in India.

This report states that the point was fully raised in the year 1834, when, in the case of General Claude Martin's will, "it was distinctly held by the Supreme Court at "Calcutta that the English law as to aliens had never been "introduced into India. . . . This decision gave rise "to considerable excitement at the time, and the Govern-"ment of India addressed the Court of Directors very "strongly on the subject."

The decision of the Calcutta Court was confirmed on appeal by the Privy Council in the judgment of Lord Brougham above quoted.

Lord Brougham's ruling was accepted as the law on the subject by Sir C. Jackson, as Advocate-General in 1852.

It seems from the "Proceedings" that it may be open to doubt "whether the English alien law has, in effect, "been extended to India by any more recent legislation, "either English or Indian, and whether the transfer of the "executive administration in India from the Company to "the Crown, by the 21st and 22d Vict. c. 106, has in any "way affected the case."

There is nothing in the Indian law disabling aliens, as being aliens merely, from holding lands. But there have been special regulations showing the jealousy with which the acquisition of land by alien Europeans has been regarded.—Bengal Regulations of 1793, 1795, 1803, 1813. Bombay, 1827.

Indeed, up to 1834 no European, whether British or alien, could acquire land or rights in land except in certain specified cases, or by the permission of the Governor-General in either Bengal or Bombay. The law in Madras was not so accurately defined, but was substantially the same.

An Act of 1837, the draft of which was drawn by Lord Macaulay in 1835, was passed partly to clear up doubts which had arisen under the Charter Act of 1833, regarding the nature of the estate which European British subjects could hold in land in India.

"In the original draft of that Act, in Lord Macaulay's handwriting, stands, "It shall be lawful for any subjects of His Majesty to acquire and hold," &c.

But in the course of circulation the words "subjects of His Majesty" were struck through, and the words "any person of whatever nation" substituted. Eventually the original words were restored, and the Act passed accordingly.

The jealousy with which the residence of Europeans, and especially alien Europeans, in the interior was looked upon by the East India Company is ascribed to the doubts which existed as to the jurisdiction of the company over such European residents.

As a matter of fact, nevertheless, the courts of the East India have long since assumed (as early as 1796) and exercised, without demur, such jurisdiction.

The report of the "Proceedings" concludes with a recommendation "that there is no longer any reason of good "policy why European foreigners should not be placed in "the same position as European British subjects with "respect to holding land in India. . . . In practice "European foreigners have resided without let or molesta-"tion, and have even held landed property all over India "for the past forty or fifty years at least. . . .

"On the other hand, there are valid objections to the "state of the law as it now exists. It disinclines cautious "foreigners against acquiring property, and . . . it is "quite possible that it may be made an instrument of "private annoyance and injury. . . . During the Indigo "disturbances in 1860–61, one of the most turbulent and "unpopular of the Indigo planters in Behar was a "Spaniard, Mr. Tolano, who was not at that time even "naturalized, and who had no special permission to hold "land. . . . Had the state of the law been known it "would certainly have been taken advantage of by his "native opponents, to his great injury and loss."

In accordance with this recommendation the following minute was issued on the 11th of April, 1868 ("Pro-"ceedings of the Government of India, Home Department, "Legislative. April, 1868"):—

"The Governor-General in Council has considered it expedient that all the Regulations and Acts which provide against the acquirement of land by Europeans in India should be repealed.

"2. They have no effect as regards Europeans, being British subjects, since Act IV. of 1847, and they can therefore operate only against European foreigners.

"3. His Excellency in Council considers that the retention of these lands, as they now stand, is not only unnecessary and invidious, but might afford an opportunity for malicious injury.

"4. His Excellency in Council accordingly caused all the existing Bengal Laws and Regulations of this nature to be included in the bill for repealing certain enactments which have ceased to be in force or have become unnecessary, which became law as Act VIII. of 1868, on Thursday the 2nd instant.

"5. It is understood that both the Governments of Madras and Bombay have similar repealing bills under consideration.

"Resolved, That the attention of the Governments of Madras and Bombay be drawn to the expediency of repealing any laws affecting the free acquirement and enjoyment of immoveable property, or rights in such property, by European aliens which may exist in the code of either Presidency, as, for example, the Bombay Regulation XXIII. of 1827, sections 3 and 4, and the Madras Regulation of 1803, section 41."

CHAS. S. A. ABBOTT.

Woodside, Lynmouth, Barnstaple,
September 24, 1868.

APPENDIX No. IV.

POSITION OF ALIENS AND NATURALIZED ALIENS IN ENGLAND.

1.—CASE OF MR. BRANDAUER.

SIR, 5, Berners Street, W., 12th June 1868.

A CLIENT of ours, Mr. Charles Henry Imanuel Brandauer, a native of Stuttgard, has for several years, first in partnership and then alone, been the proprietor of a steel pen manufactory at Birmingham giving employment to a large number of "hands."

He has also a place of business at Vienna, where he is in partnership with his father-in-law, Mr. Kuhn, trading under the firm of "Carl Kuhn & Co.," a house of respectability and standing.

The factory at Birmingham is of freehold tenure. Mr. Brandauer's former partner was a naturalized British subject but it was found on examining the documents of title on dissolution of partnership, that from a slight oversight in one of them a forfeiture to the Crown had taken place of at least a portion of the factory, Mr. Brandauer being an alien.

On a careful investigation it was found that the only safe way of curing this defect was that the Crown should hold an inquisition at which the property was declared forfeited, and under the powers which the Crown has in such cases the property was then re-granted to a trustee nominated by Mr. Brandauer upon trust for sale.

We should mention that previously Mr. Brandauer had made strennous efforts to become naturalized, but from the circumstance of his not continuously residing in England this was refused.

He resides in England frequently but not constantly.

As the whole of the subject of naturalization has we presume been referred to the present Commission, it is desirable that the case of Mr. Brandauer, which is no doubt one of a class should be brought before the Commissioners with a view to the modification of the law.

It does seem very desirable that foreigners who are wishful to invest capital in England in a manner to give employment to large numbers of the English population should not be deterred from doing so by such technicalities.

We are, &c.
BAILEY, SHAW, SMITH, & BAILEY,

To the Secretary to the Royal
Commissioners on the Laws of Naturalization.

5, Berners Street, London, W.,
SIR, June 26, 1868.

WITH reference to our letter to you of the 12th instant and your letter to us of the 15th instant, we beg to apprise you that our client, Mr. Brandauer is in London to-day. He purposes being at Birmingham to-morrow unless you or the Commissioners wish to see him, or he could attend some days hence, if you desire it.

Mr. Brandauer is under the impression (you will know whether accurately or not) that English subjects may hold freehold property in every part of Germany without naturalization. Indeed, he is under the impression that there are only two or three countries besides England where this is not the case, of which Turkey is one.

It must be desirable (viewing the question from the English side) that foreigners should have every facility for and encouragement in employing English artizans in England. Had Mr. Brandauer known originally that there was the slightest chance of his having difficulty with reference to the freehold property in Birmingham, he most likely would have been deterred from starting his manufactory in England, for it was indispensable that he should erect special and extensive buildings, as he could not find any suitable for his purpose in the neighbourhood of Birmingham.

Mr. Brandauer mentions that in his own business—that of the pen manufacture—some Frenchmen have, instead of establishing a factory at Birmingham, induced English artizans to go to Boulogne, and have now at that place the largest steel pen manufactory in Europe, where, of course, the few skilled English hands are instructing a number of Frenchmen, and France is thus deriving similar benefits to those which England in past times enjoyed by the extradition by France of many of her best manufacturers.

Might it not be desirable to extend the permission already accorded to aliens to hold on lease premises for the purpose of trade, to their being entitled to become the absolute owners of such property for the purposes of trade, but without such ownership carrying rights of voting &c.?

Mr. Brandauer thinks that this right in the countries to which we have alluded is not limited to the purposes of trade, but extends also to purposes of residence and even speculation.

We are &c.
BAILEY, SHAW, SMITH, & BAILEY.
Charles S. A. Abbott, Esq.

2.—LETTER FROM MR. LEONE LEVI.

10, Farrar's Building, Temple,
SIR, December 8, 1868.

A ROYAL Commission having been appointed to inquire into the law relating to the legal position of British subjects naturalized in foreign states, and of foreign-born subjects naturalized in this country, I beg to offer the following observations:—

The law of this country has for many years past been highly favourable to aliens. Commerce, manufactures, industry, science, and art derive benefit from their settlement here, and the Legislature has offered them a frank and hearty hospitality. Yet I venture to say that the law is capable of further improvement. It is not, indeed, from the statute law that an alien derives his charter of freedom. It is the common law that opens to him the courts of justice, that enables him to partake of the benefits of the law of the land, and places him in a position practically amounting to equality, as respects rights and privileges, with native-born subjects. As an evidence of the liberality with which the courts of law and equity are disposed to regard the position of aliens, I have only to refer to the recent decision of the Court of Chancery in the case of Routledge v. Low (37 L. J. Ch. N. S. p. 454), where an alien friend, a citizen of the United States, was considered as entitled to take advantage of the British Copyright Act, from the simple fact that at the time of the publication of her work the author was residing temporarily in a part of the British dominions, she having gone to Montreal only for a few days for the sole purpose of publishing her work in British soil. I shall first allude to one point in the present law regarding aliens not naturalized which should be remedied.

At present an alien, not naturalized, cannot hold land for more than 21 years, or, in other words, cannot buy a freehold. He may possess any amount of property in the funds, he may own any number of ships, but cannot hold land. But numbers of aliens possess mills, houses, and land, and it is difficult to say in how many forms fixed property goes into the market, and is indiscriminately purchased by natives and foreigners. On what principle can the difference between land and other species of fixed property be any further maintained? I hold that an alien coming to reside in this country should be allowed to invest his property in whatsoever manner he pleases, and that the right of possessing land should not depend on his becoming naturalized. In France, by the 13th Article in the Civil Code, a foreigner domiciled in the country enjoys all the civil rights of French subjects; and as such he may acquire and possess every kind of property, whether moveable or immoveable (Zachariæ, Droit Civil Français; Merlin Rep. v. Étranger; Troplong, p. 392 et 429. Foreigners are in the same position as natural subjects in Holland and many other countries, and the distinction made in England between moveable and immoveable property is only a relic of the old barbarous law, the "Droit d'Aubain." This law was abolished in the German Confederation by Art. 18 of the Federal Act; in Spain by the Pacte de Famille, dated 15th August 1761; in Russia by the treaty of commerce and navigation of 11th January 1787, and it is equally abolished in the United States, Italy, Turkey, &c. In fact, the right of an alien to possess land has become a general law, not only in Europe, but throughout the world.

There is, moreover, a difficulty in the way of obtaining a certificate of naturalization which operates disadvantageously. Persons under age cannot be naturalized, because they cannot take the oath of allegiance. Consequently our schools and colleges lose the advantage of foreign children, who would come here to prepare themselves for the many posts in the civil service open to competition, and in which a limit of age is fixed by the Civil Service Commission. Quite recently a gentleman residing at Florence wished his son, a boy of great promise, to come to England to study, in order to compete for the Indian Civil Service. But two obstacles stood in the way. First, the limit of age being eighteen, the boy could not wait for the naturalization; and, second, in that service naturalized subjects appear to be excluded, the regulations limiting it to any natural-born subject of Her Majesty. I think it would be desirable to allow a person under age, intending to come to this country for his education, to be naturalized, upon a certificate by his father or other relative made before the British consul in the country or place where he resides, and that on his succeeding to obtain an appointment he should be enabled to complete his naturalization by taking the oath of allegiance. May I hope, also, that the civil service, whether of this country or of India, be open in all cases to naturalized subjects? Now that merit, and not patronage, is the proper road to advancement, scarcely any justification can be adduced for any difference on that score.

Under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, by application to the Secretary of State an alien may receive a certificate of naturalization, by which he is enabled to own land for more than 21 years, and travel with an English passport. That law may have been very liberal when it passed 25 years ago, but the times have changed, and I see no advantage in maintaining it if once we admit the principle of conceding to an alien the full enjoyment of civil rights, including that of owning any property whether moveable or immoveable. As for the right of travelling with an English passport, I consider it a constitutional privilege, and should be a sequel to an absolute change of nationality. Whilst I am disposed to attach very little value to the system of granting certificates of naturalization conferring only temporary rights, I am in favour of extending the powers of a naturalized subject upon his consenting to a change of nationality and allegiance. Under the English law, a certificate of naturalization always excepts the right of being a member of the Privy Council, or of either House of Parliament, or of taking any office, civil or military, or to have any grant of land from the Crown. Originally intended as a protection against Roman Catholicism, the exclusion has been maintained in deference to national susceptibilities; and when the present law on aliens was under the consideration of Parliament, a clause which would have removed the exclusion was taken out in committee. Since, however, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66 abolished the provision of 1. G. 1., c. 4, which prevented the passing of any Act of Naturalization with clauses granting such powers, it is held that the Legislature is at liberty to pass special Acts giving to an alien every right as a natural-born subject, and several Acts to that effect were recently passed. But setting aside that this method is most expensive, no regulations appear to exist as to the conditions for obtaining such an Act, unless it be that, by the standing rules of the House of Lords, the consent of the Crown is necessary, before a Naturalization Bill is read a second time. There is much uncertainty, in fact, as to the state of the law on the subject, and since the principle has now been admitted, I would suggest that the power of granting to an alien the full rights of a native-born subject, including that of being a member of either House, and the other excepted privileges, should rest with the Secretary of State, the condition in such cases being, 10 years' residence in this country, satisfactory reference as to character and respectability, and the taking of the oath of allegiance.

In the United States of America, seven years' citizenship are sufficient as a qualification for a representative to Congress, and nine years' citizenship for that of Senator. In France by the constitution of 22 Frimaire an VIII., an alien, after 10 years' residence, was enabled to sit in the legislative assemblies, and in 1808 the period was reduced to one year, as regards those who conferred great services to the State. In 1814, the king considering it necessary "that none should sit in the chambers, but persons whose "birth was a guarantee of his affection to the sovereign and "the laws of the State," reserved to himself the privilege of granting la grande naturalization, and stipulated that such letters should be verified by the two chambers. From 1814 to 1848, 22 foreigners only received the "grande naturalization." The decree of 1848 facilitated the naturalization, but in 1849 again it was declared that "the alien "naturalized should not enjoy the right of eligibility to the "National Assembly, except by virtue of a special law." Since, however, the electoral law of 1852 declared that every elector is eligible, a naturalized foreigner, who has undoubtedly the right to vote, possesses also the right of being eligible. And therefore quite recently, in 1863, (see Moniteur, 20th Nov. 1863,) Samuel Welles de Lavalette, born at Boston, domiciled in France and duly naturalized, was allowed without any special law, to sit in the Corps Legislatif, as fulfilling all the conditions of nationality, age, and capacity. In the same manner Prince Poniatowski a Pole, naturalized in 1854, was soon after admitted senator, though he neither received the letters of la grande naturalization required by the law of 1816, or was so authorized by the special law prescribed by the law of 1849. The French law is therefore now precisely in harmony with my suggestions.

The laws of different countries respecting aliens and naturalization differ materially, and in many points exhibit a conflict which it would be desirable to remove. The Commissioners will doubtless know, that if an English woman marries a Frenchman, by the French law (Art. 12 Civil Code), she becomes a French woman, and by the English law she remains English. And vice versâ, if a French woman marries an Englishman, by the same French law she ceases to be French, whilst by the English law she does not acquire an English nationality. Without entering into further particulars, I would urge for the consideration of the Commissioners the expediency of establishing the cardinal principles—1st, that an alien residing in a country, whether in a temporary or permanent manner, should have the right to the full enjoyment of civil rights and the full benefit of the law of the land; 2nd, that a certificate of naturalization, whenever granted, should confer full constitutional rights and privileges, it being always understood that such naturalization does not affect the restoration of such alien to the nationality of birth whenever he once more returns to his native country.

I have, &c.
LEONE LEVI.

APPENDIX No. V.

NATIONALITY OF CHILDREN BORN OF ALIEN PARENTS.

The accompanying Circular was sent from the Foreign Office to Her Majesty's Representatives at European Courts:—

"Foreign Office, August 11th, 1868.

"I have to instruct you to furnish me with a "report for the information of the Naturalization "Commission on the state of the ———— law with "regard to the nationality of children born of alien "parents within the ———— dominions."

AUSTRIA.

MY LORD, Vienna, December 8, 1868.

HAVING addressed myself to Baron Beust by note of the 22d ultimo, to remind his Excellency of the request addressed to him by Lord Bloomfield in August last, to be informed as to the state of the laws in Austria relative to children born of alien parents in this country, I have now the honour to transmit to your Lordship copy, with translation by Mr. Grosvenor, of a note which, in the absence of Baron Beust, I have received from Baron Vesque.

Baron Vesque informs me that in the western (Cisleithan) portion of the empire, all children born of foreign parents are treated as aliens, illegitimate children following the nationality of the mother. But Baron Vesque promises that his reply to Lord Bloomfield's first note will be more complete when he has received the information as regards Hungarian law which he has applied for to the Hungarian Government.

I have, &c.

The Lord Stanley, M.P. A. G. G. BONAR.
&c. &c. &c

Translation.

IN accordance with the wishes expressed by H. E. Lord Bloomfield, &c., in his note of the 15th of August 1867; and referred to by Mr. Bonar, &c., &c., in his note of the 22d of November last, the Imperial Royal Ministry for Foreign Affairs has the honour to inform H.B.M.'s Chargé d'Affaires, that according to the laws in force in the western half of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, children born of foreign parents within the limits of the lands represented in the Austrian Reichsrath are treated as aliens on account of their birth.

This rule applies as well to legitimate as to illegitimate children, and in the case of the latter, the nationality of the mother is decisive.

In order to furnish H.M.'s Government with authentic information respecting the provisions of the Hungarian Legislature as regards the nationality of children born of foreign parents in Hungary, the Imperial Royal Ministry for Foreign Affairs addressed a memorandum on this subject to the Royal Hungarian Ministry, but as no answer has up to this date been received, this matter will now be brought again to the recollection of the Hungarian Ministry, and the Imperial Royal Ministry for Foreign Affairs will not fail to communicate the desired information to Her Britannic Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, so soon as they shall have obtained it.

The undersigned avails himself, &c.

Signed for the Minister for Foreign Affairs,
S. T. VESQUE.

MY LORD, Vienna, December 21, 1868.

WITH reference to my despatch to Lord Stanley, of the 8th instant, informing his Lordship, in reply to the queries addressed to me in his despatch No. 70 circular of the 11th of August, that according to the law of the Western (Cis Lithan) portion of the empire, all children born of foreign parents in Austria are regarded as aliens, illegitimate children of aliens being regarded to follow the nationality of the mother, I have now the honour to enclose to your Lordship a translation of a note I have this day received from the Imperial Chancery of State, stating that the laws of Hungary on that point are identical with those of Cis-Lietha.

I have, &c.
A. G. G. Bonar.

The Right Hon. Earl of Clarendon, K.G.
&c. &c. &c.

In sequel to the note of this Department, of 30th of last month, the Ministry for Foreign Affairs has the honour to inform Mr. Bonar, &c., that as regards the nationality of illegitimate children born in this country of alien parents the laws in force in the lands belonging to the Hungarian Crown are identical with those of the western portion of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.

The undersigned avails, &c.
Vienna, Dec. 20, 1868. Biegeleben.

BADEN.

My Lord, Stuttgart, September 2, 1868.

In compliance with the instructions contained in your Lordship's despatch, marked Circular of the 11th instant, I made the necessary inquiries in order to ascertain the state of the Wurtemburg law with regard to the nationality of children born of alien parents within this kingdom, and the following is the result which I am now able to transmit to your Lordship.

According to Wurtemburg law all children born of alien parents in this kingdom are considered as inheriting the nationality of their parents; that is to say, all legitimate children the nationality of their father, and illegitimate children that of their mother; and the fact of a child of alien parents having been born on Wurtemberg territory does not, according to the laws in force here, exercise any influence whatsoever upon the question of its nationality.

I have the honour to enclose the accompanying translation of a note from Baron Freydorf to Mr. Baillie respecting the Baden law on this subject.

I have, &c.
The Lord Stanley, M.P. G. J. R. Gordon.
&c. &c. &c.

(Translation.)

Carlsruhe, August 28, 1868.

The Baden Legislature proceeds upon the principle that children born of a legally recognized marriage follow the nationality of the father, and illegitimate children that of the mother, consequently the children of a foreign father born in the Grand Duchy of a legally recognized marriage, or illegitmate children of a foreign mother are regarded as aliens.

Nevertheless, Art. 9 of the Baden "Landrecht" provides that anyone born in the country of a foreign parent, shall be entitled within a year after attaining his majority (which takes place in Baden after the age of 21) to claim the rights of a native born subject, only if he resides in the Grand Duchy, he must at the same time declare that he intends to fix his abode there, and, if he is in a foreign country, he must promise to fix his abode in the Grand Duchy, and actually settle there within a year after having made the promise.

According to Art, 9a. of the Baden "Landrecht," however, this claim must be submitted to the consideration of the Government, for their recognition or refusal of the same, whenever such alien possesses by birth the right of nationality or a fixed abode in another State.

The undersigned avails, &c.
Evan M. Baillie, Esq. (Signed) Freydorf.

BAVARIA.

My Lord, Munich, August 20th, 1868.

With reference to your Lordship's circular despatch of the 11th instant, I have the honour to transmit herewith a copy and a translation of a note of the 17th instant, which I received yesterday evening from Mr. de Daxenberger, in Prince Hohenlohe's absence, in answer to my inquiries relative to the state of the Bavarian law with regard to the nationality of children born of alien parents within the Bavarian dominions.

From this note your Lordship will perceive that according to Bavarian law, the children of aliens, even when born in Bavaria, do not acquire the Bavarian citizenship, but are considered and treated as aliens, until they shall have been naturalized in the same manner as all immigrants; but that, on the other hand, the children of immigrants begotten after the naturalization of their parents are considered as Bavarian subjects.

I have, &c.
The Lord Stanley, M.P. Henry F. Howard.
&c. &c. &c.

(Translation.)

The undersigned in answer to the note of Sir H. F. Howard, etc. etc. etc., of the 14th instant, has the honour to reply that according to Bavarian law the children of aliens, being persons not belonging to the Bavarian State, even when begotten and born in Bavaria, do not acquire the Bavarian citizenship, but are considered and treated as aliens, until they shall have been naturalized in the same manner as all immigrants.

On the other hand, the children of immigrants begotten after the naturalization of their parents are considered as Bavarian subjects.

The undersigned, etc.
(Signed) v. Daxenberger.

Sir H. Howard, K.C.B.
&c. &c. &c.

BELGIUM.

My Lord, Brussels, 20 August 1868.

In reply to your Lordship's despatch marked Circular of the 11th instant, in which I am instructed to report on the state of the Belgian law with regard to the nationality of children born of alien parents in the Belgian dominions, I have the honour to inclose herewith copies of the two articles of the Civil Code which afford the information desired.

I beg further to explain that according to the doctrine and jurisprudence most generally received, the individual who complies with the conditions of Article 9 of the Civil Code, is considered a Belgian subject from the day of his birth and not from the day on which he may make the declaration, the declaration having a retroactive effect; therefore the declaration once made the individual making it is considered as never having been a foreigner.

I have, &c.
Howard de Walden and Seaford.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

Tout individu né en Belgique d'un étranger pourra, dans l'année qui suivra l'époque de sa majorité, réclamer la qualité de Belge, pourvu que dans le cas où il résiderait en Belgique il déclare que son intention est d'y fixer son domicile, et que, dans le cas où il résiderait en pays étranger, il fasse sa soumission de fixer en Belgique son domicile et qu'il l'y établisse dans l'anneé à compter de l'acte de soumission. (Article 9, Code Civil.)

L'individu né en Belgique de parents étrangers y domiciléés qui aurait négligé de faire la declaration préscrite par l'article 9 du Code Civil est recevable, s'il est habitant du royaume, à demander la grande naturalisation, sans qu'il soit besoin de justifier qu'il ait rendu des services éminents à l'Etat. (Loi du 27 Sept. 1835, Art. 2.)

DENMARK.

British Legation, Copenhagen,

My Lord, July 30, 1868.

As a supplement to my despatch of the 27th ultimo, on the position of aliens in Denmark, I have the honour to enclose herewith, at the request of the Naturalization Commission, the written opinion of Mr. Brock, a distinguished Danish lawyer, with reference:

1st. To the oath required of aliens entering on certain professions.

2ndly. Whether the birth in Denmark of the son of an alien constitutes a Danish subject?

Your Lordship will see by the enclosed document that:

1st. The "Borgherskab" or Burgherbur oath was abrogated in 1858. The oath now taken by brokers, translators, &c. in non-political, and limited to the faithful performance of their office.

2nd. The son of an alien born in Denmark is considered a Dane to all intents and purposes, so long as he remains in Denmark.

I have, &c.

The Lord Stanley, M.P. Charles Lennox Wyke.
&c. &c. &c.

Sir, Copenhagen, July 26, 1868.

Your Excellency has asked my opinion on the following questions:—

1st. Is the "Borgerbur" oath still required for entering on certain professions, and if so, what professions?

2nd. Does the fact of birth in Denmark constitute a son of an alien a Danish subject?

Answer. 1st. The "Borgerbur" oath required by the Danish law for entering on professions of different kinds has been abolished by the law of December 29, 1857. The oath still taken by brokers, translators, and such persons of public trust, that they will faithfully perform the duties imposing on their office, has no influence upon their situation as subjects of the Danish Crown, and is no oath of allegiance.

2nd. The son of an alien, born in Denmark, is regarded a Dane, if he remains here.

I have, &c.

Sir Charles L. Wyke, K.C.B., Gustav Brock,
&c. &c. &c. Advocate of the Supreme Court.

British Legation, Copenhagen,

My Lord, August 17, 1868.

In reply to your circular marked of the 11th instant, instructing me to furnish a report for the information of the Naturalization Commission on the state of the Danish law with regard to the nationality of children born of alien parents within the Danish dominions, I have the honor to refer your Lordship to my dispatch marked of the 28th ult., which contains the information required by the Commission with reference to this subject.

I have, &c.

Charles Lennox Wyke.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

FRANCE.

Code Napoleon. Code Civil, liv. I, c. 1.

"9. Tout individu né en France d'un étranger pourra, dans l'année qui suivra l'époque de sa majorité, réclamer la qualité de Français; pourvu que, dans le cas où il résiderait en France, il déclare que son intention est d'y fixer son domicile, et que dans le cas où il résiderait en pays étranger, il fasse sa soumission de fixer en France son domicile, et qu'il l'y établisse dans l'année, à compter de l'acte de soumission.

10. "Tout enfant né d'un Français en pays étranger est Français. Tout enfant né en pays étranger d'un Français qui aurait perdu la qualité de Français pourra toujours recouvrer cette qualité en remplissant les formalités prescrites par l'Article 9."

C. 11, Section I.

"17. La qualité de Français se perdra, 1e, par la naturalisation acquise en pays étranger; 2e, par l'acceptation, non autorisée par le Roi, de fonctions publiques conférées par un Gouvernement étranger; 3e, enfin par tout établissement fait en pays étranger, sans esprit de retour. Les établissement de commerce ne pourront jamais être considérés comme ayant été faits sans esprit de retour.

"18. Le Français qui aura perdu sa qualité de Français pourra toujours la recouvrer, en rentrant en France avec l'autorisation du Roi, et en déclarant qu'il veut s'y fixer, et qu'il renonce à toute distinction contraire à la loi Française."

The ninth Article of the Code Napoléon was modified by a Law of 1851:—

"29–29 Janvier et 7 Février, 1851 (10e série, No. 2730) (Article 9, C. N.)—Loi concernant les individus nés en France d'étrangers qui eux-mêmes y sont nés, et les enfants des étrangers naturalisés.

"Article 1. Est Français tout individu né en France d'un étranger qui lui-même y est né à moins que, dans l'année qui suivra l'époque de sa majorité, telle qu'elle est fixée par la loi Française, il ne réclame la qualité d'étranger par une déclaration faite, soit devant l'autorité municipale du lieu de sa résidence, soit devant les Agents Diplomatiques ou Consulaires accrédités en France par le Gouvernement étranger.

"L'Article 9 du Code Civil est applicable aux enfants de l'étranger naturalisé, quoique nés en pays étranger, s'ils étaient mineurs lors de la naturalisation. A l'égard des enfants nés en France ou à l'etranger, qui étaient majeurs à cette même époque, l'Article 9 du Code Civil leur est applicable dans l'année qui suivra celle de la dite naturalisation."

GREECE.

My Lord, Athens, September 3, 1868.

With reference to your Lordship's circular dispatch of the 11th ultimo, I have the honour to inclose herewith a copy of a report, drawn up by the lawyer employed by this Legation, on the state of the Greek law with regard to the nationality of children born of alien parents within the Greek dominions.

I have, &c.

The Lord Stanley, M.P. C. M. Erskine.
&c. &c. &c.

Quelle est la condition des enfants nés sur le sol hellénique de parents ètrangers?

En règle générale, la circonstance qu'un enfant est né sur le sol héllénique ne confère pas la qualité d'Hellène, l'origine seule la donne. Pour résoudre donc la question, si un enfant est ou non Hellène, une seule chose est à considérer: de qui est-il né? L'est-il d'un Hellène, il est lui-même Hellène, en quelque pays qu'il soit né. Ses parents sont-ils étrangers, il est étranger comme eux, alors même qu'il est né en Grèce (Art 14, No. 1 du Code Civil).

Il faut cependant remarquer que la circonstance qu'un enfant est né sur le sol hellénique produit un double effet en sa faveur.

1. Elle lui permet d'acquérir plus facilement qu'un étranger ordinaire la qualité d'Hellène; il n'a, en effet, qu'a remplir trois conditions.

(a.) Déclarer, lorsqu'il réside en Grèce, que son intention est d'y fixer son domicile, et l'y établir dans l'année à compter de l'acte de sa soumission.

(b.) Faire cette déclaration ou cette soumission dans l'année de sa majorité, et.

(c.) Prêter le serment de sujet Hellène devant le Nomarque compétent (Art. 19, et 17 du Code Civil).

2. Elle fait présumer, lorsque ses père et mère sont inconnus, qu'il est né de parents Hellènes, et par conséquent, qu'il est lui même Hellène (Art. 114, No. 3 du Code Civil).

Le principe que l'origine de l'enfant détermine sa nationalité, indépendamment du lieu de sa naissance, ne présente aucune difficulté, lorsque ses père et mère sont l'un et l'autre étrangers; l'enfant est Hellène dans le premier cas, étranger dans le second. Mais que décider si l'un est Hellène et l'autre étranger? L'enfant suivra-t-il la condition de son père ou celle de sa mère?

Si l'enfant est né en legitime mariage, cette question se présentera rarement, car, la femme suivant la condition de son mari (Art. 21 et 25 du Code Civil) les époux seront dans la plupart des cas, l'un et l'autre Hellènes ou l'un et l'autre étrangers. Cependant le principe proclamé par ces articles, devant être entendu en ce sens restrient que la femme prend la condition qu'a son mari au moment de son mariage, l'hypothèse contraire peut se présenter. Alors l'enfant suivra-t-il la condition de son père ou celle de sa mère? Le père étant le chef de la famille, l'Art. 14, No. 1, décide que l'enfant suivra la nationalité du père.

Quant à l'enfant né d'une mère étrangère et d'un père naturel Hellène, s'il est légalement reconnu par son père seul, ou par son père et par sa mère, il suit la condition de son père (Art. 14, No. 5, du Code Civil). Par a contrario il faut décider que s'il a été reconnu seulement par sa mère, il est, comme elle, étranger.

Celui qui est né d'une mère Hellène et d'un père naturel étranger, est réputé sujet Hellène, s'il n'a pas été reconnu par ce dernier (Art. 14, No. 2, du Code Civil), que s'il en a été reconnu, pour obtenir la nationalité Hellénique, il doit remplir les formalités susmentionnées de l'Art. 17 du Code Civil (Art. 19 du même Code).

Reste à examiner la question de savoir si l'enfant prend la condition qu'avait son père ou sa mère au moment de sa conception ou de sa naissance? La question présente de l'intérêt, car la personne dont l'enfant doit suivre la condition a pu, dans l'intervalle de la conception à la naissance, d'Hellène qu'elle était, cesser de l'être par une naturalisation acquise en pays étranger, ou réciproquement, d'étrangère, qu'elle etait, devenir Hellène par une naturalisation acquise en Grèce.

L'Art. 11 du Code Civil proclamant la maxime Romaine: Infans conceptus pro nato habetur, quoties de ejus commodis agitur, et comme aux yeux de la loi hellénique il vaut mieux pour l'enfant qu'il naisse Hellène qu'étranger, nous dirons qu'il suffit, pour qu'un enfant naisse Hellène, que la personne dont il doit suivre la condition ait été Hellène, soit au moment de la conception, soit au moment de sa naissance, soit même dans l'intervalle de ces deux époques.

Les enfants qui naitraient pendant les deux ou les trois ans exigés pour la naturalisation de l'étranger (selon qu'il est ou non d'origine hellénique) deviennent Hellènes par la naturalisation de leur père (Art. 18 du Code Civil). Quant aux enfants qui lui seraient survenus avant la déclaration exigée pour la naturalisation, ils restent étrangers ainsi que sa femme; mais si à l'époque de sa naturalisation ils étaient mineurs, ils peuvent acquérir la nationalité hellénique en manifestant leur volonté à cet égard, dans l'année qui suivra l'époque de leur majorité, devant l'autorité Communale du lieu ou ils veulent fixer leur domicile, en s'établissant en Grèce et en prêtant le serment de sujet Hellène devant le Nomarque compétent (Art. 17 du Code Civil).

L'Art. 20 du même Code décide que l'enfant né de parents qui avaient perdu la qualité d'Hellène, pourra toujours acquérir cette qualité en remplissant les formalités prescrites par l'Art. 17. Le Code Civil de la Grèce n'attribuant la qualité d'Hellène qu'à l'origine, il n'y a pas à distinguer si l'enfant d'un ci-devant Hellène est né à l'étranger ou en Grèce; dès que ceux dont il suit la condition sont étranger il nait nécessairement étranger comme eux, quel que soit le lieu de sa naissance. Cependant il faut remarquer que l'enfant né d'un ci-devant Hellène est traité plus favorablement que l'enfant né en Grèce d'un étranger ordinaire; l'un peut toujours, c'est-à-dire, à tout âge, pourvu qu'il soit majeur, réclamer la qualité d'Hellène; l'autre ne le peut, au contraire, que dans un délai assez court, dans l'année qui suit sa majorité.

Cette différence s'explique sans peine; l'enfant né d'un ci-devant Hellène étant Hellène selon la nature, la loi ne doute pas de son attachement pour la Grèce; à quelque époque qu'il se présente, elle l'accepte avec empressement, convaincue qu'elle est que le sentiment qui le fait agir ne peut être que son amour pour sa patrie naturelle. Il n'en est pas de même de l'enfant né en Grèce d'un étranger; celui-là n'a rien d'hellénique. Il se peut qu'il affectionne la Grèce, puisqu'il y est né; mais s'il est trop lent à manifester le désir d'avoir le titre d'Hellène, la loi, avertie pas son indifférence, présume lorsqu'il se présente plus tard, qu'il ne vient que dans son intérêt personnel, aussi le traite-t-elle à l'égal d'un étranger ordinaire.

Athènes le 19/31 Août 1868.

(Signé) D. G. Rhally,
Avocat, Dr. en Droit.

HANSE TOWNS.

My Lord, Hamburg, September 8, 1868.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's circular despatch under date of the 11th of August, instructing me to report as to the law of the Hanse Towns with respect to the nationality of children born of alien parents within their respective territories, and beg leave to report as follows:—

According to the law of Lubeck, all legitimate children born of alien parents within its territory take the nationality of the father, while those which are illegitimate take that of the mother until another nationality is acquired for them.

The law in force in Bremen prescribes merely that children of alien parents who are not citizens of Bremen, are not to be regarded as subjects of that state, and makes no conditions as to their being born in wedlock or not.

According to the law of Hamburg, the nationality of the parents is transmitted to the children without any restrictions whatever as to the place of birth, except in the case of illegitimacy, when the children take the nationality of the mother.

I have, &c.

George Annesley,
Acting Consul-General.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

HESSE DARMSTADT.

No. 7.

My Lord, Darmstadt, September 9, 1868.

Upon the receipt of your Lordship's circular despatch, of the 11th ultimo, I addressed a note to Baron Dalwigk of which I have the honour to enclose herewith a copy, and I have now received from His Excellency the answer of which a copy is likewise herewith transmitted.

Your Lordship will learn from this correspondence that children born of alien parents within the Grand Ducal dominions retain their "status" as aliens unless they are appointed to a public employment in the Grand Duchy, or are naturalized by a special act.

I have, &c.

R. B. D. Morier.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

Monsieur le Baron,

Chargé par mon Gouvernement de lui fournir un rapport sur les lois qui regardent la nationalité d'enfants nés dans le territoire Grand Ducal d'autres nationaux que ceux du Grand Duché, j'ai recours à la bienveillance de Votre Excellence en la priant de bien vouloir me donner connaissance des lois dont il s'agit.

Je saisis, &c.

(Signed) R. B. D. Morier.

A son Excellence
Monsieur le Baron de Dalwigk.
&c. &c. &c.

Copy.

Monsieur,

En réponse à la communication que vous avez bien voulu m'adresser en date du 19 du mois passé j'ai l'honneur de porter à votre connaissance que, d'après l'article 13 de la Constitution du Grand Duché, l'indigénat est acquis:

1. Par la naissance, pour ceux dont père ou mère sont à ce moment sujets Hessois;
2. Par le mariage, pour une femme étrangère qui se marie avec un sujet Hessois;
3. Par la nomination à un emploi public;
4. Par réception particulière.

En conséquence, les enfants nés dans le territoire Grand Ducal d'autres nationaux que ceux du Grand Duché sont reconnus étrangers tant qu'ils n'ont pas acquis l'indigénat Hessois en vertu d'une des dispositions susmentionnées.

Agréez, &c.

(Signé) Baron de Dalwigk.

Darmstadt, le 7 Septembre 1868.

ITALY.

Codice Civile del Regno d'Italia, lib. I., tit. 1.

"4. The child of a citizen is a citizen.

"5. If the father has lost his citizenship before the birth of the child, the latter is reputed a citizen if he is born within the State and resides therein.

"Nevertheless, on becoming of age, according to the laws of the realm, he may elect to take the quality of an alien on making a declaration before the authorities of the civil State in which he resides, or, if in a foreign country, before the Royal Diplomatic or Consular Agents.

"6. The child, born in a foreign country, of a father who has lost his citizenship before the child's birth, is reputed as alien.

"He can, however, elect to take the quality of a citizen on making a declaration as prescribed by the preceding Article, and fixing his domicil in the kingdom during the year in which he makes such declaration.

"Nevertheless, if he has accepted public employment in the kingdom, or has served in the army or navy, or otherwise satisfied the requirements of the conscription without seeking exemption as an alien, he shall be considered a citizen without further process.

"7. When the father is unknown the child of a citizen mother is a citizen.

"When the mother has lost her citizenship before the birth of the child, the dispositions of the two preceding articles become applicable.

"If even the mother is unknown, a child born in the kingdom is a citizen.

"8. The child of an alien who has established his domicil within the kingdom uninterruptedly for ten years is considered a citizen: residence for commercial purposes is not sufficient to constitute domicil.

"The child can, however, elect to be considered an alien, on making the declaration prescribed in Article 5.

"When the alien has not established his domicil in the kingdom for ten years, the child is considered an alien; but the dispositions of the two first paragraphs of Article 6 are applicable to the case.

Extract of paragraph 10.—"The wife and minor "children of an alien who has obtained citizenship becomes "citizens, on the condition of their also establishing their "residence in the realm, but the children can elect to "take upon them the quality of aliens on making the "declaration prescribed in Article 5."

Extract of paragraph 11.—"The wife and minor children "of one who has lost his citizenship become aliens, unless "they have continued to reside within the realm.

"Nevertheless, the wife can re-acquire citizenship in the case and by the means stated in the second paragraph of Article 14, and the children according to the second and third paragraphs of Article 11.

NETHERLANDS.

No. 280.

My Lord, The Hague, Sept. 14, 1868.

With reference to your Lordship's dispatch, circular, No. 43, of the 11th ultimo, instructing me to furnish a report, for the information of the Naturalization Commission, on the state of the Netherlands Law with regard to the nationality of children born of alien parents within the Netherlands dominions, I have the honour, herewith, to transmit to your Lordship copy of a note dated the 3rd instant from the Netherlands Minister of Foreign Affairs supplying information on the subject.

I have, &c.

The Lord Stanley, M.P. E. A. J. Harris.
&c. &c. &c.

Copy.

La Haye, le 3 Septbre. 1868.

Monsieur le Ministre,

Par votre office du 17 Août dernier, vous avez bien voulu me demander des renseignements touchant la nationalité des enfans nés de parents étrangers sur le territoire du royaume. J'ai l'honneur de porter à votre connaissance qu'il y a lieu de distinguer, quant à cette catégorie de nationaux, entre la nationalité complète, s'étendant à l'exercise des droits civils et politiques, et la nationalité restreinte, ne comprenant que la jouissance des droits civils.

La nationalité complète est acquise aux enfans nés de parents étrangers (Art. 1 de la loi du 28 Juillet 1850, F.O. No. 44):

1. Lorsqu'ils sont nés, soit dans le royaume, soit à l'étranger, de parents établis dans le royaume en Europe (Art. 1, No. 1).

L'article 3 détermine les conditions de l'établissement.

2. Lorsqu'ils sont nés dans le royaume en Europe de parents qui n'y sont pas établis, et déclarent dans l'année, après avoir accompli l'âge de 23 ans, à l'autorité du lieu de leur domicile, leur intention de continuer à y résider, Art. 1, No. 2.

Ne jouissent que de la nationalité restreinte les enfans nés de parents étrangers (Art. 1 et 5 du Code Civil):

1. Qui sont nés, soit sur le territoire Néerlandais, soit à l'étranger, de parents établis dans le royaume ou dans ses colonies (Art. 5, No. 1 et No. 3);

2. Qui sont nés dans le royaume en Europe de parents qui n'y sont pas établis lorsqu' eux-mêmes s'y établissent, (Art. 5, No. 2).

Espérant que ce qui précède suffira au but qui se propose la Commission de Naturalisation, je saisis cete occasion pour, &c. &c.

(Signé) Roest van Limburg.

Vice-Admiral Harris,
&c. &c. &c.

PORTUGAL.

No. 38.

My Lord, Lisbon, August 27, 1868.

On the receipt of your Lordship's circular despatch of the 11th instant, I addressed a note to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, requesting his Excellency to inform me as to the actual state of the Portuguese law, with regard to the nationality of children born of aliens within the Portuguese dominions.

In his Excellency's note to me of the 22d instant, in reply to the above, and of which I have the honour to inclose a copy and translation, your Lordship will find a statement of the Portuguese law on the matter.

I have, &c.

The Lord Stanley, M.P. Ch. A. Murray.
&c. &c. &c.

(Translation.)

Foreign Department Lisbon, August 22, 1868.

Most Illustrious and Excellent Sir,

I had the honour to receive the note which your Excellency was pleased to address to me on the 19th instant, requesting, in the name of your Government and for the information of the Commission on Naturalization, to be made acquainted with the present state of the law, as regards the nationality of children born of aliens within the Portuguese dominions.

In reply it is my duty to state to your Excellency that the law declares that those born in this kingdom of an alien father are Portuguese citizens, provided the latter does not reside in this country in the service of his own nation, and unless the former should declare, when of age or emancipated, or through their parents or guardians if minors, that they do not wish to be Portuguese citizens (Civil Code, Title 11, Article 18, No. 2).

Those born in this kingdom when the mother alone is Portuguese, if illegitimate (No. 1).

The declaration required in No. 2 shall be made before the Municipality of the place where the declarer shall have resided (§ 1).

A minor on coming of age or when emancipated, may, by means of a new declaration, made before the Municipality of the place which he may have chosen for his domicile, recall the declaration which may already have been made during his minority, by his father or guardians, in accordance with No. 2 (§ 2).

I avail, &c.

(Signed) Carlos Bento da Silva.

Sir Charles A. Murray,
&c. &c. &c.

PRUSSIA.

No. 2.

My Lord, Berlin, September 5, 1868.

With reference to your Lordship's despatch to Lord Augustus Loftus, marked circular No. 173 of the 11th ultimo, instructing His Excellency to furnish your Lordship with a report with regard to the nationality of children born of alien parents within the Prussian dominions, I have the honour to inclose to your Lordship herewith, copy and translation of a note from the Prussian Foreign Office, in which it is stated that no special legal provisions exist in Prussia with regard to this question. Monsieur von Kehler incloses, however, a copy of the law of the 31st of December 1842, with reference to the acquirement or loss of the rights of Prussian subjects, and remarks that, in accordance with the provisions of this law, the general principle observed with regard to nationality is that legitimate children follow the nationality of the father and illegitimate children that of the mother. No legal consequences, as regards nationality, are attached to the circumstance of a child being born in the Prussian dominions.

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a translation of the law inclosed in Monsieur von Hehler's note.

I have, &c.,
FRANK C. LASCELLES.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &e. &c.

(Translation.)

Berlin, August 31, 1868.

ACCORDING to the contents of His Excellency Lord A. Loftus' letter of the 24th instant, the Government of Her Britannic Majesty are desirous of obtaining information relative to the legal provisions in force in Prussia with respect to the nationality of the children born of foreign parents within the Prussian dominions.

With reference to this subject, the undersigned has the honour to inform His Excellency Lord A. Loftus, that no special legal provisions exist in Prussia with regard to this question. In accordance with the regulations laid down in the annexed copy of the law of the 31st December 1842, respecting the acquirement or loss of the quality of a Prussian subject, the general principle is observed with reference to the decision of personal relations and also of nationality that legitimate children follow the nationality of the father, and illegitimate children that of the mother, unless an alteration is made in consequence of the proceedings of the children themselves. No special consequences with respect to nationality are attended to the fact of being born in Prussia.

The undersigned avails, &c.
(Signed) V. KEHLER.

His Excellency Lord A. Loftus,
&c. &c. &c.

Law respecting the acquisition and loss of the quality of Prussia by a Prussian subject, and his admission to foreign citizenship. December 31st, 1842.

We FREDERICK WILLIAM, &c., &c.,
Ordain, &c.

Article 1.

The rights of Prussian subjects are founded on

1. Descent (§ 2).
2. Legitimization (§ 3).
3. Marriage (§ 4) and
4. Permission (§§ 5, &c.).

Adoption does not alone produce this effect.

§ 2.

Every legitimate child of a Prussian subject is by birth a Prussian subject, even though born in a foreign country. Illegitimate children follow the status of the mother.

§ 3.

If the mother of an illegitimate child is a foreigner and the father a Prussian, the child may become a Prussian subject by means of legitimization drawn up in accordance with the Prussian laws.

§ 4.

A foreign woman becomes a Prussian subject on her marriage with a Prussian.

§ 5.

Permission to become a Prussian subject may be granted upon the issuing of a deed of naturalization which the police authorities are empowered to grant.

§ 6.

A permission to a foreigner to enter the service of the Prussian state takes the place of the deed of naturalization. An exception to this rule is made in cases of foreigners employed abroad as consuls or commercial agents.

§ 7.

The rights of Prussian subjects can only be granted to those foreigners who

(1.) Are capable of receiving them in accordance with the laws of their former country.
(2.) Have led an irreproachable life.
(3.) Have got a house or the means of subsistence in the place where they have settled.
(4.) Are in a position to sustain themselves and their families in that place.
(5.) If they are subjects of a German state, have fulfilled their military obligations to their original country, or have been released from so doing.

§ 8.

The police authorities are bound before granting naturalization rights to inform the municipality of the district where the applicant purposes to reside, in accordance with the requirements of § 7, No. 2, 3. 4, and to listen to their statement and to regard their objections.

§ 9.

The grant of naturalization confers all the rights and duties of a Prussian at the date of the grant.

§ 10.

The permission to become a Prussian subject will be extended, unless a special exception is made, to the wife and children under age. If one of these should not have complied with the requirements of § 7, No. 2, respecting a blameless life and should therefore not be admitted, the whole family must be refused.

§ 11.

Nothing in this law shall affect the rights and duties of subjects resulting from the possession of landed property, and especially from the possession of manors and from the oath of homage.

§ 12.

No parish may receive a foreigner as a member until he has obtained the rights of a Prussian subject.

§ 13.

Residence within the Prussian state shall not for the future constitute a claim for becoming a Prussian subject.

§ 14.

Foreigners who wish to reside in Prussia, and do not wish to be regarded as mere travellers, may be called upon to prove the continuance of their former allegiance by means of a certificate (Heimathschein).

§ 15. The quality of a Prussian subject is lost:
1. By discharge upon the subject's request.
2. By sentence of the competent authority.
3. By living ten years in a foreign country.
4. By the marriage of a female Prussian subject with a foreigner.

§ 16. The discharge has to be asked for from the police authority of the province in which the subject's domicile is situated, and is effected by a document made out by the same authority.

§ 17. The discharge cannot be granted:
(1.) To male subjects who are between seventeen and twenty years of age, until they have got a certificate of the military commission of recruitment of their district, proving that their application for discharge is not made merely to avoid the fulfilling of their military duty in the standing army.
(2.) To actual soldiers, belonging either to the standing army or to the reserve; to officers of the militia and to public functionaries, before their being discharged from service.
(3.) To subjects having formerly served as officers in the standing army or the militia, or having been appointed military employés, with the rank of officers, or civil functionaries, before they have got the consent of the former chief.

(4.) To the persons belonging to the militia, not being officers, after their having been convoked for actual service.

§ 18. To subjects wishing to emigrate into a State of the German Confederacy, the discharge may be refused if they cannot prove that the said State is willing to receive them.—(See Act of the German Confederation, Art. 18, No. 2, lit. A.)

§ 19. For other reasons than those specified in §§ 17 and 18, the discharge cannot be refuse in time of peace. For the time of war, special regulations will be made.

§ 20. The document of discharge effects, at the moment of its delivery, the loss of the quality as Prussian subject.

§ 21. If there is no special exception, the discharge comprehends also the wife and the minor children that are still under their father's authority.

§ 22. Subjects living in a foreign country may lose their quality as Prussians by a declaration of the police authority of Prussia, if they do not obey, within the time fixed to them, the express summons for returning to their country.

§ 23. Subjects who either—

(1.) Leave our States without permission, and do not return within ten years, or—

(2.) Leave our States with permission, but do not return within ten years after the expiration of the term granted by the said permission, lose their quality as Prussian subjects.

§ 24. Entering into public service in a foreign State.

The entering of a subject into public service in a foreign State is allowed only after his discharge (see § 20) has been granted to him. Anybody who has obtained it, is permitted to do so without restriction.

§ 25. A subject who—

(1.) Either takes public service in a foreign State, with our immediate permission.

(2.) Or is it appointed in our States by a foreign power, in an office established with our permission, as, for instance, that of consul, commercial agent, &c., remaining in his quality as a Prussian.

§ 26. General disposition.

Subjects who emigrate without having obtained their discharge, or violate, by their entering into public service in a foreign State, the disposition of § 24, are to be punished according to the laws existing in that respect.

Given under our hand and seal, Berlin, this 31st of December 1842.

FREDERICK WILLIAM.

RUSSIA.

No. 181.

MY LORD, St. Petersburgh, August 25, 1868.

IN obedience to the Instructions contained in your Lordship's despatch marked Circular of the 11th instant, I have the honour to report that the general law of Russia in regard to aliens is, that all foreign subjects who have not taken an oath of allegiance to Russia in due form, are held to be aliens. The law of the $\frac{1}{22}$ February 1864, of which an abstract was enclosed in my despatch of the 30th June last, stipulates:

5. "The allegiance (to Russia) when sworn to (by the subject of a Foreign Power,) is merely personal, and does not affect children, whether of age or minors, previously born. Those born after the adoption of Russian nationality are acknowledged as Russians.

12. "Children of Foreigners not Russian subjects, born and educated in Russia, or if born abroad, yet who have completed their education in a Russian upper or middle school, will be admitted to Russian allegiance, should they desire to be so, a year after they shall have obtained their majority; and lastly,

13. "The children of Foreigners wishing to become Russian subjects will be admitted to Russian allegiance on the same terms as their parents."

I have, &c.

ANDREW BUCHANAN.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

SAXONY.

MY LORD, Dresden, November 27, 1868.

WITH reference to your Lordship's circular despatch of the 11th August, directing me to report on the state of Saxon law with regard to nationality of children born of alien parents within the Saxon dominions, I have the honour to enclose in translation the information furnished me by the Saxon Government on the subject.

I have, &c.

J. HUME BURNLEY.

IN reply to the note of H. B. M's. chargé d'affaires of the 19th inst., the undersigned has the honour to state, with reference to paragraph 2 of the law of the Kingdom of Saxony of the 2nd of July 1852, relative to acquisition and loss of citizenship, copy of which is herewith annexed, that children of aliens born in Saxony do not by the mere accident of birth acquire Saxon nationality, inasmuch as the right of Saxon citizenship by birth is obtained only on the supposition that either the father or the mother (whether lawfully married or not) were at the time of such birth, either here or abroad, Saxon subjects.

The undersigned, &c.

Dresden, Nov. 21 1868. FRIESEN.

Paragraph 2 of the law relative to acquisition and loss of Saxon citizenship of 2nd July 1852.

By birth all those are entitled to Saxon citizenship whose father or if illegitimate whose mother, at the time of their birth, whether at home or abroad, were Saxon subjects.

SPAIN.

MY LORD, Madrid, October 8, 1868.

WITH reference to my despatch of the 18th of August last, enclosing copy of a note which I addressed to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs, requesting His Excellency to furnish me with information respecting the nationality of children born of alien parents in Spanish dominions, I have now the honour to forward to your Lordship a translation of the Marquis Roneali's reply to my communication.

I further beg to enclose copies of the Spanish constitution and of the Royal Decree of November 17, 1852, in which the passages having particular reference to the subject in question will be found marked.

I have, &c.

JOHN F. CRAMPTON.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

SIR, Lequeitio, September 15, 1868.

THE minister of the interior informs me, under date of 4th inst., that the constitution at present in force in the Spanish Monarchy and the Royal Decree of 17th November 1852, from the Legislation which actually governs the nationality of children born of foreign parents in Spanish dominions.

I have the honour to inform you of this in reply to the note from your legation dated the 17th August last, and avail, &c.

(Signed) MARQUIS RONCALI.

H. B. M. Minister Plenipotentiary.

Extract from the Constitution of the Spanish Monarchy, May 23, 1845.

Titulo 1. De los Españoles. Articulo, 1°.

"The following are Spanish subjects:—

"1. All persons born within the dominions of Spain.

"The children of a Spanish father or mother, even though born without the Spanish dominions."

Extracts from the Royal Decree of the 17th of November 1852.

"Capitulo 1. De los estranjeros y su clasificacion en España.

"Art. 1. The following are to be deemed aliens.

"1. All persons born of alien fathers without the Spanish dominions.

"2. The children of an alien father and Spanish mother, "born without the said dominions, unless they have "reclaimed Spanish nationality.

"3. Those born within Spanish territory of alien fathers "or of an alien father and Spanish mother, unless they "have made a similar reclamation.

"4. Those born without the Spanish dominions of "fathers who have lost their Spanish nationality.

"5. Spanish women married to alien husbands.

* * * * * * * * *

"Capitulo 3. Art. 24. Aliens domiciled or temporarily "resident within the Spanish dominions and their children "are exempt from military service unless they have "reclaimed Spanish nationality.

"But this does not apply to the sons whose parents "have been born within Spanish territory, even though "they may have preserved their alien nationality."

SWEDEN.

No. 9.

My Lord, Stockholm, September 17, 1868.

With reference to your Lordship's despatch, marked circular of the 11th of August, as to the Swedish law on the subject of the children of alien parents born in Swedish dominions, I have the honour to enclose herewith copy of a note which I have received from the Swedish Minister for Foreign Affairs, wherein he informs me that there is no provision in the Swedish Fundamental Law or in the Civil Code on this subject, neither does there exist any special stipulation as to the nationality of children born in Swedish dominions of alien parents.

It is generally received, however, as expressed in Count Wachtmeister's note inclosed, that the nationality of the children is noways affected by the place of their birth, but by the nationality of their parents, and notably of the father.

I have, &c.
J. Pakenham.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

Monsieur, Stockholm, 12 Septembre 1868.

En réponse à Votre note du 18 du mois passé, j'ai l'honneur de vous communiquer qu'il n'y a pas dans les lois fondamentales, ni dans le Code Civil, ni même dans une ordonnance spéciale une stipulation relative à la nationalité d'un enfant né en Suède de parents étrangers. Cependant on a toujours été d'avis que la nationalité ne dépend aucunement du lieu de naissance, mais bien de la nationalité des parents, notamment de celle du père. Ainsi les enfants de sujets étrangers ne jouissent pas, par le fait qu'ils sont nés en Suède, de droits meilleurs ou autres que ceux accordés à tout sujet étranger.

Veuillez agréer, Monsieur, &c.
(Signed) Wachtmeister.

Monsieur Pakenham,
&c. &c. &c.

SWITZERLAND.

No. 98.

My Lord, Berne, September 6, 1868.

In your despatch, marked circular, of the 11th ultimo, I am instructed to furnish your Lordship with a report, for the information of the Naturalization Commission, on the state of the Swiss law with regard to the nationality of children born of alien parents in Switzerland.

Finding it difficult, without the assistance of the Federal Government, to draw up a report on this subject, the laws concerning which appear to vary in different cantons, I addressed a note to the President requesting him to obtain for me, from the various Cantonal Governments, replies to the following questions, which I thought calculated to procure the information required by the Naturalization Commission.

1st. What is considered to constitute a Swiss citizen according to the laws of the various Cantons?

2nd. In what manner, if in any, can such citizenship be forfeited?

3rd. Are the children of alien parents born in the Canton regarded by the law as Swiss citizens?

a. De facto by the mere incident of their birth on Swiss territory?

b. If not, how long must the parents have resided in Switzerland previous to the birth of the children, or what additional circumstance, beyond the fact of their birth on Swiss territory, are required to constitute the children of Swiss citizens?

c. Are the children expected to elect Swiss citizenship by some formal act on their coming of age? and what is held to constitute a presumptive election of Swiss citizenship on their part?

In reply I have received a communication from the President, copy of which I have the honour herewith to enclose, together with the printed work therein referred to, drawn up by the Federal Chancery on the Cantonal Regulations for acquiring the right of citizenship.

I have, &c.
J. Savile Lumley.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

Copy.

Berne, 31 Aout 1868.

Dans la Note que Monsieur le Ministre de Sa Majesté, Britannique a adressée le 19 courant au Conseil Fédéral, Son Excellence a manifesté le désir de recevoir divers renseignemens sur l'état de la législation Suisse relative à la nationalité d'enfans de parents étrangers qui naissent sur le territoire Suisse, renseignemens résumés sous la forme des questions suivantes:

1° Qu'est-ce qui est nécessaire pour que quelqu'un soit considéré comme citoyen Suisse d'après les lois des différents Cantons?

Pour devenir citoyen Suisse il est nécessaire que quelqu'un acquièrt le droit de bourgeoisie d'un Canton et d'une Commune Il n'existe pas de droit de bourgeoisie Suisse particulier. Le droit de bourgeoisie communal existe en première ligne et s'acquiert par descendance, donation, ou paiement d'une somme d'achat determinée dont le chiffre varie suivant l'état des biens communaux et chaque fois suivant le point de vue de la législation cantonale.

Apres l'acquisition d'un droit de bourgeoisie communal, la naturalisation a lieu dans le Canton respectif soit par le Governement ou par l'autorité législative, naturalisation pour laquelle il faut de nouveau payer une somme d'achat particulière. Sans la naturalisation l'incorporation dans une commune n'a aucun effet. En ce qui concerne la naturalisation d'étrangers, le droit fédéral ne contient que la seule prescription de l'Article 43 de la constitution fédérale à teneur de laquelle les étrangers ne peuvent être naturalisés dans un Canton qu'autant qu'ils seront affranchis de tout lien envers l'état auquel ils appartiennent. Le détail des législations cantonales report d'un recueil de dispositions y relatives de chaque Canton publié en 1862 par la Chancellerie fédérale, dont ci-joint un exemplaire. Si, depuis-lors, des changemens ont peut être été apportés à ces dispositions, ils concernent en tout cas plutôt la forme que le fond.

2. De quelle manière le droit de bourgeoisie, si en général il peut se perdre, se perd-t-il?

Le droit de bourgeoisie Suisse ne cesse que par la mort, ou par la rénonciation volontaire de celui qui le possède à son droit de cité cantonal et communal et par la démission ou le congé que lui donne l'autorité cantonale compétente. Mais cet affranchissement des liens qui l'unissent envers l'état n'est accordé que lorsque la preuve existe en bonne et due forme de l'acquisition d'un droit de bourgeoisie ou de cité étranger. Les enfans légitimes d'un Suisse absent acquierent toujours le droit de bourgeoisie de leur père et les enfans illégitimes celui de leur mère, attendu que pour cela aucune formalité autre que la preuve de la descendance n'est nécessaire. La nationalité Suisse ne se perd pas par une longue absence, &c. comme en général suivant la prescription du même Article 43 de la Constitution fédérale, aucun canton ne peut priver un de ses ressortissants du droit d'origine ou de cité.

3. Les enfants qui naissent dans un canton de parents étrangers sont ils, d'après la législation, considérés comme citoyens Suisses et cela:

a. De facto, par le seul fait de la naissance de ces enfants sur territoire Suisse.

Dans le cas de la négative :

b. Combien de temps les parents doivent-ils avoir habité la Suisse avant la naissance de l'enfant, ou quelles autres circonstances (abstraction faite de la naissance de cet enfant sur territoire Suisse) sont nécessaires pour qualifier les enfants commes citoyens Suisses ?

c. Doit-on s'attendre de la part des enfants qu'ils opteront pour le droit de bourgeoisie Suisse par un acte formel, lors de leur majorité?

Qu'est-ce qui motive la supposition d'une option présomptive de leur part du droit de bourgeoisie ?

En repondant à cette question et à ses trois subdivisions, le conseil fédéral a l'honneur de faire observer que les principes qui viennent d'être développés ne souffrent aucune espèce d'exceptions ; ce n'est notamment non plus le cas en faveur d'étrangers qui sont nés en Suisse quand même eux et leurs parents auraient été très long temps domiciliés en Suisse. Sous ce rapport la Suisse maintient purement et simplement le même principe que celui qu'elle reconnait pour les descendants de ces propres ressortissants, les enfants légitimes suivent la condition de leur père et les enfans illégitimes la condition de leur mère.

Désirant que ces renseignemens puissent être de quelque utilité à la Commission d'incorporation pour laquelle ils ont été démandés, le Conseil Fédéral profite encore de cette occasion pour renouveler à S.E. Mr. Savile Lumley les assurances de sa haute considération.

An nom du Conseil Fédéral
Le Président de la Confédération, (Signed) DUBS.

Le Chancelier de la Confédération,
(Signed) SCHIESS.

UNITED STATES.

The common law of the United States is the same as in England, and regards every child born within the dominions and allegiance of the United States as a citizen of the United States.

The Naturalization Act of 1802 (United States' Statutes at Large, Vol. 2. p. 153.) provided :

" 3. The children of persons duly naturalized under any of the laws of the United States, or who, previous to the passing of any law on that subject by the Government of the United States may have become citizens of any one of the said States, under the laws thereof, being under the age of 21 years, at the time of their parents being so naturalized or admitted to the rights of citizenship shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens of the United States, and the children of persons who now are or have been citizens of the United States shal., though born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States be considered as citizens of the United States : Provided, that the right of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers have never resided within the United States."

This section of the Act of 1802 was confirmed by an Act of the 10th of February 1855 (United States' Statutes at Large, vol. 10, p. 604).

" 1. Persons heretofore born or hereafter to be born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose fathers were or shall be at the time of their birth citizens of the United States, shall be deemed and considered and are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States : Provided however, That the rights of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers never resided in the United States."

WURTEMBERG.

(See Baden.)

APPENDIX No. VI.

NATURALIZATION TREATIES BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND OTHER POWERS.

NORTH GERMAN CONFEDERATION.

TREATY between the United States and Prussia, February 22, 1868.

His Majesty the King of Prussia, in the name of the North German Confederation, and the President of the United States of America, led by the wish to regulate the citizenship of those persons who emigrate from the North German Confederation to the United States of America, and from the United States of America to the territory of the North German Confederation, have resolved to treat on this subject, and have for that purpose appointed Plenipotentiaries to conclude a Convention; that is to say,

His Majesty the King of Prussia, Bernard König, Privy Councillor of Legation; and

The President of the United States of America, George Bancroft, &c. :

Who have agreed to and signed the following Articles :—

ARTICLE I.

Citizens of the North German Confederation who have become naturalized citizens of the United States of America, and shall have resided uninterruptedly within the United States five years, shall be held by the North German Confederation to be American citizens, and shall be treated as such.

Reciprocally : citizens of the United States of America who become naturalized citizens of the North German Confederation, and shall have resided uninterruptedly within North Germany five years, shall be held by the United States to be North German citizens, and shall be treated as such.

The declaration of an intention to become a citizen of the one or the other country has not for either party the effect of naturalization.

ARTICLE II.

A naturalized citizen of the one party, on return to the territory of the other party, remains liable to trial and punishment for an action punishable by the laws of his original country and committed before his emigration; saving always the limitation established by the laws of his original country.

ARTICLE III.

The Convention for the mutual delivery of criminals, fugitives from justice, in certain cases, concluded between the United States on the one part, and Prussia and other States of Germany on the other part, the 16th day of June 1852, is hereby extended to all the States of the North German Confederation.

ARTICLE IV.

If a German naturalized in America renews his residence in North Germany without the intent to return to America, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in the United States.

Reciprocally : if an American naturalized in North Germany renews his residence in the United States without the intent to return to North Germany, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in North Germany.

The intent not to return may be held to exist when the person naturalized in the one country resides more than two years in the other country.

ARTICLE V.

The present Convention shall go into effect immediately on the exchange of ratifications, and shall continue in force for 10 years. If neither party shall have given to the other six months' previous notice of its intention then to terminate the same, it shall further remain in force until the end of 12 months after either of the High Contracting Parties shall have given notice to the other of such intention.

ARTICLE VI.

The present Convention shall be ratified, &c., and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Berlin within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the Plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed this Convention.

Berlin, the 22nd of February 1868.

(Signed) GEORGE BANCROFT.

My Lord, Washington, May 8, 1868.

I have the honour to transmit herewith for your Lordship's information, copy of a despatch which has been addressed by Mr. Bancroft, United States Minister at Berlin, to Mr. Seward, relative to the interpretation given by Count Bismarck to some of the stipulations of the treaty of naturalization between the United States and the North German Confederation of the 22nd of February last.

This despatch has been lately laid before Congress in a message from the President.

I have, &c.
Edwd. Thornton.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.,
&c. &c. &c.

The Treaty between the United States and the North German Confederation.

The President, on Monday, sent a message to Congress, enclosing the following documents :—

Department of State, Washington,
To the President, April 27, 1868.

The despatch of Mr. Bancroft, a copy of which is herewith submitted, relieves the treaty recently negotiated between the United States and North Germany of some injurious misapprehensions which have hitherto existed, and I respectfully submit the expediency of communicating the despatch to Congress.

I am, &c.
W. H Seward.

Sir, American Legation, Berlin, April 6, 1868.

That no doubt might exist of the correctness of my interpretation of our treaty with North Germany, as communicated to you in my despatch of February 22, I left a copy of that despatch at the Foreign Office, and no objection whatever was made to its contents. The report made upon the treaty by the committee of the North German Council was not well digested, and was not wholly free from ambiguity.

Yesterday the treaty came up for acceptance in the Imperial Diet.

Mr. Konig, in the first instance, and then Count Bismarck took the occasion publicly and in the clearest and most emphatic manner to confirm my interpretation of it in every particular. Ex-Consul Meier, the member from Bremen, to whom the President of the Diet had referred the treaty, one of the first merchants in Europe, and well known in America from his long residence among us, reported the treaty to the Diet with the full conviction of its merits He declared his peculiar satisfaction that the natural right of emigration and change of nationality was for the first time made a part of the recognized international law by North Germany and the United States. Dr. Schleider, so well known to you from his long residence as Minister at Washington, not omitting to make some cavils at what he called "small defects," spoke substantially and heartily for the treaty, and for the most liberal interpretation of its several articles. Mr. Konig, the plenipotentiary who signed the treaty on the part of North Germany, in explanation of the first article, said that a five years' continuous residence in America, and no more, was all that the treaty required in regard to residence. The Chancellor of the Confederation, Count Bismarck, spoke on the same point, declaring that the words of the article were too plain to be misunderstood; that the period of five years was to date from the moment when the emigrant should cross the American line, and that the continuity of residence which was required was to be interpreted, "Nicht in koerperlichem sondern, in juristischem sinne," "not in a corporal but in a legal sense."

The interpretation of the second article of the treaty was equally explicit. Dr. Schleider, of the Committee of the Diet, reported that as inasmuch as the liability of the naturalized citizen on his return to his original country extended only to breaches of law committed before emigration, it followed that any breach of the law which might be committed by itself was excluded from the class of punishable actions. This view was confirmed by Mr. Konig, who pointed out that as the emigrant remained liable only for acts committed before emigration, emigration itself, and the consequent withdrawal from military duty, could not be included among such acts. "So then," said Dr. Lowe, one of the ablest members of the Diet, and well known as a long and esteemed resident of New York, "the hateful military "business is now put aside, and the emigrant on his return "is not liable to arrest for the violation of the military duty "from which he had withdrawn by emigration." While he fully accepted the explanation of Mr. Konig, Dr. Lowe still intimated a wish that it might be confirmed by Count Bismarck himself.

The Chancellor immediately arose and replied as follows: "The gentleman who has last spoken, fears that a person who "has lived five years in America, and been naturalized there, "may yet on his return here be held to military duty. This "impression I can designate as perfectly and absolutely un-"founded. The literal observation of the treaty includes in "itself that those whom we are bound to acknowledge as "American citizens cannot be held to military duty in North "Germany. That is the main purpose of the treaty. Who-"soever emigrates, bonâ fide, with the purpose of residing "permanently in America, shall meet no obstacle on our part "to his becoming an American citizen, and his bonâ fides will "be assumed when he shall have passed five years in that "country, and, renouncing his North German nationality, "shall have become an American citizen. I believe, therefore, "that no room has been left open for the anxiety that has "been expressed, and I lay great stress upon here placing "the subject in its true light."

Dr. Lowe questioned the Chancellor on this point once more, saying, "To my joy, I think I may understand the "Chancellor to say that no prosecution for unauthorized "emigration can take place, even if the emigrant shall have "ceased to be an American?" Count Bismarck replied, "I "herewith confirm the declarationwhich the gentleman de-"sires;" and added, jocosely in form, seriously in substance, "and I might almost assert that we will treat the five years' "absence in America, when connected with naturalization, "as a fulfilment of the military duty in the North German "Confederacy."

The fourth article of the treaty came also under consideration. Mr. Lasker, one of the ablest members of the Diet, inquired if the German naturalized in America, and returning to Germany, would, after a two years' residence in Germany, be held liable to military duty. The text of the treaty, he said, gave no colour to such an interpretation, but the report of the Council of the Confederation was ambiguous, and therefore he called upon the Councillor for a clearer explanation. In the beginning of the debate, ex-Consul Meier has most clearly explained that the American law required from the person who becomes naturalized a total renunciation of his allegiance to any other power. Holding fast to this fact, Count Bismarck replied, that the German American citizen, on resuming his relations as a citizen of North Germany, would, under the treaty, stand in the light of a foreigner emigrating into North Germany; that he could not be held to the discharge of any old military duty, but only to such "new" military duty as would attach to every foreigner emigrating into North Germany and becoming naturalized there.

The President now put the question on the acceptance or the treaty, and the whole Diet, with the exception of two of three Poles—who, as it seemed to me, only declined voting—rose to their feet with alacrity. All the proceedings were marked by the disposition to cherish the most friendly relations with the United States. I send you herewith the debate as it appeared concisely in the North German Gazette of last evening, and in the National Gazette of this morning, on the fourth article.

I will add a few words. The American law exacts from the citizen who becomes nationalized a perpetual renunciation by oath of his former nationality. Hitherto the Prussian Government has made no formal recognition of our naturalization laws; but now that it becomes bound by treaty to respect them, it could not have restored the returning American German to his German citizenship had not the consent of the United States to his release from his obligation to them been given, as it is given by the fourth article of this treaty.

I am, &c.
George Bancroft.

William H. Seward, Esq.,
Secretary of State, &c. &c.

BAVARIA.

My Lord, Berlin, June 6, 1868.

Mr. Bancroft, the American Minister at this Court, has, by direction of Mr. Seward, placed in my hands for transmission to her Majesty's Government the annexed copy of the Treaty of Naturalization and supplementary protocol signed between the United States of America and Bavaria at Munich on the 26th ultimo.

This treaty is the same "mutatis mutandis," as that lately concluded between the United States of America, and the North German confederation. The supplementary protocol is intended to explain portions of the treaty which might be considered of a vague and doubtful interpretation, more especially referring to, and defining the position of the naturalized Bavarian, or naturalized American on their return to their original countries.

Mr. Bancroft has officially forwarded to Count Bismarck a copy of these documents, thereby placing the protocol on record, and establishing it in default of any disavowal on the part of the North German Confederation as the rightful interpretation of the treaty.

I have, &c.

(Signed) AUGUSTUS LOFTUS.

The Lord Stanley, M.P.
&c. &c. &c.

His Majesty the King of Bavaria, and the President of the United States of America, led by the wish to regulate the citizenship of those persons who emigrate from Bavaria to the United States of America, and from the United States of America to the territory of the kingdom of Bavaria have resolved to treat on the subject, and have for that purpose appointed plenipotentiaries to conclude a convention, that is to say—

His Majesty the King of Bavaria.
Dr. Otto Baron von Völderndorff, Councillor of the Ministry, and The President of the United States of America.
George Bancroft, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary,—who have agreed to and signed the following articles:—

ARTICLE 1.

Citizens of Bavaria who have become, or shall become naturalized citizens of the United States of America, and shall have resided uninterruptedly within the United States five years shall be held by Bavaria to be American citizens and shall be treated as such.

Reciprocally, citizens of the United States of America who have become or shall become naturalized citizens of Bavaria, and shall have resided uninterruptedly within Bavaria five years shall be held by the United States to be Bavarian citizens, and shall be treated as such.

The declaration of an intention to become a citizen of the one or the other country has not for either party the effect of naturalization.

ARTICLE 2.

A naturalized citizen of the one party on return to the territory of the other party, remains liable to trial and punishment for an act punishable by the laws of his original country, and committed before his emigration, saving always the limitation established by the laws of his original country, or any other remission of liability to punishment.

ARTICLE 3.

The convention for the mutual delivery of criminals, fugitives from justice, in certain cases, concluded between the United States on the one part, and Bavaria on the other part, the 12th day of September 1853, remains in force without change.

ARTICLE 4.

If a Bavarian naturalized in America renews his residence in Bavaria without the intent to return to America he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in the United States.

Reciprocally: If an American naturalized in Bavaria renews his residence in the United States without the intent to return to Bavaria, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in Bavaria.

The intent not to return may be held to exist when the person naturalized in the one country resides more than two years in the other country.

ARTICLE 5.

The present convention shall go into effect immediately on the exchange of ratifications, and shall continue in force for ten years. If neither party shall have given to the other six months' previous notice of its intention then to terminate the same, it shall further remain in force until the end of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of such intention.

ARTICLE 6.

The present convention shall be ratified by his Majesty the King of Bavaria and by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Munich within twelve months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the Plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed this convention.

Munich, the 26th of May 1868.

(Signed) GEORGE BANCROFT. (L.S.)

Dr. OTTO FREIHERR VON VÖLDERNDORFF (L.S.)

PROTOCOL.

Done at Munich the 26th of May 1868.

The undersigned met to-day to sign the Treaty agreed upon, in conformity with their respective full powers, relating to the citizenship of those persons who emigrate from Bavaria to the United States of America, and from the United States of America to Bavaria, on which occasion the following observations, more exactly defining and explaining the contents of this Treaty, were entered in the following Protocols:

I.—RELATING TO THE FIRST ARTICLE OF THE TREATY

1. Inasmuch as the copulative "and" is made use of, it follows, of course, that not the naturalization alone, but an additional five years' uninterrupted residence is acquired before a person can be regarded as coming within the Treaty, but it is by no means requisite that five years' residence should take place after the naturalization.

It is hereby further understood that if a Bavarian has been discharged from his Bavarian indiginate, or on the other side, if an American has been discharged from his American citizenship, in the manner legally prescribed by the Government of his original country, and then acquires naturalization in the other country in a rightful and perfectly valid manner, then an additional five years' residence shall no longer be required, but a person so naturalized shall, from the moment of his naturalization, be held and treated as a Bavarian and respectively as an American citizen.

2. The words "resided uninterruptedly," are obviously to be understood, not of a continual bodily presence, but in the legal sense, and therefore a transient absence, a journey, or the like, by no means interrupts the period contemplated by the first article.

II.—RELATING TO THE SECOND ARTICLE OF THE TREATY.

It is expressly agreed, that a person who under the first article is to be held as an adopted citizen of the other state, on his return to his original country cannot be made punishable for the act of emigration itself, not even though at a later day he should have lost his adopted citizenship.

III.—RELATING TO ARTICLE 4 OF THE TREATY.

It is agreed on both sides that the regulated powers granted to the two governments respectively, by their laws for protection against resident aliens, whose residence endangers peace and order in the land, are not affected by the treaty.

In particular the regulation contained in the second clause of the Tenth Article of the Bavarian military law, of the 30th January 1868, according to which, Bavarians emigrating from Bavaria before the fulfilment of their military duty cannot be admitted to a permanent residence in the land till they shall have become 32 years old, is not affected by the treaty. But yet it is established and agreed, that by the expression "permanent residence" used in the said article, the above described emigrants are not forbidden to undertake a journey to Bavaria for a less period of time, and for definite purposes; and the royal Bavarian government, moreover, cheerfully declares itself ready in all cases in which the emigration has plainly taken place in good faith, to allow a mild rule in practice to be adopted.

2. It is hereby agreed that when a Bavarian naturalized in America, and reciprocally an American naturalized in Bavaria took up his abode once more in his original country with the intention of return to the country of his adoption, he does by no means thereby recover his former citizenship; on the contrary, in so far as it relates to Bavaria, it depends on his Majesty the King whether he will or will not in that event grant the Bavarian citizenship anew.

The Article Fourth shall accordingly have only the meaning that the adopted country of the emigrant cannot prevent him from acquiring once more his former citizenship, but not that the State to which the emigrant originally belonged is bound to restore him at once to his original relation.

On the contrary, the citizen naturalized abroad must first apply to be received back into his original country in the manner prescribed by its laws and regulations, and must acquire citizenship anew exactly like any other alien.

But yet it is left to his own free choice whether he will adopt that course or will preserve the citizenship of the country of his adoption.

The two plenipotentiaries give each other mutually the assurance that the respective Governments in ratifying this treaty will also regard as approved, and will maintain the agreements and explanations contained in the present protocols without any further formal ratification of the same.

(Signed) G. Bancroft. (L.S.)
(Signed) Dr. Otto von Völdendorff. (L.S.)

Note.—Ratifications were exchanged on the 18th of September. Similar conventions have been negotiated with Baden, Hesse, and Wurtemberg.

MEXICO.

The President of the United States of America and the President of the republic of Mexico, being desirous of regulating the citizenship of persons who emigrate from Mexico to the United States of America, and from the United States of America to the republic of Mexico, have decided to treat on this subject, and with this object have named as plenipotentiaries, the President of the United States, William H. Seward, Secretary of State; and the President of Mexico, Matias Romero, accredited as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the republic of Mexico to the government of the United States; who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

Article I.

Those citizens of the United States who have been made citizens of the Mexican republic by naturalization, and have resided without interruption in Mexican territory five years, shall be held by the United States as citizens of the Mexican republic and shall be treated as such. Reciprocally, citizens of the Mexican republic who have become citizens of the United States, and who have resided uninterruptedly in the territory of the United States for five years, shall be held by the republic of Mexico as citizens of the United States, and shall be treated as such. The declaration of an intention to become a citizen of the one or the other country has not for either party the effect of naturalization. This article shall apply as well to those already naturalized in either of the countries contracting as to those hereafter naturalized.

Article II.

Naturalized citizens of either of the contracting parties, on return to the territory of the other, remain liable to trial and punishment for an action punishable by the laws of his original country, and committed before his emigration; saving always the limitations established by his original country.

Article III.

The convention for the surrender in certain cases of criminals, fugitives from justice, concluded between the United States of America of the one part and the Mexican republic on the other part, on the eleventh day of December one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, shall remain in full force without any alteration.

Article IV.

If a citizen of the United States naturalized in Mexico renews his residence in the United States without the intent to return to Mexico, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in Mexico. Reciprocally, if a Mexican naturalized in the United States renews his residence in Mexico without the intent to return to the United States, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in the United States.

The intent not to return may be held to exist when the person naturalized in the one country resides in the other country more than two years.

Article V.

The present convention shall go into effect immediately on the exchange of ratifications, and it shall remain in full force for ten years. If neither of the contracting parties shall give notice to the other six months previously of its intention to terminate the same, it shall further remain in force until twelve months after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of such intention.

Article VI.

The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by the President of the Mexican republic with the approval of the Congress of that republic, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in Washington within nine months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof, the plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed this convention at the city of Washington this tenth day of July in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight.

William H. Seward.
M. Romero.

APPENDIX No. VII.

STATISTICS. REGISTRATION OF THE BIRTHS, DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Statistics.—1. British Subjects in Foreign Countries.

(Extracted from the Census of England and Wales, 1861, Vol. III., pp. 4, 5.)

1. Persons absent from the United Kingdom.

The people of these islands are more moveable than other nations, and large numbers of them are always abroad, sometimes on distant voyages, sometimes on the Alps, sometimes in the deserts of Africa, or the strangest places; but generally in ships at sea, in the great commercial entrepôt, in the capitals of Europe, in our colonies, or in the States of America.

The measures which were taken to procure the returns of the army and navy, and merchant seamen abroad, either on sea or land, have been already described, and they were successful. The numbers exceeded a quarter of a million (250,356), of whom 126,273 belonged by birth to England and Wales. The army and navy of a country are an integral part of its population they should, therefore, be counted among the numbers. But the population of travellers and of temporary settlers in other States are less accurately defined; their numbers are not easily ascertained, and they are represented to some extent by exiles and foreign visitors in England. They are, therefore, excluded from our tables. The number of the British subjects, including the Scotch and the Irish, abroad, of which we have returns, was 67,969; this number does not include the English in America, in India, or in the colonies, neither does it include any of the English in France, except those who were domiciled. Upon the other hand, some of the people born at the Mediterranean stations were inscribed in the Consular registers as British subjects; but as a general rule the Maltese and Ionians are excluded from the list.

France is the country to which the English most resort in Europe, and 25,844 are domiciled there; 4,092 are returned in Belgium, 827 in Holland, 1,124 in Switzerland, 7,365 in Germany, 5,467 in Italy, including Rome, 2,072 in Portugal, and 3,879 in Spain, 525 in Greece, 2,360 in Turkey, and 931 in Egypt; in Denmark 372, in Norway 242, and in Sweden 411; in Russia 3,749. Passing to Asia, 30 of Her Majesty's subjects were returned in Persia, 1,072 in China, 81 in Japan, and 24 in Siam. The English population in India according to the returns of the Indian Government (apparently defective) amounted to 125,379, including the English army, 85,008 strong. They are not included in Table 5, page 81; see Tables 325–332, pp. 213–17.

340 English people are in the empire of Morocco. Algeria and the rest of Africa make no return.

Central America returns 145 English residents, Ecuador 27, Chili 4,152, of whom 3,265 are males, chiefly miners, and Brazil 2,838.

Table 6, pages 82–3, shows in detail the particular places in which the English resided, and the notes supply some necessary explanations.

The number of each of the two sexes returned abroad did not greatly differ, as the males were 36,734, and females 31,235. In France and Belgium the women exceeded the men in number; and in Germany there was little difference. The girls at school probably effect this result. In China, Japan, Chili, Brazil, and India, the men preponderated largely.

The natives of England in the United States exceed the numbers in all other countries. Mr. Kennedy, the able superintendent of the Census of the United States has favoured us with an elaborate return of the number of the inhabitants of each State in 1860 who were born in this kingdom, amounting in the aggregate to 2,224,743; of whom it was ascertained that 477,455 were born in England and Wales, 108,518 in Scotland, and 1,611,304 in Ireland; 27,466 were described simply as born in the United Kingdom. In addition to these numbers 249,970 were born in British America, and 1,419 in Australia. The distribution of the 2,474,713 emigrants over the several States is shown in the Appendix, Table 7.

Our information about foreigners in England and Wales is tolerably complete, and we shall refer to the details hereafter. The number was 84,090, or exclusive of those from the United States, 76,229. This is some compensation, therefore, for the English abroad, who, as has been already stated, are not included in our numbers.

British-born Subjects in Foreign Countries from which Returns have been received.

Extracted from Census 1861, Vol. II., pp. lxxv, vi, vii.)

France (domiciled) *	25,844
Switzerland	1,124
Spain	3,879
Portugal	2,072
Italy	4,413
Rome	1,054
Greece †	525
Turkey	2,360
Germany	4,508
Austria	1,113
Hungary	59
Prussia	1,685
Belgium	4,092
Holland	827
Denmark	372
Norway	242
Sweden	411
Russia	3,749
Persia	30
China	1,072
Japan	81
Siam	24
Egypt	931
Morocco	340
Central America	145
Ecuador	27
Chili	4,152
Brazil	2,838
	67,969
United States of America	2,476,132
	2,544,101

* The return applies only to natives of the United Kingdom who were domiciled in France at the time of the Census; persons temporarily visiting France for purposes connected with business, pleasure, or health, are therefore, not included.

† British subjects, not including Maltese or Ionians, or persons protected as British subjects.

2. Aliens resident in England and Wales.

(Census 1861, Vol. III., pp. 39, 40.)

In the midst of 19,982,623 British subjects lived 84,090 subjects of Foreign States. They are of all ages; but there is a great excess of men between the ages of 20 and 40; 9,502 of the subjects of Foreign States belong to America, 518 to Africa, 358 to Asia, and 73,434 to Europe; 40,909 of them are in London, and the rest are distributed all over England.

The diplomatic corps stands amongst the subjects of Foreign States first in importance, but its numbers are not considerable. The merchant seamen amount to 15,561, chiefly from Norway, Denmark, Sweden, and Germany, the descendants of the same races as invaded England.

We give a table of the ages and occupations of the subjects of European States. Of the subjects of France 12,989 are reckoned, including teachers of languages, governesses, cooks, servants, merchants, clerks, seamen (1,532), tailors, bootmakers, dressmakers, and smaller numbers in a greater variety of smaller occupations.

Italy sends us musicians, artists, priests, figure and image makers, looking-glass makers, and merchants. 667 Italian seamen were in our ports; Germany, with Austria and Prussia, besides seamen (4,624), supplied us with a large number of musicians, teachers of the German language, servants, merchants, factors, and commercial clerks, watch and clock makers (965), engine and machine makers, tailors, shoemakers, with many bakers, and a large colony of sugar refiners (1,345).

The cities, and especially the metropolis, are the principal seats of foreign residence. London in 1851 contained 30,057 persons born in foreign parts; and in 1861 it contained 48,390 foreigners by birth.

Liverpool in the two censuses contained 4,167, and 4,412 foreigners; Manchester and Salford 2,035, and 3,086 persons born in foreign parts; Birmingham, Hull, and Brighton were the only other towns that contained more than 1,000 foreigners.

Of 100 foreigners residing in England 36 were born in Germany, Austria, and Prussia, 16 in France, 9 in the United States of America, and 39 in all the other States of the world.

Aliens (foreigners born abroad) resident in England and Wales, according to the Census of 1861. (Census, Vol. II., pp. lxxv, vi, vii.)

France	12,989
Switzerland	2,341
Spain	1,337
Portugal	527
Italy	4,489
Greece	574
Turkey	331
Germany	21,438
Austria	1,669
Hungary	245
Prussia	7,206
Belgium	2,031
Holland	5,512
Denmark	2,534
Norway	3,161
Sweden	1,801
Russia	1,633
Poland	3,616
	73,434
Asia	358
Africa	518
United States of America	7,861
Mexico, Brazil, and other States	1,641
Not stated	278
	84,090

3.—NUMBER AND NATIONALITY OF ALIENS NATURALIZED IN ENGLAND, 1845-68.

ANALYSIS of the Returns laid before Parliament showing the Number and Nationality of Aliens naturalized since the passing of the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66.—August 6, 1844.

Year.	Austria.	Bavaria.	Belgium.	Denmark.	France.	Greece.	Hanse Towns.	Italy.	Holland.	Poland.	Portugal.	Prussia.	Germany.	South America, Central, & Mexico.	Russia.	Spain.	Sweden and Norway.	Switzerland.	Turkey.	United States.	Total.
1845	8	11	3	16	8	1	14	21	9	9	4	73	57	–	–	1	14	16	3	1	269
1846	17	2	4	7	9	3	10	12	7	12	–	26	64	–	4	5	3	8	4	1	198
1847	7	2	2	10	12	1	18	18	6	5	2	36	39	2	6	4	8	12	18	3	211
1848	5	4	1	13	19	–	16	12	5	7	4	34	39	1	5	2	–	8	5	5	185
1849	5	4	–	1	13	6	4	10	6	7	1	21	30	–	3	–	4	12	6	2	135
1850	9	4	1	4	12	7	7	11	5	10	–	20	39	–	6	3	2	10	5	2	157
1851	6	2	7	6	15	5	15	14	7	6	–	34	35	–	3	2	7	10	2	2	178
1852	8	3	2	5	13	7	5	9	1	6	1	18	58	–	3	1	3	8	–	–	151
1853	12	1	8	5	11	2	16	2	8	5	3	58	52	–	6	1	7	14	2	1	214
1854	10	8	–	8	8	3	7	22	4	8	1	44	45	2	1	2	3	3	4	4	187
1855	17	9	9	7	14	7	9	17	4	7	–	53	60	2	1	2	3	6	9	5	241
1856	20	9	4	4	14	5	7	8	10	8	4	44	46	–	5	2	4	4	3	1	202
1857	6	8	2	2	16	1	10	9	3	8	–	48	51	–	3	4	7	5	4	6	193
1858	21	–	3	–	16	2	7	13	7	17	–	76	49	–	8	1	4	5	5	2	236
1859	27	1	3	7	24	2	8	14	5	23	–	70	82	–	9	–	7	6	8	1	297
1860	15	7	7	8	25	3	13	13	–	19	–	64	78	–	10	2	2	11	12	3	292
1861	16	7	1	8	18	4	11	7	6	28	1	28	53	–	11	2	4	7	16	5	233
1862	18	7	12	6	20	5	9	17	–	26	–	66	38	1	18	–	8	6	13	4	274
1863	6	5	6	6	13	5	19	12	4	17	–	82	52	–	10	–	2	8	10	7	264
1864	15	8	9	10	13	8	17	14	7	21	1	66	76	–	15	3	4	8	8	7	310
1865	15	5	9	7	21	7	8	13	2	27	–	83	73	–	9	2	10	18	9	9	327
1866	9	9	14	8	18	8	13	18	7	29	–	86	94	–	9	2	13	9	14	6	366
1867	22	7	9	6	27	8	17	21	7	10	2	60	103	–	16	6	–	7	17	6	351
1868*	11	2	2	2	21	2	5	3	6	9	–	49	35	–	5	3	–	8	6	6	175
	305	125	118	156	380	102	265	310	126	324	24	1,239	1,348	8	166	50	119	209	183	89	5,646
																Miscellaneous		–	–		189
																					5,835

(Extract from Parliamentary Paper, July 7, 1868.)

RETURN of the Names and Descriptions of all ALIENS who, in each Year from 1847, inclusive, have obtained from the Legislature ACTS of NATURALIZATION, including the Right of SITTING IN PARLIAMENT, and being of HER MAJESTY'S PRIVY COUNCIL.

Year.	Name.	Description.	Place of Birth.
1849	Tufton, Richard, and	Esquire	Verdun.
	Tufton, Henry (an infant), son of the above		Place of birth not mentioned in the Act.
1858	Acton, Sir John Emerick Edward Dalberg	Baronet	Naples.
1866	Lowther, Francis William	Lieutenant, R.N.	Genoa.
1867	De Ferrieres, Charles Conrad Adolphus Du Bois, commonly known as Baron de Ferrieres.	Baron	Holland.
,,	Bischoffsheim, Henri Louis	Banker, City of London	Holland.
,,	Lange, Daniel Adolphus	East India Merchant, City of London	Holland.
1868	Bolckow, Henry William Ferdinand	Ironmaster, Middlesborough	Sulten.
,,	Allhusen, Christian†	Merchant, Newcastle-upon-Tyne	Kiel.

* The Return for 1868 is made up to the end of June.
† This Bill will receive the Royal Assent next Commission.

Registration of the Births and Deaths of British Subjects in Foreign Countries.

There is no Act of Parliament for the registration of the births of children born of British fathers in foreign countries, nor for the registration of deaths.

A system of registration has, however, been in force for some years at Her Majesty's legations and consulates.

"The Act (respecting marriages) does not provide for "the registration of the births and deaths of British "subjects in foreign countries. But it is, nevertheless, "very important that such registers should be kept at "each consulate, and should be transmitted home to be "deposited in the office of the Registrar General. Con- "sular officers will, therefore, keep two registers, one "for births and the other for deaths; and they will give "publicity to the fact that they are authorized to insert "therein such entries of births and deaths as may be "reported to them for registration, provided that not more "than seven years have elapsed since the occurrence of "these events. Forms of the registers can be obtained at "the Foreign Office.

"At the expiration of each year, consular officers will "transmit to the Secretary of State a copy of each register "so kept during the year which has elapsed, certified under "their hand and seal to be correct, in order that the same "may be transmitted to the Registrar General. Should "no registration have taken place during that period, a "certificate to that effect must be sent.

"A sum of 2*s.* 6*d.*, as provided by the Order in Council "of the 1st of May 1855, is payable for each registration." (Consular General Instructions, p. 25.)

It appears on inquiry at Somerset House that British subjects very generally avail themselves of the opportunity afforded to them by the Foreign Office instructions for registering the births of their children in all countries, except in the United States, where very few children are registered. There were no entries of births at the consulates of New York and Boston during the years 1865-1866.

A table furnished by the Registrar General is annexed, showing the number of births registered at Her Majesty's consulates since the system has been in practice, and also the number registered during the year 1866, the last year for which the returns are complete.

As this registration of births and deaths is not authorized by statute, the registries have no legal validity, and the Registrar General is not empowered to give copies of the entries to applicants, as in other cases of registration. It is considered desirable that this should be remedied.

If any provision is made by Act of Parliament for the registration of the births of those children whose fathers wish to record their British nationality, some small fee should be required to be levied, to enable local consular agents to be appointed for the purpose when the consular district is inconveniently large. Local consular agents have been appointed in this manner for the registration of the marriages of British subjects in the mining districts in the interior of Brazil.

Registration of Births in this Country.

The registration of births in this country was provided for in the Registration Act, 6 & 7 William 4, c. 86, s. 20.

"§ XX. And be it enacted, that the father or mother of "every child so born in England after the said first day of "March, or in case of the death, illness, absence, or inability "of the father and mother, the occupier of the house or "tenement in which such child shall have been born, shall "within forty-two days next after the day of every such "birth give information, upon being requested so to do, to "the said registrar, according to the best of his or her "knowledge and belief, of the several particulars hereby "required to be known and registered touching the birth of "such child."

It will be seen that the registration is not compulsory. All that the person is bound to do is to give information within 42 days upon being requested to do so.

There is no penalty under the Act for not giving such information; and in order to enforce the Act the Crown has to proceed by indictment for a misdemeanor. As a rule, parents recognize the utility of the registration and register without giving any trouble, but cases do occur occasionally in which they refuse to register. Such a case occurred in October 1866, when Alfred Brooks was indicted at the Berkshire Quarter Session for refusing to furnish the registrar with the particulars required by the Act. He pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to seven days imprisonment.

As all the children born in England are, by the common law, British subjects, the registration does not include any statement as to the nationality of the father. This, however, could be readily introduced if requisite.

Number of Births registered at British Consulates and Embassies abroad, from the Year 1850 to 1866, inclusive, and the Number registered to the last-mentioned Year.

Consulates.

Country.	1850–1866.	1866.
Austria	56	1
Belgium	49	1
Bight of Biafra	2	0
Borneo	5	0
Brazil	698	46
Buenos Ayres	21	0
Chile	210	22
China	222	20
Denmark	6	0
Egypt	207	32
France	615	80
Algeria	3,467	266
Frankfort	74	4
Greece	69	6
Grey Town	8	1
Hanse Towns	26	1
Hayti	80	2
Japan	23	2
Mexico	137	5
Monte Video	75	1
Morocco	60	5
Netherlands	53	12
New Granada	32	1
Norway	89	6
Paraguay	3	0
Persia	24	1
Peru	95	5
Portugal	253	18
Prussia	49	1
Roman States	108	7
Russia	237	20
Salvador	8	0
Sandwich Islands	40	0
Sardinia	207	18
Saxony	29	1
Siam	20	3
Two Sicilies	235	20
Society Islands	53	1
Spain	1,091	36
Sweden	29	2
Switzerland	112	20
Tripoli	11	2
Tunis	9	0
Turkey	845	78
Tuscany	72	6
United States	165	6
Venezuela	3	0
Total in Consulates	9,982	759

Embassies.

Baden	9	0
Bavaria	3	0
Berlin	51	10
Berne	23	6
Dresden	37	4
Florence	9	8
Hanover	21	4
Wurtemberg	24	4
Total in Embassies	177	36

Registration of Marriages at Consulates.

The registration of marriages of British subjects at Her Majesty's consulates is regulated by the Consular Marriage Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 68), by which the Consuls authorized to solemnize marriages are required to forward to the Foreign Office annually copies of the entries in the consular register of all marriages which have taken place during the year, or nil returns in case of there having been no such marriages. The copies of these entries are forwarded to Somerset House, and taken charge of by the Registrar-General, who thus possesses duplicate copies of all consular marriage registers. As the registry entries are numbered consecutively, he can see if any duplicate copies of entries are omitted to be sent.

Registration of Marriages at Legations.

These precautions are not observed at embassies and legations.

There is no Act of Parliament to regulate the manner in which the registration of marriages at embassies and legations should be effected, or to give legal validity to the copies of entries forwarded to England.

In 1816 an arrangement was made by which the Bishop of London was to keep the registry entries of these marriages, and the following notice was published:—

"The Lord Bishop of London having been applied to in numerous instances to permit foreign marriages, births, and burials of British subjects to be recorded in his registry, has permitted a book to be kept therein, in which the memorials of the same may be entered and preserved, at the request of such persons as are desirous thereof.—March 23, 1816."

On the 6th of May 1816 a circular was addressed to the embassies and legations, with instructions as to the manner in which certificates were to be forwarded, and requiring that a fee of 1*l.* for the Bishop of London's registrar should be sent with them.

An Act was passed in 1823 (4 Geo. 4. c. 91.) to remove doubts as to the validity of marriages solemnized at embassies and legations, but made no provision for registration.

A case arose in 1854 in which Her Majesty's minister at Brussels refused to allow a marriage to be celebrated at the legation between parties who declined to pay the fee of 1*l.*, and the opinion of the law officers having been taken, it was decided that the parties could not be legally compelled to pay the fee, and that although Her Majesty's ambassadors and ministers might at their discretion legally refuse to allow marriages to be celebrated at their residences, yet that they ought not to refuse so to do on the ground of the parties declining to avail themselves of the right of registration at the London registry office, and to pay the sum of 1*l.* for that purpose.

It seems a very undesirable state of things that consular marriages and returns of births and deaths should be registered at the Registrar-General's and diplomatic marriages elsewhere, and still more undesirable, looking to the class of persons who are married at the embassies and legations, that the proof of such marriages should depend on the will or ability of the persons married to pay a fee.

The subject deserves consideration, and should it be deemed expedient to regulate the registration of marriages at embassies and legations in the same manner as the registration of marriages at consulates, there would be little difficulty in doing so, as the Consular Marriage Act will probably be revised during the ensuing year on the recommendation of the Marriage Law Commission.

CHARLES S. A. ABBOTT.

LONDON:
Printed by GEORGE E. EYRE and WILLIAM SPOTTISWOODE,
Printers to the Queen's most Excellent Majesty.
For Her Majesty's Stationery Office.